DEDICATION.

Language, by that able Hiſtorian M. Rapin de Thoyras, has had the Sanction of the Greateſt and Wiſeſt Commonwealth in the World, namely, the High and Mighty States of thoſe Provinces to which you are ſo dear by your Birth, Reſidence and Perſonal Merit, as well as by the Intereſt and Fortune that you derive from your Illuſtrious Family: To whom, Sir, could ACTA REGIA be ſo properly inſcribed as to your Moſt Serene Highneſs?

The Tranſlator is very well appriz'd, that your Highneſs has ſuch an Averſion to Adulation, as is uncommon to Princes of your Age and Power: And indeed to mention any of thoſe amiable Endowments and Qualities, that have already ſo endear'd you to this Nation, would be altogether needleſs; ſince all Tongues are united in your Praiſe, and all Hearts that are grateful for the Ineſtimable Advantages procured to them by King William's Glorious Legacy, viz. the Succeſſion in the Royal Line of Hanover, are convinced that His preſent Majeſty could not give a more engaging Proof of his Deſire to perpetuate their Happineſs, than by the Contract he lately ſign'd to tranſplant the Faireſt Branch of that Legacy into a Family, which has ſo ſignally defended and promoted the Cauſe of Liberty, and the Proteſtant Religion.

It muſt be very pleaſing to thoſe of our Religion to find, that ſo long as two Centuries ago, a Prince of your Name took a Pope, and thirteen Cardinals, Priſoners in the Caſtle of St. Angelo.——But I muſt not forget that I am imploring your Highneſs's Patronage; and therefore will not preſume farther, than to add my moſt humble Teſtimony, that I ſincerely join with the Public, not only in the Veneration due to your Virtues, but in the moſt ardent Wiſhes, that you may begin the New Year with a perfect Re-eſtabliſhment of your Health: And that it may be permanent, is, and ever will be, the Prayer of,

Your Highness's

Moſt Devoted, and

Moſt Obedient Humble Servant,

Stephen Whatley.

INTRODUCTION.

THERE never was yet ſeen ſo noble a Collection of Publick Acts and Monuments of Hiſtory as that firſt compiled by the late Hiſtoriographer Mr. Thomas Rymer, purſuant to the Directions of King William, Queen Mary, and Queen Anne, and ſince continued by Mr. Sanderſon, under the Title of FOEDERA, CONVENTIONES, LITERÆ, &c. conſiſting of the LEAGUES, CONVENTIONS, LETTERS, and all the other PUBLIC ACTS between the Kings of England and all other Emperors, Kings, Popes, Princes, or Communities, beginning with the Reign of King Henry the Firſt, and ending with that of King Charles the Firſt.

THIS was an Undertaking not only worthy of the Generoſity of thoſe Great Princes, but very much to the Honour of the able Councils that were about them when it was directed and ſet on foot: For it is univerſally allow'd to be a Repoſitory of the beſt Materials that can be had for embelliſhing and illuſtrating the Britiſh Hiſtory, and that of all Countries in general with which our Crown has negotiated ever ſince the beginning of the twelfth Century. By this we diſcover a great many Faults which have eſcaped the moſt exact Hiſtorians who have wrote of our Affairs ſince that Time, both in Facts and Dates. We find ſeveral conſiderable Chaſms in our Hiſtory fill'd up by the help of many ſecret Acts which were never publiſh'd before, or never came into the hands of Hiſtoriographers, either before or ſince. We are thereby enabled to diſcover the Anceſtors of many illuſtrious Families of Europe, how they conducted themſelves in all Revolutions and Parties in the State; and, in fine, we have the Satisfaction to ſee every Fact eſtabliſh'd upon the authentic Acts of the ſeveral Reigns, and on ſuch Originals as are indiſputable.

AFTER this, it cannot be doubted but the Public is eſpecially oblig'd to the late Queen, and to her Miniſtry, who, in the midſt of ſo expenſive a War, generouſly contributed to promote this Undertaking. I own, it was a great Pleaſure to me, to ſee ſuch a Regard had to Poſterity, as to put it in a Condition to be better inform'd of paſt Tranſactions than even the preſent Age was till now: This was a Thought we were not to expect but in great Souls, too ſublime to be affected by the Viciſſitude of the Times. In many Places Duſt and Vermin prey upon the few ancient Records they have left, till perhaps they are quite deſtroy'd by Fire, or ſome other Accident, while no body laments the Loſs, becauſe it falls on the Indolent, *who deſpiſe the Knowledge of what's paſt, or to come, provided they enjoy the Time preſent. But the Philoſophers tell us, That the Curioſity of knowing Things paſt, the Attention which a Man gives to it, in order to form Rules for his preſent and future Conduct, and the Regard he ſhews to Poſterity, are ſome of the chief Characters which diſtinguiſh Man from the Beaſts of the Field. One of the * Antients, no leſs famed for his Knowledge than for his Eloquence, ſays,*

" That the Difference betwixt Men and Brutes lies chiefly here: A Beaſt is only
" moved by the Senſes, and looks no farther than the Time preſent, having little " or no Perception of what is paſt, or to come; on the contrary, Man being endow'd
" with Reaſon, ſees both the Cauſes and Conſequences of Things, knows their Be- " ginning and Progreſs, compares Like with Like, and even joins Futurity with
" the Time preſent.

IT was therefore a ſingular Pleaſure to ſee Perſons of the firſt Rank in Britain correcting the Vice of their Age, and ſetting an illuſtrious Example, which, 'tis to be hoped, will ſome time or other be follow'd by its Neighbours.

OF all the Hiſtories that were conſulted by Mr. Rapin de Thoyras, 'tis granted by the Editors of his Volumes, that this Valuable Collection was of the greateſt help to him in compiling that large Work; for it enabled him to rectify the Dates in an infinite number of Places; to diſcover a world of Miſtakes in the beſt Writers

ters of all Nations that have treated of our Hiſtory, to paſs a true Judgment on thoſe Articles wherein they happen to contradict one another, and to bring to light a great many Events which other Hiſtorians have not ſo much as mention'd, or but ſlightly touch'd.

'TIS now almoſt Thirty Years ſince the FOEDERA firſt began to be publiſh'd. In the Year 1708 it made ſix Volumes, which are ſince increas'd to nineteen large Folios; and when it made but ſeventeen, it was ſold for a hundred Guineas; there being, I may venture to affirm, not one important Act omitted in it, that the Records of England can ſhew in any of the Reigns it mentions.

WHAT is now propoſed is an Abridgment of this voluminous expenſive Collection, tranſlated from that made by Mr. Rapin himſelf in Holland, and firſt publiſh'd in the French Bibliotheques of the famous M. le Clerc, who being furniſh'd with the Fœdera by the late Lord Hallifax, one of the principal Promoters of it, lent the ſeveral Volumes to Mr. Rapin for that very purpoſe.

THO it is an Abridgment, 'tis ſo judiciouſly and accurately done, that it has paſs'd the Approbation of all the Curious who have ſeen it; for we have not only the Titles and Pages of the ſeveral Acts recorded by Mr. Rymer, but a well connected Series of the Events to which they relate; together with many uſeful Remarks, for which we are oblig'd to the learned Publiſher above-mention'd, as well as to his deceaſed Friend Rapin.

THE Diſpoſition as well as Leiſure of the preſent Generation to read the Hiſtory of England by Mr. Rapin, ſeem very much to encourage the publiſhing of this other Work of his in the ſame manner, which is intended to cõme out weekly alſo, as that does. And, to make it ſtill further uſeful, the Tranſlator has added ſome Notes from the beſt Authorities, which are not to be met with either in the Fœdera, or Rapin's Abridgment of it; and he has mark'd the Pages in the Margin, referring to the Originals at large in the Fœdera.

'TIS proper to acquaint the Reader that the Firſt Tome of the Fœdera was abſtracted by the famous Mr. Le Clerc of Amſterdam; but that Gentleman had ſo many Engagements in the Republic of Literature, that he proceeded no farther than the ſaid Firſt Tome, and lent the other Sixteen, as they were publiſhed, to Mr. Rapin, who continued the Abſtract of each Tome, as it was printed in Le Clerc's Bibliotheques.

THIS Abſtract was thought ſo valuable by the Government of Holland, that the illuſtrious Penſionary Fagel, obſerving how difficult it was to come at it in ſo many ſmall Volumes, where it lay confuſed with the Extracts of numerous other Books, cauſed the ſeveral Parts of it to be collected together, and printed by the States Printer at the Hague in one entire Volume in Folio, after Mr. Rapin himſelf had review'd the Firſt Tome of the Fœdera, and given a fuller and more methodical Account of it than Mr. Le Clerc had done.

YET for a particular Reaſon, no more than thirty Books of that Edition were printed off; ſo that one would ſcarce have expected to meet with a Copy of it in England; but the Tranſlator had the good Fortune to find this Curioſity in the Library of an Engliſh Gentleman, Martin Folkes, Eſq; who not being capable to deny his Country any thing in his Power for the Illuſtration of its Hiſtory, generouſly lent him his Book; of which the following Sheets are an exact Tranſlation.

ACTA

ACTA REGIA.

MR. Le Clerc having given an Extract of the Firſt Tome of Mr. Rymer's Collection, in the XVIth Vol. of his Bibliotheque Choiſie, it would be extraordinary Preſumption in me to offer at giving another, if I did it with a Thought of performing it better than he has done, or of making any Correction in what he has thought fit to remark. But that was not the thing which induced me to this Undertaking. I am, on the contrary, fully perſuaded that Mr. Le Clerc's Extract muſt convince the Lovers of Modern Hiſtory, what a Loſs they ſuffer'd when he was pleaſed to lay the Task of continuing the Extracts, upon me. If the Multiplicity of his Affairs had permitted him to have apply'd cloſe to the Work, he would have made an infinite number of Remarks upon this Collection, which cannot be expected from me. But as I have Extracted all the following Tomes of the Fœdera, in a Method different from Mr. Le Clerc, and with other Views, I thought it would not be improper to retrace this Tome after the ſame Method, in order to render the whole Plan more uniform. It ſeems that Mr. Le Clerc, when he gave the Extract of the Firſt Tome, had no deſign to go on with the reſt, becauſe he contented himſelf with giving a general Idea of the Uſe which might be made of that Collection; firſt, by ſome general Remarks; and, ſecondly, by pointing to ſome of the moſt important Acts which are in the Firſt Volume.

Lemma. Mr. Rapin's Reaſons for the Uſe he has made of Mr. Rymer's Fœdera.

But my View in the following Extracts, from the Second Tome to the Seventeenth incluſive, was to be more particular, to ſhew the Relation which the Acts ſtand in to the Events we meet with in our Hiſtory, and to illuſtrate the one by the other. It was with the ſame View, and in purſuance of the ſame Method, that without meddling with Mr. Le Clerc's Extract, I propoſed to make this, which tho' the firſt in Order, is the laſt with regard to the Time of its Compoſition.

THIS Firſt Tome contains all the Acts that could be found of ſix Reigns, viz. Henry I. Stephen, Henry II. Richard I. John, and Henry III. Theſe ſix Reigns together include the ſpace of 172 Years, from 1101 to 1272. It is to be wiſh'd that this Collection could have begun with the Reign of William the Conqueror; for that is not only the moſt conſiderable Epocha of the Hiſtory of England, but it is certain that the Knowledge of what paſs'd in that Kingdom from the Conqueſt, that is to ſay, from the Year 1066 to the Year 1101, at which this Collection begins, is abſolutely neceſſary for the perfect underſtanding of a great number of the Acts therein printed. This is true, eſpecially as to the Affair of the Succeſſion of the Crown, concerning which there were Wars whereof it is impoſſible to know the real Foundations, without knowing what State the Right of Succeſſion was in, during the two firſt Ages that follow'd the Conqueſt. This leads me to ſay a Word or two upon this Subject, which I regard as a matter of great Importance, with reſpect to the ſeveral Revolutions that fell out afterwards, and to what we have ſeen in our own Time.

General Contents of the firſt Tome of the Fœdera.

IT cannot be deny'd that William the Baſtard, Duke of Normandy, truly conquered England, by the Victory he gain'd at Haſtings over Harold, and by every Step he took afterwards, as well to procure the Crown to himſelf, as to keep it in his Poſſeſſion. It was Force only that placed him on the Throne, and it was by the ſame Method that he maintain'd himſelf upon it. I will not enter here into the Diſcuſſion of the Proofs which ſome have brought to ſhew that the Crown of England devolv'd juſtly to William, after the Death of Edward the Confeſſor; ſuch as Edward's laſt Will and Teſtament, which no body ever ſaw; the pretended Approbation of the Parliament, even during the Life of Edward, which is only founded upon the Teſtimony of ſome Hiſtorians who wrote long after that Time; and laſtly, the Kindred betwixt those two Princes, which could not but be defective, because William was a Bastard, besides that he was only related by the Female side. All William's Right therefore is reducible to this, viz. that Edward intended to appoint him his Heir, and had perhaps made him a verbal Promise of it; but as Edward had a Nephew, viz. Edgar Atheling his Brother's Son, 'tis certain that it was not in his Breast to leave the Crown to a Foreigner. At least we meet with no Precedent in the History of the Saxon Kings, from whence it may be infer'd that it was in the Power of a King to leave his Crown to Foreigners, in Prejudice of the Royal Race.

AFTER Edward's Death, Edgar Atheling was excluded from the Succession, and the English chose Harold II. who was not of the Royal Blood. It was this Election that furnished William with a Pretext for aspiring to the Crown of England. He pretended that because Edgar was rejected, the Right which Harold could infer from the Consent of the Great Men who had elected him, was no better founded than what he himself could infer from Edward's Promise. That was the real Ground of the Quarrel betwixt the two Princes, in which Harold fell, being overthrown and kill'd at the Battle of Hastings.

The Oath taken to him.

AFTER that Time, William being plac'd upon the Throne, acquir'd a new Right by the Oath his Subjects took to him; an Oath which they were not in a Condition to refuse him, and which really was rather extorted than given voluntarily. Yet for all this, William look'd upon himself as a real Conqueror, and exercised a Despotick Power over his Subjects all the rest of his Lifetime. He took away their Estates, and gave them to Foreigners; and in the space of a few Years, England was peopled, if we may so call it, with new Inhabitants, and especially with new Lords.

His absolute Power.

His Carelessness about the Succession.

DURING this whole Reign, no Law was made about the Succession to the Crown. The Conquest being laid down as the Foundation, could not of it self give any manner of Right to the Succession, because from the Conquest of a Kingdom there cannot be infer'd either an Hereditary Right from Father to Son, or a Right of Males exclusive of the Females, and much less a Right of Election in the Commons, or in the Great Men. In this confused State did William leave the Succession when he died, that is to say, no Regulation was made about it. This is a Point I lay down for Fact, and which I prove by what happen'd afterwards.

WILLIAM the Conqueror being on his Death-Bed, did not think fit to dispose of the Crown by an Act of absolute Power. He barely signified that he wish'd his second Son William might attend the Throne after him; and he also secretly concerted Measures with Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, that his Wish might be accomplish'd, as it actually was.

William Rufus's Succession, to what owing.

WILLIAM II. surnam'd Rufus, the second Son of William the Conqueror, seated himself on his Father's Throne to the Prejudice of his elder Brother Robert; not by virtue of an express Nomination, or by a Will of the Father, or by an Election in form, but by the Broils he had rais'd among the Great Men to hinder them from opposing his Succession: and notwithstanding Robert's Efforts, he maintain'd himself upon it as long as he liv'd.

Succession of Henry I.

HENRY I. succeeded him after the very same manner almost, tho' Robert his eldest Brother was still living. Hitherto we find no Trace of Hereditary Succession, as that Term is commonly understood. Henry left one only Daughter, named Maud, who was Widow to the Emperor Henry V. and afterwards marry'd to Geoffery Plantagenet Earl of Anjou. But Stephen, the younger Son of a Daughter of William the Conqueror, who was marry'd to the Earl of Blois, ascended the Throne in the same manner as his two Predecessors. He had a long War with Maud, who had a Party in England; but at last he carry'd his Point, and drove her out of the Kingdom. I confess I don't see why Stephen deserves the Title of Usurper any more than the three Kings that preceded him; and yet it is a Title that the Historians commonly give him, as if it fitted him better than the others. After Stephen was deliver'd from Maud, he had a new Rival to cope with, viz. Henry, who was Maud's Son by the Earl of Anjou. This young Prince repairing to England, disputed the Crown with Stephen, and at length forc'd him to make a Treaty with him, whereby he declar'd him his presumptive Successor, tho' he had a Son of his own; and this Treaty was approv'd by all the Great Men of the Kingdom. Here it is that we begin to have a View of the Hereditary Right of Succession, because Henry only disputed for the Crown with Stephen in quality of Maud's Son; and yet Maud was still alive when Henry her Son made this Treaty, and when he ascended the Throne; nor does it appear in History that she had transfer'd her Rights to him.

Of Stephen.

Prov'd to be no more an Usurper than his Predecessors.

His Treaty with Hen. II. his Rival.

HENRY II. had a Son of his own Name, whom he caused to be crown'd beforehand; a Precaution which would have been very needless, if he had thought the Hereditary Succession sufficiently establish'd. He had three other Sons, viz. Richard, Geoffery, and John. Henry the eldest of the Four died without Issue in his Father's Lifetime. Richard was King of England. Geoffery died before his Father, leaving a Daughter nam'd Eleanor, and a Posthumous Son who was called Arthur. Richard succeeded eeeded the King his Father, but after his Death, inſtead of Arthur, John was plac'd upon the Throne, who was the laſt of Henry IId's Children; tho' according to the natural Order of Hereditary and Lineal Succeſſion, the Crown devolv'd to Arthur the Son of Geoffery, John's elder Brother.

Barons Wars with King John.

JOHN, ſurnam'd Lackland, being very much embroil'd with his Barons, they call'd to their Aſſiſtance Prince Lewis, Son to the King of France, and recognized him for their Sovereign. This Prince made himſelf Maſter of almoſt the whole Kingdom; and John, who had but a very ſmall Party in England, dy'd before the end of that War. After his Death, the Barons who were attach'd to him, crown'd Henry III. his Son, who was about 12 Years of Age. Lewis being afterwards forc'd to abandon England, the two Parties were reconcil'd, and acknowledg'd young Henry for their King.

Coronation of Henry III.

THUS have I given you a ſhort Hiſtory of the Succeſſion to the Crown of England, from the Conqueſt to Henry III. In which it may be obſerv'd, 1. That the Crown was preſerv'd in the Poſterity of William I. tho' Stephen and Henry were deſcended from him only by the Female ſide. 2. That all the Kings of England from Henry II. derive their Origin from Maud. 3. That of the firſt eight Kings who reign'd after the Conqueſt, there were but two, viz. Richard and Henry III. who ſucceeded in the Order of Nature, that is to ſay, from Father to Son, according to the Priority of Branches. They who admit of this Order as a fundamental Maxim of Succeſſion, cannot but own that William I. William II. Stephen, Henry II. and John, were all Uſurpers; at leaſt if they will judge according to their own Principle. But as in this ſpace of Time we meet with no Law, nor any other Regulation, which has eſtabliſh'd this Order; and as on the other hand we find in theſe eight firſt Reigns ſix Precedents to the contrary; I think it may be infer'd that there was nothing fix'd upon this Head, nor any Principle eſtabliſh'd for regulating the Succeſſion. Theſe Remarks may be of ſome Service in the Courſe of the Extracts intended from the Fœdera. I come now to the ſix Reigns, whoſe Acts are contain'd in the firſt Tome of the Fœdera.

The REIGN of HENRY I.

ANNO 1100.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

Henry I's Acceſſion.

HENRY I. aſcended the Throne after William Rufus, tho' Robert their elder Brother, who had already been ſupplanted once, was ſtill alive. This is not a Place to examine whether Henry became King by Stratagem, by Force, by Right of Birth, as being born in England after the King his Father was on the Throne, by an Election free or forc'd, or by all theſe Claims put together. As there is not a ſingle Act in this Collection that has a relation to it, I ſhall not inſiſt upon this Matter. It being natural for the ſaid Prince to foreſee that he ſhou'd need the Aſſiſtance of his Subjects to maintain him on the Throne, he granted them a very advantageous Charter, whereby he reſtor'd to them their antient Privileges, which they had enjoy'd under the Saxon Kings. But this Charter was ſo ill obſerv'd, that it was in a manner forgot; and 'twas by mere Chance that a hundred Years after, a Copy of it was found among thoſe depoſited in the chief Monaſteries.

His Charter to his Subjects.

Anno 1101. IN order to win the Hearts of the Engliſh more and more, Henry recall'd Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had had great Quarrels with William Rufus, and was retired into France. Moreover, he marry'd Maud of Scotland, the Daughter of Malcolm, by a Siſter of Edgar Atheling, the laſt Prince of the Race of the Saxon Kings. By this Marriage, the Saxon Blood was united with that of Normandy and Anjou, ſo that Henry's Poſterity deriv'd its Origin from both.

He recalls Anſelm A Bp. of Canterbury.

He marries.

HENRY I.

HENRY was under a Neceſſity of taking theſe Precautions; for he had occaſion to know very ſpeedily how neceſſary the help of the Engliſh would be to him, in order to reſiſt the Attacks of Robert his Brother, who endeavour'd, tho' in vain, to dethrone him. The Engliſh ſerv'd their King ſo well, that Robert was obliged to lay aſide his Claim on the Payment of a certain Penſion.

Anno 1103. HENRY rag'd with Envy to be reveng'd on his Brother, or rather to deprive him of Normandy; but it was delay'd for ſome time, by a Quarrel which he had with Anſelm, relating to the Inveſtitures (of Biſhops and Abbots) which was at laſt determin'd by an Accommodation.

His hatred of Robert his Brother, and quarrel with Anſelm.

Anno 1105. THIS Affair being over, Henry attack'd Robert, defeated him, took him Priſoner, ſeiz'd his Duchy, and confin'd him to the Caſtle of Cardiff in Wales, where that unhappy Prince dy'd after he had been 28 Years a Priſoner.

Robert's Ruin and Death.

Anno

FOEDERA Tom. I.

HENRY I.

Henry is made uneasy by his Nephew William Crito.

Anno 1108. WHILE Robert was in Priſon, William his Son, ſurnamed Crito, being ſupported by the King of France, prov'd a great Thorn in the Side of his Uncle Henry, 'till Death pluck'd it out, by cutting off his ſaid Nephew in 1128.

His Daughter Maud's Marriages.

IN the Year 1109. Henry gave his Daughter Maud in Marriage to the Emperor Henry V. who dying without Iſſue by her, Maud return'd home to the King her Father, and was marry'd again to Geoffrey Plantagenet, Earl of Anjou.

Wm. his Son is drown'd.

Anno 1127. FROM this Marriage deſcended Henry, of whom I ſhall have occaſion to treat hereafter. Mean time William, who was the only Son of Henry I. was unfortunately drowned, as returning from France to England. By his Death the Empreſs Maud became preſumptive Heir to the King her Father, who caus'd her to be recogniz'd as ſuch, and made all the Engliſh Nobility take an Oath to her, which, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, was ill obſerv'd.

Empreſs Maud recogniz'd preſumptive Heir to the Crown.

Henry enriches his Nephews.

Anno 1127 & 1130. HENRY had with him in England two Nephews, the Sons of his Siſter Adela, Counteſs of Blois. He took a delight to make thoſe two Nephews rich and powerful, by procuring for Stephen the Elder, a Match with the Heireſs of Bologne; and for the other, who was Henry, the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter: By which he hop'd the Empreſs his Daughter would be well ſupported, in caſe the Engliſh ſhou'd ſcruple to own her as their Queen; for no Settlement having been made hitherto of the Succeſſion, he apprehended that they would refuſe Obedience to a Woman. But this Precaution only tended to put Stephen in a Capacity to ſupplant her. Henry dy'd in 1135, after having reign'd about 36 Years.

His Death.

THERE are but two Acts in this Reign, and they both ſhew that it was the Cuſtom then to grant Penſions in Fee, as they did Land.

Conventions with Robert Earl of Flanders.

THE firſt of theſe is a Convention between Henry I. and Robert Earl of Flanders *, dated at Dover the 16th of the Calends of June 1101.

" BY this Convention Henry gave a " Penſion of 400 Marks to Robert in Fee, " and Robert engag'd to ſend him into " England or Normandy 500 Men arm'd, " with 3 Horſes each, and 250 into le " Maine, Salva Fidelitate Ludovici Regis Francorum. Nevertheleſs Philip I. " was alive; but as he was excommuni- " cated, there's no mention in theſe Acts " of any but King Lewis his Son."

P. 4. of the Fœdera.

THE ſecond is another Convention between the ſame Perſons: Sign'd at Dover the 6th of the Ides of March 1102.

" BY this Convention the Earl of Flan- " ders engag'd himſelf to furniſh the King " with 1000 Horſemen for a Penſion of " 400 Marks in Fee, and gave him 12 " Sureties, who were bound each in 100 " Marks. The King likewiſe gave Sure- " ties for the Payment of the Penſion." †

* THIS Earl was called Robert of Jeruſalem, becauſe of his being at the taking of that City from the Saracens, by Godfrey of Bouillon. In his time, Flanders was ſo afflicted with Plague, Famine, Inundations, and continual Rains, from October 1108, to April 1109, that many of the Inhabitants were forced to retire into England, where they were planted in a Colony in the Eaſt Part of the Country, by King Henry I. He was the firſt of the Earls of Flanders choſe by the Emperors to be Protector of Cambray.

AFTER his Return from the Holy Land, he took part with the French King, who was called Lewis the Groſs, againſt the Engliſh, and beſieged the City of Mante, on the Seine, then in their Hands; but was trampled under Horſes Feet in one of their Salleys, and dy'd of his Wounds at Arras, in 1111.

† THESE being not the moſt inconſiderable Pieces in the Collection, Mr. Rymer has made Remarks upon them in his Preface, that deſerve to be taken Notice of; to which we ſhall join others, when we come to the mention of ſome particular Paſſages in theſe two Acts.

AFTER having mentioned the Witneſſes on the Part of the King and Earl, the firſt Act goes on thus: " ROBERTUS comes Flandriæ, fide & ſacramento aſſecuravit regi Henrico, vitam ſuam, & membra quæ " corpori ſuo pertinent, & captionem corporis ſui, ne rex eam habeat ad dampnum ſuum, & quod juvabit eum, " ad tenendum & defendendum regnum Angliæ, contra omnes homines, qui vivere & mori poſſint; ſalva fide- " litate Ludovico regis Francorum. Ita ſi rex Ludovicus regnum Angliæ invadere voluerit, comes Robertus, " ſi poterit, regem Ludovicum remanere faciet; & quæret quocumque modo poterit, conſilio & precibus, per " fidem abſque malo ingenio, ſine datione pecuniæ, ut remaneat. Et ſi rex Ludovicus in Angliam venerit, & " Robertum comitem ſecum adduxerit, comes Robertus tam parvam fortitudinem hominum ſecum adducat, " quam minorem poterit; ita tamen ne inde feodum ſuum erga regem Franciæ forisfaciat." i. e.

ROBERT Earl of Flanders ſolemnly ſwears to ſubject himſelf, Life and Member, to King Henry, that he ſhall not come to any Damage by him, and that he will aſſiſt him to maintain and defend the Kingdom of England againſt all Men living; ſaving his Allegiance to Lewis King of France: In ſuch manner, that if King Lewis offers to invade the Kingdom of England, Earl Robert, if he can, ſhall prevail with King Lewis to forbear, and ſhall for that end uſe all manner of Advice and Intreaty, without any ſiniſter Intention, or Bribe. And if King Lewis ſhall come into England, and bring Earl Robert with him, the ſaid Earl Robert ſhall take as ſmall a Number of Men with him as poſſible: Provided nevertheleſs that he doth not depart from the Fealty which he oweth to the King of France.

THESE follow certain Conditions, particularly one in theſe Words, Et ſi quis comes Angliæ, vel alii homines ejuſdem terræ juraverint, ita quod reus comitatum, vel valens comitatum quæſierit: i. e. And if any Earl of England, or other Perſons of the ſaid Realm ſhall rebel, ſo as that the King ſhall loſe the County, or the Value thereof, &c. There are likewiſe Guarantees on both ſides for this Treaty, who are termed Obſides, i. e. Hoſtages: And in the ſecond Act, theſe Guarantees oblige themſelves to pay 100 Marks for him they are bound for, in caſe he does not obſerve the Treaty. The King of England engages on his Part to pay the Earl of Flanders, singulis annis 400 marcas argenti in feodo: i. e. 400 Marks Sterling every Year, in way of Fealty.

THESE Remarks which Mr. Rymer makes upon theſe Conventions are, 1. That Eadmer the Hiſtorian of that time ſhews that the common People knew nothing at all of the Reaſon why Robert came over into England,

The REIGN of King STEPHEN.

ANNO 1135.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

King Stephen's Acceſſion.

WHILST Henry I. was on his Death-bed at the Caſtle of Lyons near Roan, the Biſhop of Wincheſter made a Party in England for his Brother Stephen ‡. He had ſuch good Succeſs in the Scheme he had laid to procure him the Crown, that when Stephen arriv'd in England, after the Death of the King his Uncle, the great Men were diſpos'd to place him on the Throne, notwithſtanding the Oath they had taken to Maud. It does not appear that at that time the common People concern'd themſelves in any manner in the Affair of the Succeſſion to the Crown; for it was the great Men, both Spiritual and Temporal, that diſpos'd of it. The Sex of the Empreſs was the great Pretext that was made uſe of to exclude her; but the true cauſe that induced the Barons to declare for Stephen, was the Biſhop of Wincheſter's having engag'd for him, that he would maintain them in the Poſſeſſion of their Eſtates and Privileges. It was on this poſitive Promiſe that the Grandees were willing to obey him. This appear'd by the Oath of the Earl of Gloceſter, natural Son to Henry I. which contain'd this Clauſe, That he would be faithful to the King as long as he ſhould obſerve the Conventions made with the Barons.

STEPHEN.

Why the great Men declar'd for him excluſive of Maud.

I ſhall obſerve here by the way, that at that time almoſt all the Barons of England were Foreigners; that is to ſay, Natives of Normandy, Bretagne, or Anjou; and, that they poſſeſs'd the Fiefs which William the Conqueror had taken from the Engliſh. Now as they had receiv'd thoſe Fiefs from the abſolute Power of the Conqueror, they had reaſon to fear that the ſame Royal Power might as well take them away. Therefore they placed Stephen on the Throne, becauſe, as he had no Right land; which Reaſon we find in this Inſtrument, and which probably was kept ſecret for fear of offending the King of France.

2. THAT the Hiſtorians of Flanders miſtook the 400 Marks Sterling for a Tribute, becauſe the King gave it to the Earl of Flanders, in feodo, as a Fief, by Virtue of which the Earl was obliged to do him certain Service, as appears by this original Convention, and by many others; tho' ſome Hiſtorians, both ancient and modern, have related the Matter quite otherwiſe, for want of being well informed of the Fact.

3. THAT this Act is a more ancient Proof than any the French have yet been able to produce, that the old Earls of Flanders were Vaſſals to their Kings.

4. THAT Lewis is here nam'd for his Father Philip *; becauſe the latter was then excommunicated, upon account of his carnal Commerce with Bertrade, Wife to Fulk Earl of Anjou, tho' Lewis had not begun to take care of the Affairs of the Kingdom: Which is a Confutation of David Blondel, who in his Book de formulâ regnante Chriſto, has aſſerted that the Title of King was never granted to this Lewis in any Act whatſoever, during the Life of his Father.

To theſe Remarks Le Clerc adds, That a Penſion is here called Feodum, or Fief, a Term ſeldom given to any thing but Lands; from whence it comes to paſs, that a Fief is defin'd in Law to be uſus-fructus rei immobilis, ſub conditione fidei; i. e. The holding of Land upon condition of Fealty. Mean time, 'tis ſpecify'd in both Conventions, that the 400 Marks Sterling ſhall be given to Earl Robert, in feodo, or in Fee, as if it was ſo much Land.

It muſt be obſerv'd by the way, That if any one would undertake to inrich M. du Cange's Gloſſary of Vulgar Latin, he would here find a great many new Examples of Words which M. du Gange has explain'd; and without doubt many more of which he has ſaid nothing at all. There is a Neceſſity of having either his Book, or Spelman's, for the perfect underſtanding of thoſe Acts. Without ſuch Helps, who could imagine that boſiare ſignify'd to rebel; that exonium ſtood for Moleſtation; foriſfacere for rejecting, renouncing, or loſing, which occur in the foregoing Acts; and many more ſuch Words that we meet with afterwards?

Source of the French Language.

As the French Language, in its preſent State, is deriv'd immediately from the vulgar Latin, 'tis there we muſt ſeek for the Etymology of moſt Words, as M. Menage plainly demonſtrates, in his Origin of the French Tongue. For Inſtance, they who are only acquainted with the ancient Latin, would be at a Loſs to gueſs from whence comes the Expreſſion il ſera quitte de cela; but ſuch as have read the foregoing Acts will know that it then meant quietus erit de illa; i. e. he ſhall not be moleſted on that Head. To inſtance in the Etymology of one Word, which does not derive its Origin from the old Latin; the Orthography of the Word Feodum, Fief, and the Senſe which it bears in the abovementioned Acts, perſuade me to believe, that they † who derive that Word from the old Saxon Feo, which ſignifies Reward, are in the right.

* He put away his Wife on pretence that ſhe was too near a-kin, and marry'd another, for which he was excommunicated; but obtained an Abſolution afterwards from the Pope, and a Confirmation of his laſt Marriage. He waſted himſelf by his Debaucheries, and died in 1108, not at all lamented by his Subjects, becauſe he was a great Oppreſſor.

† See Stephen Skinner's Etymologicon, upon the Word Fee.

‡ Stephen was then in France, where Pope Innocent II. had an Interview with him, and wou'd have perſwaded him to take a Voyage to the Holy Land. Mr. Rapin has omitted the mention of a remarkable Bull granted by this Pope in the Year 1137, whereby he takes Aldgate Church at London into his Protection, and confirms the Donations which had been given to it. Mr. Rymer has caus'd the Beginning and the End of it to be engrav'd, to pleaſe the Curioſity of thoſe who never ſaw ſuch Inſtruments: There we plainly ſee the Pope's Sign Manual, his Cypher, or thoſe interwoven Letters which he ſubjoin'd to his Name; and laſt of all, his Seal. Its being dated in the Year of our Lord 1137, ſhews, according to the Remark of Mr. Rymer, that Father Papebroch, the Jeſuit, was miſtaken, when he deny'd that Bulls were dated after that manner before Pope Eugene IV. and pretended that thoſe produc'd to diſprove him were ſubſtitious. Father Mabillon was in the right to oppoſe him, and this ancient Monument is a Proof of it. The ſame thing will appear in a like Bull, granted by Pope Eugene III. which is a little lower; and in another by Pope Honorius, which is produc'd among the Acts of the Reign of Henry III. ſo that we need go no farther for Proofs of it.

Fœdera Tom. I.

to the Crown, they had a Pretence to demand ſuch Conditions of him as Maud perhaps would never have conſented to. Of theſe the moſt important was, that they ſhould enjoy their Fiefs independently of the King's Will, and that they ſhould never be depriv'd of them, but by the Judgment of their Peers, and conformably to the Laws. The two Williams had not ſhewn abundance of Regard to thoſe Privileges; and Henry I. had only pretended to ſecure them in the Poſſeſſion thereof, by a Charter, which, as I ſaid above, was not well obſerv'd. So that the Barons, by taking only a conditional Oath to Stephen, ſecur'd themſelves from the Danger they were in of being depriv'd of their Eſtates, by the ſame Royal Power which had put them in poſſeſſion. Stephen promis'd whatever they requir'd of him, for the ſake of obtaining the Crown; but afterwards the Barons pretended that he had not kept his Word with them, and that gave Occaſion to a War, which laſted to the end of this Reign.

His War with the Barons.

Anno 1138. THE Earl of Gloceſter headed the Party which oppos'd the King; and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, tho' he was Stephen's Brother, join'd alſo with his Enemies; and as he was Legate from the Pope, he drew in almoſt all the Clergy to his Party. At length David King of Scotland, ſeeking to make advantage of theſe Diviſions, under pretence of ſupporting the Rights of the Empreſs his Niece, enter'd alſo into the Quarrel. But that which did the King moſt harm, was his Folly in falling out with the Clergy, who debauch'd his Subjects to that degree, that they call'd for Maud, in order to place her upon the Throne. The Events of this Civil War make up the whole Hiſtory of this Reign.

His Defeat and Impriſonment.

Anno 1140. BUT without entering into Particulars, I will only take notice, that Stephen being defeated in Battle, and taken Priſoner by the Earl of Gloceſter, languiſh'd for ſome time in Priſon, while Maud was own'd as Queen, tho ſhe was not yet crown'd.

His Brother joins him and retrieves his Affairs.

Maud's flight.

Anno 1141. BUT the Biſhop of Wincheſter being diſſatisfy'd with the Empreſs, went over to the Party of the King his Brother, and notwithſtanding his being a Priſoner, gave quite another Turn to his Affairs: For by his Intrigues Maud was, as it were, turn'd out of London, and forc'd to fly with very great precipitation. Afterwards, when ſhe hoped to ſurprize the Biſhop in Wincheſter, and ſpent time in beſieging the Caſtle of that City, ſhe was her ſelf ſurpriz'd by an Army which that Prelate had ſet on foot, and oblig'd to retire in great haſte; but the Earl of Gloceſter, who kept in the Rear to favour her Retreat, was taken Priſoner. As this Earl was the greateſt Support ſhe had, and as without him ſhe knew ſhe could not ſtand her Ground, ſhe conſented he ſhould be exchang'd with the King.

STEPHEN.

Earl of Gloceſter's impriſonment and exchange with King Stephen.

Anno 1146. AFTER that time Stephen gain'd ſuch great Advantages over his Competitor, that he oblig'd her at laſt to return to Normandy to the Earl her Husband.

Maud's return to Normandy.

THE Tranquillity which the King enjoy'd by Maud's Retreat laſted but three or four Years. For Henry, who was Maud's Son by the Earl of Anjou, becoming Duke of Normandy by his Mother's Reſignation of that Duchy to him, and afterwards Duke of Guienne, by his Marriage with Eleanor the Heireſs of that Country, undertook to aſſert his Rights to the Crown of England, as Grandſon to Henry I.

Henry's Claim to the Crown.

Anno 1150. STEPHEN labour'd in vain to have the Crown placed on the Head of his Son Euſtace, in order to ſecure the Poſſeſſion of the Throne to his Family, for he found an invincible Reſiſtance in the Clergy, who had already made Engagements with Henry.

Stephen tries in vain to get his Son crown'd.

Anno 1152. THIS young Prince arriving in England, was ſupported in it by a ſtrong Party, and made a ſharp War upon the King, who on his part defended himſelf with very great Courage.

Henry's Reception in England and War with King Stephen.

Anno 1153. AT length Euſtace Earl of Boulogne, the King's eldeſt Son, dying, and the War ſtill continuing betwixt the two Competitors, it happen'd that the two Armies were in ſuch a Situation, that they could not avoid coming to a Battle.

Anno 1154. BUT the Noblemen of the two Parties interpoſing to accommodate this Quarrel without the effuſion of more Blood, a Treaty was made, whereby Henry was declar'd preſumptive Succeſſor of Stephen, who actually adopted him, tho' he had a Son alive nam'd William. This Treaty being ſign'd, Henry return'd to Normandy, there to wait the Death of Stephen, who was to keep the Crown during his Life, but he did not hold it above a Year, for he died in 1154. after a Reign of 19 Years full of Troubles.

The REIGN of HENRY II.

ANNO 1154.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

Henry II's Acceſſion.

HENRY II. ſurnam'd Plantagenet, aſcended the Throne after the Death of Stephen, tho' the Empreſs his Mother was ſtill alive, and tho ſhe had not made him any authentick Conveyance of her Rights. At leaſt we find nothing upon this Subject in Hiſtory. The Reign of this Prince contains ſeveral important Events, of which, for the greater clearneſs, I ſhall make ſeveral Articles. The firſt ſhall be of the Increaſe of the Engliſh Monarchy, which happen'd chiefly in this Reign; the Knowledge of which Increaſe is abſolutely neceſſary for underſtanding the Hiſtory of England, with regard both to this and the following Reigns. The ſecond Article ſhall contain a ſhort Abridgment of Henry IId's Quarrel with Thomas Becket Archbiſhop of Canterbury, tho' we find but one Act in the Fœdera which relates to it. The third ſhall treat of the Conqueſt of Ireland. The fourth, of the Rebellion of the King's Children. The fifth of Henry IId's Affairs with Scotland. The ſixth, of his Affairs with France. The ſeventh, of the Rebellion of Richard the King's Son, and of the War it occaſion'd betwixt Henry and Philip Auguſtus.

ARTICLE I.

Of the Increaſe of the Engliſh Monarchy.

Increaſe of the Engliſh Monarchy.

I call that the Increaſe of the Engliſh Monarchy, which in a proper Senſe was only the Augmentation of the Power of the Kings of England. But tho' the Provinces which thoſe Kings poſſeſs'd in France were not united to the Crown of England, yet they depended thereon in ſome meaſure, becauſe they depended on him that wore it. And it happen'd, whenever there was occaſion, that the Kings of England made no ſcruple to ſpend the Blood and Treaſure of the Engliſh, for the Preſervation of ſuch foreign Provinces; tho' they did not make a Part of their Kingdom.

HENRY II.

THUS William the Conqueror added Normandy to the Crown of England: But after his Death, this Duchy was ſeparated from it, becauſe it fell into the Hands of Robert his eldeſt Son; while William Rufus his ſecond Son enjoy'd the Crown of England. The latter gave plain Intimation, that he thought Normandy ought to be united to England; becauſe he made Efforts to turn his Brother out of it: but not ſucceeding in his Enterprize by force of Arms, he acquir'd the ſaid Duchy after another manner, at the Cloſe of his Reign; Robert having mortgag'd it to him for a Sum of Money, to enable him to make a Voyage to the Holy Land.

Normandy added to, and ſeparated from the Crown of England.

Mortgag'd to King Henry I. by his Brother Robert.

AFTER the Death of William Rufus, Henry his younger Brother ſeiz'd the Throne of England, in the Abſence of Robert his elder Brother; but did not dare preſently to attempt the Maſtery of Normandy. Robert returning afterwards from the Holy Land, put himſelf in poſſeſſion of that Duchy; but Henry made War upon him for a very ſlight Cauſe, and having defeated and taken him Priſoner, he ſeiz'd his Country and kept it as long as he liv'd.

Seiz'd by King Henry I.

THIS ſame Duchy was the Occaſion of a War between Stephen and the Empreſs Maud. Stephen ſeiz'd it and held it for ſome time, after having obtain'd the Inveſtiture of it for Euſtace his eldeſt Son, from the King of France; but at laſt it fell into the Hands of Maud and Geoffery Plantagenet her Husband, who yielded it to Henry their Son: So that Henry was actually Duke of Normandy when he came to the Crown of England.

By King Stephen.

Devolv'd to Henry II.

HE was alſo Earl of Poitou and Duke of Guienne, by his Marriage with Eleanor of Guienne. Lewis the Younger, King of France, had marry'd this Princeſs, and had two Daughters by her; but he quarrell'd with her to ſuch a degree, that he divorc'd her, and reſtor'd her all the Dominions ſhe brought him as her Portion. By this Reſtitution he depriv'd the Crown of France of the Duchy of Guienne, and the Earldom of Poictou; which included the Limouſin, Perigord, Auvergne, Rouvergne, Saintonge, the Pais d'Aulnis, beſides Guienne and Poictou properly ſo call'd. Henry who was already Duke of Normandy; ſeeing ſo rich an Heireſs that wanted nothing but a Husband, propoſed a Marriage to her, which was negotiated ſo privately, that the firſt News the King of France had of it, was, that the Wedding was ſolemniz'd at Bourdeaux.

His Marriage.

He defrauds his younger Brother of his Eſtate, &c.

Anno 1156. To theſe fine Acquiſitions, Henry alſo join'd, after the Death of Geoffery his Father, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, of which he depriv'd Geoffery his younger Brother. The Earl of Anjou, who was Father to both of them, had left thoſe 3 Provinces to his ſecond Son, ſuppoſing that the eldeſt would have reaſon to be ſatisfy'd with the Duchy of Normandy, of which he was already in poſſeſſion, and with the Crown of England, which was to devolve to him one Day by a Treaty that he had concluded with Stephen. He had alſo made him take an Oath that he would punctually execute this Clauſe of his laſt Will. But Henry not thinking it fit to leave the Inheritance of his Anceſtors to his younger Brother, got himſelf abſolved from his Oath by the Pope, and then ſeiz'd thoſe three Provinces.

Geoffery's Expulſion, and Death.

GEOFFERY being drove out of Anjou, retir'd to Bretagne, where he was recogniz'd Earl of Nantes by the People of that County, who were not ſatisfy'd with their Earl.

Anno 1159. THIS Prince dying two Years after, Conan Duke of Bretagne ſeiz'd Nantes. But Henry maintaining that he was the lawful Heir of his Brother, march'd into Bretagne with ſuch a ſtrong Force, that Conan was oblig'd not only to yield the Earldom of Nantes to him, but alſo to make a Treaty with him, whereby he promis'd to give his only Daughter Conſtantia in Marriage to Geoffery, Henry's third Son, who was as yet but in the Cradle. And the Marriage was celebrated five Years after this, notwithſtanding the tender Age of this Prince, who after the Death of his Father-in-Law, became Duke of Bretagne. But as he was ſtill under Age when Conan dy'd, Henry took Poſſeſſion of Bretagne in his Son's Name. To prevent France from oppoſing his Undertaking, he went to Paris, and there concluded a Marriage between Henry his eldeſt Son, and Margaret Daughter of Lewis the young, who was then but [illegible] of the Monarch of France.

ALL theſe Acquiſitions being not enough to content him, he undertook to make himſelf Maſter of the County of Tholouſe, to which Eleanor his Wife had Pretenſions as Heireſs to the Family of Poictiers. With this Deſign he made an Alliance with the King of Arragon, and the Count of Barcelona, and went and beſieg'd Tholouſe, after having taken Cahors in his March. But the King of France, who was beforehand with him, had already thrown himſelf into Thoulouſe, and defended that City ſo well, that he forc'd him at length to raiſe the Siege. HENRY II.

I ſhall treat hereafter of the Conqueſt of Ireland, which happen'd in this Reign.

ARTICLE II.

Affairs of Henry II. with Thomas Becket, Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

THOMAS BECKET was the Son of a Citizen of London, and his Mother was a Syrian. In his youth he profeſs'd the Law, and was ſo eminent for his Abilities, that he was made Archdeacon of Canterbury. Some Affairs which he had to tranſact at Court, made him known to Henry II. who having employ'd him upon ſeveral Occaſions, had ſuch an Eſteem for him, that he made him Lord High Chancellor. He behav'd in this new Dignity very inſolently towards all Mankind, except the King, to whom he always paid all manner of Submiſſion and Complaiſance. Henry thinking that Becket was entirely devoted to him, reſolved to make uſe of him for executing a Project which he had form'd, to humble the Clergy a little, and to reduce their Power to due Bounds, by retrenching part of the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction. To accompliſh this with the more eaſe, it was abſolutely neceſſary to have the Concurrence of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; wherefore Henry thought he cou'd not do better than to procure the ſaid Eccleſiaſtical Dignity for Becket, after the Death of the Archbiſhop Theobald, which happen'd in 1163. It was with very great difficulty that the Monks of St. Auſtin reſolv'd to chuſe Becket, becauſe they thought him too much devoted to the Court.

Hiſtory of Thomas Becket.

Henry's Project to humble the Clergy.

IN the Reign of William the Conqueror, the Clergy of England were very much fallen from the Grandeur and Power they were veſted with under the Saxon Kings. This Prince did whatever he pleas'd both in Church and State, and Gregory VII. with all his Inſolence, did not ſo much as dare to pretend to thwart him. The Caſe was much the ſame under William Rufus, who was not of a Humour to be hector'd either by the Clergy or the Pope. This Prince had a great Quarrel with Anſelm Archbiſhop of Decay and Revival of their Power.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

of Canterbury, who was at last oblig'd to quit the Kingdom, and to go for Refuge to Lyons, where he stay'd 'till this King's Death. Henry I. lost a little Ground, and cou'd not maintain the absolute Power which the two preceding Kings had enjoy'd, as well over the Clergy, as the Laity. The obstinacy, or if you please, the undauntedness of Anselm in the Quarrel which they had together about the Investitures, gave him abundance of Mortification, and at last he was oblig'd to put an end to it in an amicable way. In the Reign of Stephen, the Crown lost still more. The Clergy, who had properly plac'd this King upon the Throne, had all Power as it were in their own Hands; and when Stephen, who fear'd the Consequences of it, went to reduce it, his Endeavours only tended to engage him in a War, which debarr'd his Children from the Crown.

HENRY II. perfectly knew what the Clergy's Power was, because he himself had made great use of it before he came to the Crown. He was no sooner upon the Throne, than he form'd a Contrivance to lessen that Power, but he could not immediately put it in Execution, because of the Affairs which detain'd him in France.

Becket is made Abp. of Canterbury.

Anno 1163. THOSE Affairs being finish-ed, he persisted in his Design, and casting his Eye on Thomas Becket, as a Man that he thought he could depend on, he made him Archbishop of Canterbury; to the end, that while he possess'd together two Dignities so considerable as those of the Chancellor, and the Archbishop, he might be in a better condition to assist him. Probably he had imparted his design to Becket in confidence, while he was as yet but Chancellor, and this was what broke his Measures. Becket was no sooner vested with the Archiepiscopal Dignity, but he return'd the Great Seal to the King, who seem'd very much surpriz'd at it. Moreover, whereas before he affected Pomp to excess, he chang'd his Manners as soon as he was Archbishop, dress'd himself with coarse Stuff, and kept but a very small number of Domesticks. In fine, he shew'd by his whole Conduct that he had some great Design working in his Head, which, as appear'd afterwards, was to oppose the King's Project with respect to the Humiliation of the Clergy; either from Self-Conviction, or from a desire to render himself the more popular. The King who had been during this in Normandy, returned to England, and suspecting what Becket had been contriving, gave him a very cold Reception. But tho' he plainly foresaw the Opposition he should meet with from that Prelate, yet he persisted in his Resolution. That he might have a good Plea for acting, he undertook in the first place to reform a very palpable Abuse, which was introduced into the Jurisdiction that the Clergy had acquir'd over their own Members. This Jurisdiction was exercis'd with so much Indulgence to the Priests or Clerks, that the most enormous Crimes were only punish'd by Degradation, and the least by some slight Censure, or short Imprisonment. A Trial of this Nature laid the Foundation of a Quarrel betwixt the King and the Archbishop. A Priest of the Diocese of Salisbury having committed a Murder, the Ecclesiastical Court only punish'd him by depriving him of his Benefice, and confining him to a Monastery. The King complain'd of the Mildness of this Sentence, as countenancing the Crime; and the Archbishop publickly defended it, in the presence of the King himself, founding his Argument on the Privileges of the Clergy. Tho' Becket thereby put the King into a very great Passion, yet he took that same opportunity to reproach him that he violated the Immunities of the Church of Canterbury, by depriving him of the Custody of the Castle of Rochester. Some Days after, he caus'd the Earl of Clare to be summon'd, to come and give him Homage for the Castle of Tunbridge, and never vouchsaf'd so much as to inform the King of his said Pretension. The Earl refus'd to do Homage, because he held the Castle of the Crown; and Becket, who according to all appearance had no good Claim to it, let the Affair drop. He afterwards gave the Curacy of Ainefford to a Priest, contrary to the Rights of the Patron. This Patron, who was one of the Barons of the Kingdom, holding his Lands immediately of the Crown, having hinder'd the Priest from putting himself in possession, the Archbishop excommunicated him; tho' it was the acknowledg'd Right of the immediate Vassals of the Crown, not to be put under Excommunication without the King's Consent.

Quarrel betwixt the King and the Abp.

BECKET's Audaciousness confirm'd the King more and more in the Resolution he had taken against the Clergy. For this purpose he call'd an Assembly of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, to whom he complain'd of the Archbishop's Insolence; after which he propos'd the Reformation of certain Abuses that were crept into the Kingdom, and to make a Regulation, of which he gave the Model. This Regulation was divided into 5 Articles, viz. 1. That no body should carry Appeals to Rome without the King's Approbation 2. That no Bishop or Archbishop should go to Rome, without having first obtain'd the King's Licence, even tho' he should be sent for thither by the Pope. 3. That no immediate Vassal of the Crown be excommunicated,

That the Affairs of the Church, which do not directly concern Religion, ſuch as thoſe relating to the Tenths, the Repairs of Churches, and other things of this Nature, be immediately carry'd to the Royal Courts. The Temporal Lords unanimouſly conſented to theſe Articles, but the Biſhops ſought to elude them, by offering this Clauſe to be inſerted in them, viz. ſaving the Rights of the Church. Yet the King having threaten'd them with his Diſpleaſure, they alſo gave their Approbation of them. Becket was the only Man that requir'd a vaſt deal of Sollicitation; but at laſt he was prevail'd on by the Inſtances of his Brethren, who fear'd the Effects of the King's Reſentment. Mean time as this Aſſembly was not very ſolemn, the King call'd the General Aſſembly of the Kingdom, or the Parliament, to meet at Clarendon, in order to get the ſame Articles confirm'd there, which were paſs'd accordingly without much oppoſition; and the Archbiſhop, after having a long while refus'd to ſign them, came as readily into it as if it had been the firſt time of Intreaty. The King not thinking this ſufficient, he had a mind to have the Articles of Clarendon confirm'd by a Bull. But the Pope, inſtead of granting the Bull which the King deſir'd of him, declar'd that thoſe Articles were prejudicial to the Church. Then Becket repented that he had given his Conſent to them, and ſuſpended himſelf, in order to puniſh himſelf for his Error, but the Pope reſtor'd him.

Aſſembly at Clarendon.

AFTER that time, the ſaid Prelate oppos'd the Execution of the five Articles with all his Power; which was the Reaſon that the King rais'd ſeveral Storms againſt him, in hopes of abating his Pride, but all was to no Purpoſe. At length this Prelate having taken ſome Steps which gave his Enemies an Advantage over him, the Court of Peers condemn'd him to Impriſonment, but he eſcap'd to Flanders in a Lay Habit. I will not enter further into the detail of this Affair, and ſhall only ſay that the Pope publickly juſtified the Archbiſhop; that the King of France gave him Protection in his Kingdom; and that this Quarrel, which had already continued ſeveral Years, was at laſt decided in 1170, by an Agreement, and a Reconciliation betwixt the King and the Archbiſhop. It began in 1163.

Becket's Sentence and Eſcape.

BECKET returning into England, after having forc'd the King to be reconcil'd with him, carry'd himſelf in a very haughty manner. He excommunicated the Archbiſhop of York, and ſome other Biſhops, beſides ſeveral Lords who had adher'd to the King's Party, which look'd as if he had a Mind to renew the Quarrel. Upon Complaints made thereof to the King, who was then in Normandy, he exclaim'd that he was very unhappy, in that having ſo many Men in his Service, there was not one that would undertake to deliver him from that Prelate. HENRY II.

Becket's Return to England.

Anno 1171. UPON this, four of his Domeſticks went to Canterbury, and murder'd the Archbiſhop in the Church, at the Foot of the Altar. His Death caus'd the King more uneaſineſs than the Quarrel had done. The Pope pretended that he was the Author of this Murder, and threaten'd to excommunicate him. Several Miracles were aſcrib'd to the Corpſe, for which he was canoniz'd not long after his Death, by the Name of St. Thomas of Canterbury. Then the People regarding him as a real Martyr, had an extraordinary Veneration for him, which quickly ſpread thro' all Chriſtendom. The King of France, who was jealous of Henry, and ſought to embroil him, did what lay in his Power to ſtir up the Pope to revenge the Death of the new Saint. At laſt Henry, what with Submiſſions, and Proteſtations that he never entertain'd a thought of the Murder of the Archbiſhop, was admitted with abundance of Difficulty to the Peace of the Church: But he was fain to repeal the Articles paſs'd at Clarendon, and to ſubmit to be whipp'd by the Monks of St. Auſtin, while he went round the Sacred Tomb.

ARTICLE III.

Of the Conquest of Ireland.

Of the Conquest of Ireland.

I HAVE already observ'd how ambitious Henry II. was, under the first Article; of which we shall now see a fresh Proof. The Crown of England, with all the rich Provinces which he possess'd in France, not being capable to satisfy his Desires, he form'd a Project betimes to conquer Ireland, and desir'd an Approbation of it from Pope Adrian IV. an Englishman, who then enjoy'd the Papal See. To obtain this with the more ease, he represented two things to him, which were very capable of making an Impression upon his Mind. 1. That if the English should conquer Ireland, it wou'd be an infallible means to bring under the Holy Church, that Island which as yet did not acknowledge its Jurisdiction. 2. That after he had conquer'd it, he would there establish St. Peter's Pence, in the same manner as it was establish'd in England. Adrian being tickled with these Advantages, sent a Letter to him, in which at the same time that he pretended to believe that Henry had nothing in View but the Glory of God in the Enterprize which he had concerted; he gave him to understand that he approv'd of his pious Design to extend the Bounds of the Church, to carry the Knowledge of Truth to the dark and ignorant parts of the World, to root Wickedness out of the Field of the Lord, and to establish Colonies of Believers in Ireland. Not but that Island had been Christian for many Ages, but it did not acknowledge the Authority of the Pope. That was the Vice which there was such a necessity of weeding, and the Submission to the Church of Rome was the Truth which was so absolutely necessary to be planted in it. Henry could not make use of the Letter at the time that he receiv'd it, by reason of the Affairs which he had in France; and 'twas not 'till 1171 that he found an opportunity for it.

Anno 1171. IRELAND being divided into seven Kingdoms, of which that of Connaught was the most considerable, the King of which Country had even a kind of Sovereignty over the rest, it happen'd that the Kings of Leinster and Meath quarrelling with each other, the latter made War upon the King of Leinster, drove him out of his Dominions, and even compell'd him to quit that Island. Dermot, which was the Name of the King of Leinster, went to Henry who was then in France, to desire his Assistance. But Henry, who was at that time embaras's'd with Becket's Affair, which was not yet determin'd, could not grant him his Request; and giving him hopes of his Assistance at a more proper time, he only permitted him to engage some English Noblemen in his Service, judging rightly that it could not but be for his Advantage to keep up the Divisions in Ireland. Dermot found two Noblemen who were willing to venture their Fortunes in his Service, upon certain Conditions; they were Robert Fitz-Stephens, and Richard Strong-Bow Earl of Pembroke, whose Progress under the Conduct of the King of Leinster was so prodigious and rapid, that they over-ran great part of the Island in a short space of Time, and even push'd their Conquests as far as Dublin. This happy Success rais'd Henry's Jealousy, who fearing that all the Island would fall a Prey to those Adventurers, and that he should afterwards find it a very hard Task to wrest it from them, recall'd them, and forbad all his Subjects to give them any Assistance. Then the latter perceiving that they should have a vast deal of Difficulty to defend themselves, if the King was against them, sent Deputies to him, and made a Treaty with him, whereby they engaged to put the maritime Places in his Hands, and to do him Homage for all that they had conquer'd in Ireland. A Pannick being spread among the Irish, Henry thought he ought not to slip so favourable a Conjuncture, to make himself Master of the Island.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

Anno 1172. WITH this View he repair'd to Waterford with a numerous Army, which the Irish had never so much as a Thought of opposing, they were already so terrify'd by the Arms of the English Adventurers. On the contrary, not long after Henry's Arrival, all the Kings of the Island went to make their Submission to him, and to pay him Homage. He afterwards went to Dublin, where he made some Regulations for the Government of his new Conquest; and having left Hugh Lacy Governour, he return'd to England in Triumph. Thus was Ireland conquer'd in a very little time, and without any considerable Effort.

Conquest of Ireland.

THERE are but two Acts in this Volume of the Fœdera, and under this Reign, which relate to Ireland; and they are,

1. A Letter from Adrian IV. † to Henry II. relating to Ireland; dated in 1154.

"THERE'S

* Also a Demand on the Popes to absolve certain Bishops and Abbots whom Becket had excommunicated.

† This was our Country-man Nicholas Breakspear of Abbots-Langley in Hertfordshire, whose Father was a Lay Brother of the Abbey of St. Albans, where he himself receiv'd Alms every Day at the Gate, and did much of their Drudgery for it —— The Condition of his approving Henry's Design to conquer Ireland was, that every House in that Island should pay St. Peter's Penny to the Apostolical See.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

Pope's Letter to Henry about Ireland. 15.

"THERE's no doubt, says the Pope in this Letter, and you your self know it, "that Ireland, as well as all the other "Islands which have the Happiness to "enjoy the Light of Christ, the Sun of "Righteousness, and have receiv'd the "Precepts of the Christian Religion, ought "to be obedient to the Jurisdiction of "St. Peter and the Holy Roman Church, "&c.

Treaty with the King of Connaught. 41.

2. A Treaty betwixt Henry II. and Roderick King of Connaught; dated at Windsor in the Octaves of St. Michael 1175.

"'TIS stipulated in this Treaty, that Ro- "derick shall continue King of Connaught, "in a dependance on the King of Eng- "land, to whom he shall pay Homage.

"THAT he shall give the Skin or Hide "of every tenth Beast kill'd in his Domi- "nions, to the King of England, those ex- "cepted which shall feed on the Lands "that Henry reserves to himself, or which "he has given to the English, wherewith "Roderick shall not meddle.

THERE is some probability either that Henry had not conquer'd the Kingdom of Connaught before the Year 1175, or that Roderick had revolted, and was at last oblig'd to make this Treaty with Henry.

ARTICLE IV.

The Rebellion of Henry II*d's Children.*

Rebellion of Henry's Children.

HENRY II. had four Sons, viz. Henry, who had marry'd Margaret of France, Daughter of Lewis the younger, and who had been crown'd; Richard, who had the Title of Earl of Poictou; Geoffery, who was Duke of Bretagne, by his Marriage with Constantia Heiress of that Duchy, and John. The three first were dissatisfy'd with the King their Father: Henry being of a very haughty Spirit, was uneasy to find himself vested with the Royal Dignity, without the power of exercising one Royal Function. Richard was Earl of Poictou, but had no Authority in that Province. Geoffery thought himself old enough to govern his Duchy of Bretagne himself, and was to the last degree provok'd, to find that the King excluded him from the Government of that Province, on pretence of his being under a Guardian, of which he thought he had no longer any need. The Discontent of these three Princes was fomented also by Eleanor their Mother, who was very uneasy to see the King her Husband drawn aside every Day by Foreign Amours. Among the King's Mistresses, there was one call'd Rosamund, whom he passionately lov'd; and because the Queen had often threaten'd her, he caus'd a sort of Labyrinth to be made at Woodstock, where he kept her shut up, in order to shelter her from the Queen's Revenge. But notwithstanding this Precaution, during the Expedition which he made in Ireland, the Queen found means to take away her Rival's Life. Afterwards the Queen foreseeing that this Act of Violence would draw a Storm upon her own Head, she endeavour'd to maintain her Ground by engaging her three eldest Sons in a Combination against the King their Father, into which also enter'd, besides a great number of English Noblemen, the Kings of France and Scotland, the Earls of Flanders, Blois, Boulogne, and several French Lords who were Henry's Vassals. The View of this Combination was to depose Henry the Father, and to place Henry the Son upon the Throne. The King suspecting nothing of what was contriving in his absence, did but just pass thro' England as he return'd from Ireland, because he was press'd to repair to Montferrand in Auvergne, in order to treat of the Marriage of Prince John, his fourth Son, with a Daughter of the Count de Maurienne.

HENRY II.

Combination against him fomented by his Wife.

Anno 1173. As soon as he arriv'd at Roan, he there receiv'd a Letter from the King of France, who not having seen his Daughter since her Infancy, desir'd him to send her to him with the young King her Husband, in order to spend some time with him at Paris. As Henry had no manner of Suspicion all this while, he consented to his Son's Voyage, but soon after recall'd him, in order to carry him along with him to Montferrand. The Son did not dare to disobey, because his Affairs were not quite ready. Besides, he wanted a Pretext for springing the Mine, and he hoped that while he stay'd with the King his Father, he should find one. Accordingly the King, in order to conclude the Marriage of Prince John, having offer'd to give him the Towns of Loudun, Chinon, and Mirabeau, young Henry strenuously oppos'd it. This Opposition being very ill grounded, the King suspected that his Son had some ill Design, and set a strict watch over him; yet this did not hinder his Son's Escape, who repair'd to the King of France. He was no sooner arriv'd at Paris, but the Queen also sent thither the two Princes Richard and Geoffery, and immediately after, the Conspiracy broke out in many places at once, particularly in Guyenne, Poictou, and Bretagne. At the same time the King of Scotland enter'd Northumberland, and the Earl of Leicester caus'd an Army which he had rais'd in France to be landed at Southampton.

or by his Generals. Humphry Bohun defeated the Earl of Leiceſter in England, and took him Priſoner. Then he marched towards the North, againſt the King of Scotland, and put his Army to the Rout. The King himſelf fell into the hands of the Engliſh, and was ſent into Normandy to be kept under a Guard there. Henry's Succeſſes in Guyenne, Poictou, Saintonge, and Bretagne, were equally fortunate. And to crown his Happineſs, an Army conſiſting of French and Flemiſh Troops, which the young King deſign'd to ſend over to England, was detain'd ſo long at Gravelin by contrary Winds, that it was of no ſervice. This Delay gave the King time to paſs over to England himſelf, where he reduc'd the reſt of the Towns that had rebell'd againſt him.

A Succeſs ſo contrary to what the Allies expected, oblig'd the King of France to make Propoſals of Peace. Richard, who was of a fiery reſtleſs Temper, oppos'd it with all his Might, but his Brothers and the King of France not thinking it fit to continue the War for his ſake, the Peace was concluded, and Henry's Sons went and caſt themſelves at his Feet for a Pardon. During this Negotiation, a Marriage was concluded betwixt Richard and Alice, Daughter to the King of France, which Princeſs being very young, was put into Henry's hands for her Education till the Marriage cou'd be conſummated.

He entered Northumberland at the head of an Army, and ravag'd that County, while the Earl of Leicester acted for the young King in the South. But Humphry Bohun having settled a Truce with him, made good use of that time to go and fight the Earl of Leicester, after which he march'd without delay towards the North, cut the King of Scotland's Army in pieces, and took the King himself Prisoner.

Anno 1173. THE Scots pretend that the English General attack'd the King of Scotland before the Expiration of the Truce; but be this so or not, the captive King was sent into Normandy to be kept there. Before the War was over, William being impatient to the last degree for his Liberty, made a particular Treaty with Henry, whereby he engag'd himself not only to restore all that he had taken in England, but also to do Homage to Henry for the entire Kingdom of Scotland; and upon his swearing a solemn Oath to execute the Treaty, he was releas'd. Afterwards, when Henry made Peace with his Children, it was agreed that all the Prisoners should be set at liberty, except those who had already made their Agreement. So that William cou'd not reap any Advantage from this Treaty.

ARTICLE VI.

Affairs of Henry II. with France.

Anno 1159. I have already said, that Alice the Daughter of Lewis the younger was left with Henry, to be educated till she was of Age to consummate the Marriage which was agreed upon in the Treaty made at Paris. Part of her Portion consisted in the City of Gisors, which Lewis put into the hands of the Knights-Templars, in order to be deliver'd to Henry upon the Celebration of the Marriage.

K. Henry the younger's Marriage, the Cause of a short War, with France.

Anno 1161. HENRY having the Princess in his own hands, caused the Marriage to be celebrated two Years after, tho' she was but five Years of Age, and the Bridegroom but seven, and the Templars deliver'd up Gisors to him. This precipitant Step was the Cause of a War betwixt the two Kings, which was but of a short continuance, being determined by the Mediation of Pope Alexander III.

FROM that time, those two Monarchs were never good Friends, and upon all occasions Lewis endeavour'd to oppose Henry's Aggrandizement. Henry's Enterprize against Tholouse produc'd a new War, which ended by a Treaty, wherein that of Paris was confirmed, and no mention made of the Affair of Tholouse. Consequently, Henry reserv'd his Pretensions to that County.

Enterprize against Tholouse, the Cause of another.

IN the Quarrel betwixt Henry and Becket, Lewis shew'd a world of Zeal to give him trouble, by stirring up the Pope against him. Otherwise Henry wou'd no doubt have come off much better.

Lewis's Hatred of Henry.

THE Conspiracy of Henry's Children against their Father was another Cause of War betwixt the two Monarchs. Upon this occasion, Lewis discover'd a great deal of Animosity against Henry. He not only assisted the Son against the Father, but as if he had really thought that those Measures [illegible] he [illegible] no longer any Hopes of Reconciliation between Henry the Son, and his Father

BUT as I have ſaid, the Scheme for dethroning this Prince miſcarried, and Henry came off with Honour, in an Affair where he was like to have met with his Ruin.

Becket's Tomb viſited by the French King.

Anno 1177. A few Years after, Lewis went in Pilgrimage to Canterbury, to beg of God, thro' the Interceſſion of the new Saint Thomas, the Cure of his Son Philip, who was attack'd with a dangerous Diſtemper. Henry went to receive him at Dover, and conducted him to the ſacred Tomb, where they paid their Devotions together, and Lewis gave a very rich Jewel for the Saint's Shrine. It was on this occaſion probably, that the two Monarchs agreed together to make an Expedition into the Holy Land. But Lewis died ſoon after, in 1180. and Philip his Son, who was afterwards ſurnam'd Auguſtus, ſucceeded him.

IN order to have a right Underſtanding of the laſt Affair in which Henry II. was concern'd with France, the Reader ſhould be acquainted with the State of the Court of England, after Philip Auguſtus aſcended the Throne of France. Upon the firſt Intelligence which Henry had of the Conſpiracy I mention'd in the fourth Article, he caus'd his Wife Queen Eleanor to be clapp'd in Priſon, where ſhe was kept 'till the King's Death. Henry the younger was ſtill uneaſy, tho' he was reconcil'd to the King his Father in outward Appearance. Richard deſir'd that he might have permiſſion to conſummate his Marriage with Alice of France, in order to have a Pretence for Complaint, becauſe he well knew that the King his Father, who was in love with that young Princeſs, would never conſent to it. There was cauſe even to ſuſpect that he held a criminal Correſpondence with her. Geoffery was as much diſſatisfy'd as they. He had attain'd to the 24th Year of his Age, and yet the King was unwilling to truſt him with the Adminiſtration of Bretagne. The Diſcontent of theſe three Princes was heightened by the fond Affection which their Father ſhew'd to Prince John, who was the youngeſt of all. In order to free himſelf from the Dangers to which the reſtleſs Temper of his Children might expoſe him, Henry endeavour'd to create a Difference betwixt them, and had in a manner carried his Point; but as at laſt they perceiv'd his Artifice, they concerted Meaſures together to ſupport one another. And the young King actually hatch'd Conſpiracies, which might have prov'd fatal to the King his Father, if Death, which carry'd him off in 1183, in the 28th Year of his Age, had not blaſted his Deſigns.

RICHARD being become preſumptive Succeſſor by the Death of his elder Brother, who had left no Heirs, was impatient to be crown'd, as his Brother had been before him. But he was of too turbulent a Temper for the King to run the riſque of ſeeing him tread in his Brother's Footſteps. HENRY II.

Anno 1185. NOTWITHSTANDING this, Richard try'd to reſcue himſelf from a Dependence on the King his Father, by making himſelf Maſter of Guienne; but failing in the Attempt, he was oblig'd to ſubmit.

Anno 1186. GEOFFERY his Brother died ſome time after, leaving a Daughter nam'd Eleanor, and Conſtantia his Wife big with a Son, who was named Arthur. His Death occaſion'd ſome Diſturbance in Bretagne. Henry aim'd to have the Guardianſhip of his Son's Children, but the States adjudg'd it to Conſtantia their Mother, on condition that ſhe would do nothing of Importance without the King's Advice. Geoffery's Death.

ARTICLE VII.

Of Richard's Rebellion.

PHILIP Auguſtus conceiv'd a Project from the very beginning of his Reign, to reunite the Provinces which the Kings of England poſſeſs'd, to the Crown of France; and he never abandon'd it 'till he had very near brought it to paſs, in the Reign of King John: which was the true cauſe of the Wars between France and England, during the whole Courſe of this Prince's Reign. He began to manifeſt his Deſigns early. Richard's Rebellion.

Anno 1186. AS ſoon as he ſaw the beginning of the Quarrel betwixt Richard and the King his Father, he thought that it might prove to his advantage; and with this View he attack'd Richard, to whom the King his Father at length yielded Poictou. But the Father and the Son uniting together for their common Defence, Philip, who had not concerted his Meaſures well, conſented to a Truce of two Years.

THIS firſt Enterprize not having anſwer'd his Hopes, he judg'd, that in order to renew the War with advantage, it was his Intereſt to encreaſe the Difference betwixt Henry and his Son. Animated by Philip of France.

Anno 1187. FOR this purpoſe, having found a Method to draw Richard to Paris, he careſs'd him to ſuch a degree, that he lay with him in the ſame Bed, and this Prince eſteem'd him as the beſt Friend he had. Henry, who was informed of this ſtrict Union, was afraid what would be the Conſequences of it, and choſe to recall his Son home. But Richard refus'd to obey, complaining that he was not permitted to conſummate his Marriage with Alice, and pretending to believe that the King only recall'd him to clap him up in a Priſon, in order to let his Crown go to John his younger Brother. Thoſe were the Pretences which Philip ſuggeſted to him, in order to foment the Miſunderſtanding. But Henry finding an Opportunity to come at the Speech of his Son by a ſecret Emiſſary, Richard goes to France.

Richard

Returns home.

Richard quitted the Court of France on a ſudden, and went home.

As ſoon as the Truce was expir'd, the two Kings took Arms again. But the War was ſuſpended by the News which arriv'd in Europe, that the Sultan Saladin had made himſelf Maſter of Jeruſalem. For this reaſon the two Monarchs reſolv'd to drop their private Quarrel, in order to go together to the Aſſiſtance of the Chriſtians of Paleſtine. Richard took the Croſs with them, and ſolemnly engag'd to accompany them in the Voyage.

Reſolution of the Kings of England and France to go to the Holy Land.

Anno 1188. THE Preparations which were made for this Expedition were interrupted by a Quarrel that fell out betwixt Richard and the Count de Tholouſe; which, tho' about a meer Trifle, was carry'd ſo far, that Richard undertook to revive the Pretenſions of the Queen his Mother to the County of Tholouſe, and ſeiz'd Moiſſac, with ſome other Places. The Count de Tholouſe begg'd Aſſiſtance from France, and Philip making as if he believ'd that Henry was the real Author of this War, made an Incurſion into Berry, and ſeiz'd Iſſoudon.

Another War with France.

THE War being thus kindled again, and proſecuted on both ſides with a great deal of Vigour, Henry was terribly ſurpris'd to hear that Richard was gone to throw himſelf into the Arms of Philip. As ſoon as this Prince arriv'd at Paris, he renew'd his former Complaints, pretending as if he believ'd that the King his Father intended to give Alice to John, and to leave the Crown to him. But this was not all; Richard before he ſet out had debauch'd the Affections of almoſt all the Subjects of France to ſuch a degree, that the Father was in no condition to continue the War.

Anno 1189. HENRY did every thing in his power to obtain a Peace from Philip, but the more he ſeem'd to deſire it, the more averſe was Philip to it. The latter demanded that Richard ſhould be crown'd, and that the Bride ſhould be deliver'd to him for conſummating the Marriage. But Henry had ſtrong Reaſons to reject thoſe Conditions; to which Philip afterwards added another, by demanding that Prince John ſhould make a Voyage to the Holy Land, leſt he ſhould ſupplant his elder Brother, if the King their Father ſhould happen to die in the Voyage. This new Condition being likewiſe rejected, the War was continued; and Henry being abandon'd by all his Subjects in France, was always beaten. At length, after having in vain employ'd the Pope's Mediation for obtaining a Peace, he was forc'd to ſubmit to all the Conditions which Philip was pleas'd to impoſe upon him, for putting an end to a War which could not but be fatal to him. He diſcover'd not long after, that John his well-beloved Son was enter'd into his Brother's Conſpiracies; which griev'd him to ſuch a degree, that he fell ſick, and died at Chinon, Anno 1189, after having reign'd 34 Years.

Acceſſion of K. Richard I.

THE Expedition of Richard I. to the Holy Land, with its Dependences and Conſequences, being the chief Subject of his Reign; this Abridgment of it will therefore conſiſt of but one Article.

RICHARD I.

Homage to the King of France.

Anno 1189. THO' Richard had expreſs'd a great deal of Impatience to conſummate his Marriage with Alice of France, he dropp'd all Thoughts of it as ſoon as it was in his own power to make himſelf eaſy. On the other hand, he diſcover'd no Uneaſineſs with reſpect to his Brother John Earl of Morton, tho' he made a handle of thoſe two Articles to rebel againſt the King his Father. He went firſt, and paid Homage to the King of France. Then he caus'd himſelf to be crown'd Duke of Normandy at Roan, and did not go over to England 'till a Month after Henry's Death. Not many days after his Coronation at London, he receiv'd a Letter from Philip, ſummoning him to make good his Engagements with reſpect to the Expedition to the Holy Land; to which he had the leſs need of being ſollicited, becauſe he was reſolutely bent upon it. He made vaſt Preparations, and employ'd ſeveral Methods to raiſe Money for it, which were not all of them very regular. Among others, he accepted of 10,000 Marks, which were offer'd him on the part of the King of Scotland; in conſideration whereof, he reſtor'd the Places of Security to him, which had been put into the hands of Henry II. and parted with the Sovereignty which the Crown of England had acquir'd over the Kingdom of Scotland. His Brother the Earl of Morton having expreſs'd his Diſinclination to make a Voyage to the Holy Land, he thought fit to ſecure his Fidelity by heaping Favours on him. He gave him ſix conſiderable Counties in England, and concluded a Marriage betwixt him and Avis the Heireſs of Glouceſter; tho' the Archbiſhop of Canterbury oppos'd it, becauſe the Parties were too near a-kin.

Voyage to England.

His Preparations for the Expedition to the Holy Land.

His Favours to the Earl of Morton, and the latter's Marriage.

Anno 1190. AS ſoon as Richard was ready, he ſet out with his Army for France, leaving for Regent in England his Favourite Longchamp, a Man of obſcure Birth, and a Norman, whom he had promoted to the Dignity of Chancellor, Biſhop of Ely, and Legate from the Pope. And by inveſting him likewiſe in the Regency, he render'd his Power abſolute both in Church and State. Indeed he gave him for his Adjunct or Aſſociate the Biſhop of Durham, who had bought the Regency of him, or rather the Title of Regent; for Longchamp did not permit him to meddle with the Affairs of Government. The two Kings of France and England met at Vezelay in the Nivernois; from whence, after having renew'd their Alliance, and made ſome Regulations for the Voyage, they march'd together to Lyons, where they ſeparated, Philip taking the Rout of Genoa, and Richard going directly to Marſeilles, whither he had ordered his Fleet. But when he came thither, he found that it was not yet arriv'd; which made him reſolve to hire ſome Ships for his ſpeedy Paſſage to Meſſina, where the Croiſes were to have their general Rendezvous. His Fleet having join'd him at the mouth of the Tyber, he continued his Voyage to Meſſina, where the King of France was already arriv'd. The two Monarchs ſpent the Winter in Sicily, during which ſome things happen'd there, which 'tis neceſſary briefly to mention.

His Voyage to France.

To Sicily.

ROGER, King of Sicily, had left two Lawful Children, viz. William and Conſtantia, and a Baſtard named Tancred. William, who was ſurnam'd the Bad, ſucceeded the King his Father, and Conſtantia was a Nun at Palermo. To William the Bad ſucceeded William the Good, his Son, who marry'd Joan the Daughter of Henry II. and Siſter of Richard. William the Good dying without Iſſue, Pope Clement III. pretended to the Right of diſpoſing of the Kingdom of Sicily, becauſe it was a Fief of the Church; but Tancred having caus'd himſelf to be elected by the People, took poſſeſſion of the Throne. Celeſtin III. Clement's Succeſſor had the ſame Pretenſions as his Predeceſſor; and in order to wreſt the Crown from Tancred, he gave the Kingdom of Sicily to the Emperor Henry VI. of the Houſe of Suabia, and caus'd him to marry Conſtantia, King Roger's Daughter, who was 50 Years of Age, after having order'd that Princeſs to be taken out of a Nunnery at Palermo. Of this Marriage a Son was born two Years after, nam'd Frederick, notwithſtanding the Age of Conſtantia, who for preventing all manner of ſuſpicion wou'd be deliver'd in publick. As Joan the Queen Dowager of Sicily, and the Siſter of Richard, had ſtickled too much in favour of the Pope, Tancred had confin'd her in Priſon; but at Richard's Approach he ſet her at liberty.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

RICHARD arriving in Sicily, and being encamp'd near Meſſina, ſent to Tancred, who reſided at Palermo, for the Jointure which had been ſettled on the Queen his Siſter, by the King her Husband, and for a Legacy which that ſame King had bequeath'd to Henry II. his Father-in-Law. But Tancred endeavouring to amuſe him by Delays, he ſeiz'd a Caſtle and a Monaſtery near his Camp, which he fortify'd, and furniſh'd with Ammunition. This Action made Tancred believe that Richard, under pretence of going to the Holy Land, was only come into Sicily at the Pope's Sollicitation, to take away his Crown from him. Conſequently fearing that he had a Deſign to make himſelf Maſter of Meſſina, he contrived it ſo, that the Engliſh who went every day to the Town upon their Affairs, were all turn'd out by the Inhabitants. Richard being provok'd at this Affront, demanded Satisfaction; and after having waited for it a great while to no purpoſe, he caus'd the Walls to be ſcal'd on a ſudden, and made himſelf Maſter of the Town. As ſoon as he enter'd it, he caus'd his Colours to be pitch'd in all the Quarters of the City, not excepting thoſe that were mark'd out for the French, as had been alſo done for the Engliſh, for the ſake of preventing Diſorder. Philip complain'd of this ſort of Affront, and the two Kings wou'd perhaps have come to a Rupture, if Richard had not at laſt ſuffer'd himſelf to be prevail'd on to cauſe his Colours to be taken away, and to give Philip ſome Satisfaction. The Surprize of Meſſina having convinc'd Tancred that it was not ſafe for him to diſoblige Richard, he repair'd to him at Meſſina, and made a Treaty with him to ſatisfy him on his Pretenſions.

His Treaty with King Tancred.

Anno 1191. AFTERWARDS Tancred created ſuch a Difference betwixt the two Monarchs, by ſhewing certain Letters to Richard written by the Duke of Burgundy, and which perhaps were forg'd, that from that time they never ceas'd almoſt to vex each other. Philip ſent word to Richard, that he cou'd not but look on him as an Enemy if he did not conſummate his Marriage with the Princeſs his Siſter. Richard anſwer'd, that he would not marry a Princeſs who had had a Child by the King his Father; and he offer'd to prove it by Witneſſes, then actually in Sicily. This Anſwer oblig'd Philip to recede from his Demand, and even to conſent that Richard ſhould marry elſewhere. But Richard had already done it without that Permiſſion, by concluding a Marriage with the Princeſs Berenquelle or Berengeria of Navarre, who was to come to meet him in Sicily, in order to conſummate it. Finally, the two Kings were reconcil'd to outward Appearance, but from that time they were never hearty Friends. Philip ſet out firſt from Meſſina, and repair'd to the Siege of Acre or Ptolemais, which the Chriſtians had form'd for ſome time paſt.

Philip's Voyage to the Siege of Acre.

RICHARD did not ſet out 'till after the Arrival of his Mother Queen Eleanor, who brought the Princeſs of Navarre to him; and having left her with him, return'd to England. Richard was ſo much importun'd to ſet forward, that he ſail'd before he had conſummated his Marriage, taking with him his Siſter the Queen of Sicily, and his Bride Berenquelle. When he was arriv'd near to the Iſle of Cyprus, a violent Storm diſpers'd his Fleet; and ſome of his Ships being drove upon that Iſland, were plunder'd by order of Iſaac Comnenius, who from being Governor of Cyprus aſſum'd the Sovereignty of it, and the Title of Emperor. Richard took a Revenge for this Outrage, by making himſelf Maſter of the Iſle of Cyprus, to the great Satisfaction of the Inhabitants, that were quite tir'd with the Oppreſſion of Comnenius, who alſo fell into the hands of the Engliſh. After this Expedition Richard ſet ſail again, and came before Acre, the Siege of which was puſh'd with freſh Vigour, ſo that the Place ſurrender'd by Capitulation. During this Siege, Leopold Duke of Auſtria having made himſelf Maſter of a Tower, planted his Colours on it; which Richard interpreting as an Inſult, ſent Men thither, who took away the Colours and trampled them under their feet: which Affront was ſeverely reveng'd afterwards *.

Richard's Voyage.

He takes Cyprus.

Proceeds to Acre, which ſurrenders.

AFTER the taking of Acre, the Animoſities between the two Kings broke out again, thro' the extreme Jealouſy which they conceiv'd of each other. They were come to conquer the Kingdom of Jeruſalem; but Philip wou'd have the Conqueſt made for Conrad Marquiſs of Montferrat, and Richard for Guy of Luſignan; each of thoſe Princes having Pretenſions to this Kingdom, which was in the hands of Saladin. Theſe Differences protracted the Deliberations for carrying on the War. After this, the two Kings were ſeiz'd both with one ſort of Diſtemper, which made their Hair fall off; and it was with great difficulty that they got a Cure.

The Miſunderſtanding and Sickneſs of the two Kings.

Anno 1192. AT laſt, Philip had a mind to return to France; and as the two Monarchs archs had engag'd not to forſake each other, it was with very great difficulty that he obtain'd Richard's Conſent. He left 10,000 Men in Paleſtine, under command of the Duke of Burgundy, whom he publickly order'd to pay the ſame Obedience to the King of England as to himſelf; but 'tis pretended that the Duke had a ſecret Order to thwart him.

PHILIP being gone, Richard march'd with the Army of the Croiſes to beſiege Jeruſalem; but he was firſt of all oblig'd to ſeize the Maritime Towns of Jaffa, Aſcalon and Cæſarea, otherwiſe he could not poſſibly have ſucceeded in that Siege. While he was on the March to thoſe Towns, he met the Sultan Saladin, who ſtay'd for him in an advantageous Poſt, with an Army far ſuperior in number to that of the Chriſtians. As the Croiſes cou'd not approach Jeruſalem without falling foul of this Army, Richard reſolv'd to attack it; which he did with ſo much Valour and Succeſs, that he entirely routed it. This Overthrow put Saladin under a Neceſſity of abandoning the Maritime Towns juſt mention'd, after having raz'd the Walls thereof. But as thoſe Towns were abſolutely neceſſary for ſubſiſting the Army of the Croiſes during the Siege of Jeruſalem, Richard ſtopp'd a while at Jaffa to give time for their Repair. This done, he advanc'd towards Jeruſalem, and had the good luck on his march to meet a great and rich Caravan, which he ſeiz'd, and made the whole Army ſhare the Booty. At length, he arriv'd upon a Hill, from whence he had the Satisfaction to ſee the City of Jeruſalem. But as all the neighbouring Country was deſtitute of Forage, he was oblig'd to defer the Siege 'till the following Spring. During this, the Duke of Burgundy quitted the Army of the Croiſes with his French Troops, in order to return to Europe; but he died at Acre as his Troops were embarking. On the other hand, the Marquiſs of Montferrat, who commanded a Body of Italian Troops, gave Richard to underſtand that he did not intend to contribute to the Conqueſt of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, which, tho' it lawfully belong'd to him, was deſign'd for his Competitor Guy of Luſignan. The Duke of Auſtria retir'd alſo, very much diſguſted for the Affront he had receiv'd from Richard at the Siege of Acre. Theſe Diſappointments oblig'd Richard to lay aſide his Deſign of beſieging Jeruſalem, and to make a Truce of three Years with Saladin; after which he reſolv'd to return to Europe. Before he ſet out, he caus'd the chief Men of the Army to aſſemble for the Choice of a General to command the Troops that were to ſtay in Paleſtine. The Choice fell upon the Marquiſs of Montferrat; but this Prince being aſſaſſinated not long after, by order of Vetus de Monte, who was a famous Man for ſuch Exploits, Richard caus'd Henry Count of Champagne to be elected, and to marry the Marquiſs's Widow, who brought him for her Portion the titular Crown of Jeruſalem. Mean time, as Richard had enter'd into Engagements with Guy of Luſignan, he rewarded him by the Grant of the Iſle of Cyprus, which he had ſold to the Knights Templars, but took away from them becauſe they tyranniz'd over the Inhabitants.

RICHARD I.

RICHARD having nothing more to do in that Country, went and embark'd at Acre. When he was arriv'd near the Iſle of Corfu, he was drove by a Tempeſt to the bottom of the Gulph of Venice, where he ſuffer'd Shipwreck juſt by Aquileia, his Galliot being daſh'd againſt a Rock. However, he had the good fortune to come ſafe to Land; but being got into the Dominions of the Duke of Auſtria, he was known there, and purſued ſo cloſely, that ſeveral Perſons of his Retinue were immediately carried off. At laſt, as he endeavour'd to deceive his Purſuers, he arriv'd at a Village near Vienna, where he was arreſted, and deliver'd up by the Duke of Auſtria to the Emperor who demanded him. It wou'd be too tedious to enter here into the Detail of all the Hardſhips which the Emperor put upon his Priſoner.

Anno 1193. IT ſhall ſuffice to ſay in a few words, that he kept him 15 Months in Priſon, and caus'd him to be remov'd to Haguenau, where the Dyet of the Empire was aſſembled, and where, as if the German Princes had been his legal Judges, he accus'd him of ſeveral Crimes contained in ſix Articles. 1. He ſaid that Richard had made an Alliance with Tancred, to maintain that Uſurper upon the Throne of Sicily. 2. He accus'd him of having ſought Opportunities to embroil himſelf with the King of France, in order to hinder the Conqueſt of Jeruſalem. 3. Of having unjuſtly turn'd a Chriſtian Prince out of the Kingdom of Cyprus. 4. Of having put a cruel Affront upon the Duke of Auſtria during the Siege of Ptolemais. 5. Of having caus'd the Marquiſs of Montferrat to be aſſaſſinated. 6. Of having betrayed the Intereſts of the Chriſtians, by making a Truce with Saladin. Richard, without acknowledging the competent Authority of the Judges, defended himſelf againſt thoſe Accuſations, in a manner with which the Princes of the Dyet were ſatisfy'd. Nevertheleſs he cou'd not obtain his Liberty, without engaging to pay a Ranſom of 150,000 Marks of Silver, viz. 100,000 in ready Caſh, and to give ſecurity for the reſt. Moreover, he promis'd to give Eleanor of Bretagne, his Niece, in Marriage to the Duke of Auſtria's eldeſt Son. To make him ſome ſort of Amends, the Emperor made him a Preſent of the Kingdom of Arles, and intended to crown him in that Quality, tho' the Pretenſions of the Emperors to that ancient Kingdom had been for a long time ſuperannuated. At laſt Richard return'd to England after near 4 Years abſence, of which he had paſs'd 15 Months in Priſon. We muſt now juſt make mention of what pass'd in England during his absence.

Character of Longchamp.

I have already said, that when Richard set out from England, he left the Regency of the Kingdom to Longchamp, who was at the same time Chancellor, Bishop of Ely, and the Pope's Legate. This Man behav'd with so much Haughtiness and Pride in his Administration, that the Counsellors appointed by the King to assist him, were oblig'd to complain to Prince John Earl of Morton, and to put themselves under his Protection. John made an advantageous use of this Opportunity to introduce himself into the Government, of which the King his Brother had not left him any share; and uniting with the Barons, he drove Longchamp out of the Kingdom. Then he took several Steps to secure the Crown to himself, in case the King shou'd happen to die in his Voyage. He thought this a necessary Precaution, because of the just Pretensions which might be form'd by young Arthur Duke of Bretagne, Son to his elder Brother Geoffery.

He is expell'd the Kingdom.

THE News of Richard's Imprisonment no sooner arriv'd in England, than John discover'd a strong desire to rob him of the Crown. But by the Care of their Mother Eleanor, there was an Association among the Barons to maintain the King's Rights. For this reason, John after several vain Efforts to seduce the English Nobility, made an Alliance with Philip Augustus, who was as impatient as himself to embrace this Opportunity to seize the Provinces which the English possess'd in France. He even laid siege to Roan, but was forc'd to raise it. These two Confederate Princes did every thing they cou'd to hinder Richard's being set at liberty. They offer'd the Emperor Sums of Money, which were so tempting to that covetous Prince, that tho' he had given his Promise, and made a Treaty with Richard, he was inclinable to retract it. But the Princes of Germany having convinc'd him that it wou'd not be safe for him to violate a Promise, of which they were Guarantees, he did not dare to retain his Prisoner *.

Prince John's Alliance with Philip of France.

Sentence pass'd on him, and his Pardon.

Anno 1194. AS soon as Richard was in England, he caus'd a Sentence to be pass'd against his Brother, confiscating all his Estate, and declaring him incapable to succeed to the Crown; but afterwards he pardon'd him.

War and Truce with France.

Anno 1195. MEAN time Richard burning with Rage to be reveng'd on Philip, made great Preparations to carry the War into France; but was prevented by his Enemy who besieg'd Vernueil, of which nevertheless he cou'd not make himself Master. This War, which continued three or four Years with various Success, the Particulars of which wou'd be very unnecessary here, was interrupted by a Truce of five Years †.

RICHARD I.

Anno 1199. RICHARD hearing some time after, that a Gentleman of Limousin had found Treasure hid in his Estate, demanded that Treasure, pretending that it belong'd to him as Sovereign of that Country, which was a Dependency on Guyenne. The Gentleman being loth to part with it, took Refuge in the Castle of Chaluz, belonging to the Viscount of Limoges, whither Richard march'd to besiege him. While he went round the Place to take a View of it, he was wounded in the Shoulder by an Arrow from a Cross-bow, of which in a few days after he died. He had made a Will in Sicily in favour of Arthur Duke of Bretagne his Nephew; but he made another before his Death, in which he appointed Prince John his Brother to be his Heir.

'Tis observable, that in this Treaty (p. 94. of the first Tome of the Fœdera) the Earl talks no longer in the humble Phrase of a Vassal of the King of France, as he did formerly, of which the French Historians, who have wrote about this Treaty, give an account.

'Tis also observable, that Pope Innocent III. labour'd to bring the Kings of England and France to an Accommodation, as appears by Letters which he wrote with that View in 1198, and which are mention'd in p. 98, and 100, of the Fœdera, Tome I.

The REIGN of JOHN,

Surnamed Lackland.

John.

K. John's Acceſſion and Title.

Tho' Richard had appointed John his Brother Heir to all his Dominions, yet John's Right was not indiſputable. His Nephew Arthur Duke of Bretagne, Son to Geoffry his elder Brother, did not want plauſible Reaſons to diſpute his Title, not only to the Crown of England, but to the Provinces of France which were in Richard's Inheritance. As for England, there had been no Law, nor Regulation, nor Cuſtom, nor Precedent ſince the Conqueſt that cou'd eſtabliſh a Limitation of the Succeſſion of the Crown, as I have already ſhewn. By conſequence, the Rights both of John and Arthur were equally liable to embarraſſing Objections, and and might be equally ſupported by powerful Arguments. As to the Provinces of France, viz. Normandy, Guyenne, Poictou, Saintonge, Touraine, Anjou, and Maine; 'tis very probable that the Right of Succeſſion to them was better ſettled than that to England: but as they were Fiefs of the Crown of France, 'tis apparent that Philip Auguſtus as Sovereign, would claim a Right to decide the Queſtion between the two Competitors, and that he would regulate himſelf rather by Intereſt than Juſtice. Were this Cauſe to have been decided regularly in a Court of Juſtice, with all the Forms of Proceeding, the Judges wou'd no doubt have found great difficulties in it. But John not thinking it fit to commit his Rights to a Trial of this nature, choſe rather to take another Courſe. This Prince being in France at the time that his Brother Richard died, immediately ſent over to England, Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and William Marſhall, (afterwards Earl of Pembroke) who were then with him, to diſpoſe the minds of the Engliſh in his favour. Thoſe two Noblemen, who were devoted to his Service, being aſſiſted by the Credit of Queen Eleanor, who declar'd for John, labour'd with ſo much Zeal to gain the Magiſtrates and the common People, that after vaſt difficulty they ſucceeded in what they had undertaken; not by promoting a Determination of the matter in queſtion between John and Arthur, by a Decree of the States, or of the Parliament, but by gaining over all thoſe Nobles, one after another, who were in a Capacity of oppoſing John's Advancement to the Throne; which was the ſame Method that William Rufus, Henry I. and Stephen took to ſucceed in their Deſigns.

The Meaſures he took to ſecure the Crown.

The Zeal of his Friends to ſerve him.

He ſeizes the late King's Treaſure.

WHILE John's Friends did him good Service in England, he labour'd on his own part to ſecure himſelf of the Poſſeſſion of thoſe Provinces of France which were part of the Inheritance of Richard. The firſt Step he took for this purpoſe, was to gain Robert of Turnham, who deliver'd up to him the late King's Treaſures, which he had in his keeping, together with the two important Cities of Chinon, and Saumur, of which he was Governour: but this was not enough. The Governour of Angers had already deliver'd up that Place to the Duke of Bretagne; the Lords of Poictou, Touraine, Anjou and Maine, were all diſpos'd to recognize this young Prince for their Sovereign; and it was highly probable, that Philip wou'd alſo favour him, becauſe it cou'd not but be for the Advantage of France that thoſe Provinces ſhou'd be ſeparated from the Crown of England. John not being able to provide for every thing at once, apply'd to that which was moſt preſſing; namely, to get himſelf recogniz'd in Normandy, the Inhabitants of which Province were ſtill uncertain which ſide to eſpouſe. Therefore he made uſe of the Treaſure that was in his power, to gain over the principal Norman Lords; and at the ſame time rais'd an Army, amd went and beſieged Mans, which had declar'd for Arthur. As ſoon as he had made himſelf Maſter of that City, he cauſed the Walls of it to be demoliſh'd, and treated the Inhabitants with very great Severity. This Inſtance effectually determined the Normans, who fearing the like Fate, recogniz'd John for their Duke without farther delay, and crown'd him at Roan. This done, he haſtened over to England, where every thing was in a readineſs for his Reception: And in a few days he was crowned, after the Archbiſhop of Canterbury had made a Speech to the Aſſembly, in which he gave them to underſtand that John came to the Crown only by Election; and that becauſe he was of the Royal Race, he had been thought a fit Perſon to bear rule over the Engliſh. No doubt the Reaſon of that Prelate's expreſſing himſelf after this manner, was to poſtpone the Debate about John's Right and Title, which was too uncertain to be a ſolid Foundation for his Advancement to the Throne.

ABp of Canterbury's Remark on it.

JOHN made but a ſhort ſtay in England after he was crown'd, becauſe he was preſs'd to return to France, where Philip had broke the Truce of five Years, which he had made with Richard. Conſtantia, the Mother of Arthur, had already delivered up to him all the Places which were in her power to diſpoſe of, and had put herſelf, together with the Prince her Son, under his protection, and in his power. Conſequently, on pretence of acting for Arthur, Philip had taken up Arms again, and ſeiz'd on Evreux, and the whole Province of Maine. John arriving at Roan, rais'd an Army there, which ſoon became very numerous by the Troops that were brought to join him from all parts. But Philip made him loſe time, which was very precious to him, by demanding a Truce for only 50 Days, which was eaſily granted to him; John having a Notion that the Terror of his Arms had reduc'd his Enemies to take this Step, and that he wou'd ſhortly beg Peace of him. Mean time he ſuffer'd his Army, which conſiſted chiefly of Voluntiers, to diſperſe. But inſtead of the Peace which he expected, Philip in an Interview he had with him, demanded for Arthur all the Provinces of France which Richard had poſſeſs'd, and for which he had already received Homage from that young Prince. And this Demand being rejected, the War broke out again immediately.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

Death of the King's Sister.

AT the same time Joan, Queen Dowager of Sicily, who had the Count de Tholouse for her second Husband, died at Roan, whither she went to see the King her Brother. While John was taken up with his Sister's Funeral, Philip made a Progress in Anjou, and seiz'd those Places which had declar'd for John; but upon some Disgust which he gave to the Duke of Bretagne's Governour, this young Prince, with the Duchess his Mother, and his Governour, went and threw himself into the Arms of the King his Uncle. This unforeseen Stroke was enough to have broke the Measures of the King of France; but in a little time after, the Duchess had Suspicions of John, which engag'd her to go back with her Son to Philip. Notwithstanding all this, John's Affairs were in a happy Situation. He had made an Alliance with the Emperor Otho his Nephew, and with the Earl of Flanders; and at the same time Guyenne declar'd for him: For which Reason Philip, who was on the other hand much press'd, sued for a Peace, which was concluded to John's Advantage, to whom Philip sacrific'd the Interests of the Duke of Bretagne, by engaging to give that Prince no Assistance. In order to bring Philip to this Agreement, John promis'd to yield Auvergne and Berry, for a certain time, to Prince Lewis his Son, and to give a Dowry of 20000 Marks with his Niece Blanche of Castile, whom that Prince was to marry. Arthur being thus abandon'd by his Protector, was no longer in a Condition to oppose the King his Uncle, who put himself in possession of all Richard's Estate, and only left him Bretagne. The Marriage of Lewis with Blanche was celebrated not long after at Roan.

Constance and Arthur return to Philip.

Good State of John's Affairs.

His Treaty with France.

Prince Lewis of France marry'd to John's Niece.

WHILE John was making these Acquisitions, he fell in Love with Isabel of Angoulesme, who had been contracted per verba de presenti, to Hugh le Brun Earl of March. His Passion was so violent, that whatever it cost him he would marry her; tho' in order to bring it about, there was a necessity of dissolving Isabel's Contract, and his own with Avisa of Gloucester. But the Favour and Authority of the Pope surmounted all Obstacles that oppos'd his Happiness.

John's Divorce and Marriage.

EVERY thing having succeeded to him according to his Wishes, he return'd to England where he assembled a Parliament, of which he desir'd a Sum of Money to pay the Dowry he had promis'd to his Niece, Blanche of Castile. This seem'd a very extraordinary Demand, because no body cou'd conceive what Business England had to pay the Dowry of a Spanish Princess, in Marriage with a Prince of France. But the King gave plain Intimation that he wou'd not be deny'd; and, as it was the first Subsidy he had desir'd, the Parliament granted it, tho' in such a way as shew'd they did it with Reluctance. Mean time, the King having made the Parliament truckle upon this Occasion, became more haughty afterwards. 'Tis even said that he began from that Instant to aim at making himself absolute, and that the great Men being aware that he had such a View, began on their part to consider how they should oppose it. And really he had met with such Mortifications in the first Year of his Reign, as were enough to convince him how difficult it would be for him to succeed in his Designs. Geoffery, Archbishop of York, his natural Brother, did all he could to oppose the raising of the Money which the Parliament had just granted to the King; and if that turbulent Prelate could have had his Will, the whole Kingdom would have rebelled. On the other hand, Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, having called the Convocation of his Province, without informing the King of it, contrary to the Custom of his Predecessors, the King forbad them to assemble, but notwithstanding his Prohibition they met.

John demands a Subsidy of his Parliament.

JOHN.

Archbishop of York opposes the raising of it.

Archbishop of Canterbury calls a Synod, notwithstanding the King's Prohibition.

IT was not only the Clergy that John was embroil'd with at the beginning of his Reign, for all the Nobility in general were disgusted. They had not plac'd him on the Throne, if he had not positively promis'd that he would restore their Privileges, and yet they did not perceive that he took one Step that had such a Tendency. On the contrary, when he was return'd to England, after having succeeded so happily in France, he steer'd a Course which was directly opposite. He had already, as I said above, demanded a Subsidy of the Parliament. Moreover, in a Journey which he made Northwards, he had extorted great Sums from some of the Counties, on pretence of punishing certain Misdemeanors which had been committed in his Forests. Finally, he gave his Subjects great cause of Disgust, by debauching their Wives and Daughters, without any regard to the most distinguish'd Families. All this giving the Barons of the Kingdom great suspicion, some of them had secret Meetings, and engag'd to stand by one another. At the same time they resolv'd to take hold of the first Opportunity that should offer, to convince the King that they did not intend to submit to absolute Power.

Discontents of the English.

The Nobles resolve to oppose the King.

THE Inhabitants of the Province of Poicton having taken a Step some time after, which gave Cause to suspect that they had a design to revolt, John resolv'd to go and punish them, and caus'd all the Vassals of the Crown to be summon'd to Portsmouth, in order to accompany him to France. But the Barons sent him word that Refuse to attend him into France.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

that they would not obey the Summons, unleſs he would perform his Engagements with reſpect to their Privileges. John looking upon this Refuſal as a Rebellion, immediately put himſelf at the Head of ſome Troops, and without giving them time to look about, ſeiz'd ſome of their Caſtles. As they had not yet taken any Meaſures to oppoſe Force with Force, they were oblig'd to promiſe that they would repair to Portſmouth, and to give him their Children for Hoſtages. When they were arriv'd at the Rendezvous, the King excus'd them from the Journey on their paying two Marks of Silver for every (Knight's) Fee; after which he repair'd with a few Troops to Normandy.

He attacks and obliges them to ſubmit.

Interview and Careſſes betwixt John and Philip.

As ſoon as he was arriv'd at Roan, Philip deſir'd to have a Conference with him, wherein they confirm'd the laſt Treaty which they had made together. Philip careſs'd him to the utmoſt, and even prevail'd on him to go and ſee Paris, where he gave him ſo many Proofs of a perfect Eſteem and ſincere Friendſhip, that John thought him the beſt Friend he had; in which he was mightily deceiv'd, as we ſhall find hereafter.

HITHERTO I have ſet down with all the Brevity I could, what happen'd in the two firſt Years of the Reign of John; but what fell out afterwards was altogether as conſiderable. In the ſequel of this Reign we find three important Events, which took up the whole of it, and of which I ſhall make three ſeparate Articles. The firſt ſhall take in John's Tranſactions with Philip Auguſtus. The ſecond his Affairs with Pope Innocent III. And the third his Quarrel with his Barons.

The three principal Events in this Reign.

ARTICLE I.

Affairs of John with Philip Auguſtus.

Philip ſpirits up the Earl of Marche againſt John.

WHILE Philip careſs'd John at Paris, he ſecretly ſtir'd up the Earl of Marche to take Revenge for the Affront he had receiv'd from him, and promis'd to ſupport him. The Earl ſeeing himſelf ſo ſecure of being ſupported, caball'd among the Inhabitants of Poictou, to diſpoſe them to a Revolt, in which he ſucceeded with very great Eaſe. Arthur Duke of Bretagne enter'd into the ſame Conſpiracy, with a view of taking ſomething from the King his Uncle, and Philip prepar'd likewiſe to improve ſuch Opportunities as might offer. When the Affairs of the Allies were ready, Philip had an Interview with John, wherein he publickly maintain'd the Intereſts of Arthur, and of the Earl of Marche, demanding for the one all the Provinces which John poſſeſs'd in France, and for the other a reaſonable Satisfaction. John having rejected theſe Demands with diſdain, was ſummon'd to the Court of Peers; and not appearing, Philip attack'd Normandy, and ſeiz'd ſome Places.

Arthur joins them.

Second Interview betwixt Philip and John.

Philip ſummons him to appear before the Court of Peers, and on his refuſal attacks Normandy.

AFTER this firſt Campaign, in which John made no Effort to defend himſelf, Philip granted Mary his Daughter in Marriage to the Duke of Bretagne, and caus'd Arthur marries the King of France's Daughter.

* There were ſeveral Acts paſs'd this Year, granting certain Privileges to the Inhabitants of the Iſle of Oleron, for which ſee Page 111 of the firſt Tome of the Fœdera.

Foedera caus'd the Nuptials to be celebrated at Paris. He afterwards ſent this young Prince into Poictou, there to command the Rebels of that Province. Arthur arriving in it, and hearing that Queen Eleanor his Grandmother had ſhut her ſelf up in Mirabeau, he went on a ſudden to that Town, and oblig'd the Queen to retire into the Caſtle, where he beſieg'd her. While he was employ'd in that Siege, John made long Marches to deliver the Queen his Mother, and with ſuch Diſpatch that he ſurpriz'd Arthur in the Town, and took him Priſoner, together with Eleanor his Siſter. As ſoon as he had them in his Power, he cauſed the Duke to be conducted to Falaize, and the Princeſs to the Caſtle of Briſtol, where, after a tedious Impriſonment, ſhe ended her Days. John repair'd not long after to Falaize, where he endeavour'd by all manner of ways to oblige the Duke his Nephew to quit the Party of France, and to be reconcil'd with him: But the young Prince was inflexible, and inſtead of complying with his Sollicitations, he had the Boldneſs to reproach him with the Uſurpation of the Crown of England, and of the Provinces of France; adding, that he could not but look upon him as his greateſt Enemy, and that he would never ceaſe his Endeavours to wreſt that Right from him, of which he had unjuſtly taken poſſeſſion. After ſo plain a Declaration, John deſpairing of gaining him, cauſed him to be conducted to the Caſtle of Roan, where, not long after, this young Prince was no more ſeen, and no body knew what became of him; but every body believ'd that the King his Uncle took away his Life: and what confirm'd the Suſpicion was, that John took no ſtep to clear himſelf of it, tho' what was ſaid of him, was not unknown to him.

Beſieges Mirabeau. John poſts to its relief.

His haughty Anſwer.

He is ſent to Roan, where he is made away with, as ſuppoſed, by John.

John ſummoned before the Peers. Is ſentenced to forfeit his Dominions in France.

It was from this Murder, real or pretended, that Philip took occaſion to ſummon John to the Court of Peers; and upon his Refuſal to appear, he cauſed all the Lands which John poſſeſs'd in France to be confiſcated, and in the ſpace of two or three Years he took Normandy, and all the other Provinces from him, except Guyenne. 'Tis by no means neceſſary to give a particular Account of this War, in which John made ſo weak a Defence, that he involv'd himſelf in a univerſal Contempt, and was particularly deſpis'd by the Engliſh, which was very fatal to him afterwards.

John. Loſes Normandy, &c. by his Indolence.

At length, Anno 1205, John ſeem'd to take Courage again, as if he was inclinable to make ſome Effort for the Recovery of Poictou, and ſummon'd all the Vaſſals of the Crown to meet him at Portſmouth. But as he was going to embark, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and William Marſhal Earl of Pembroke, diverted him from it, by repreſenting to him, that he would expoſe himſelf too much, becauſe he had no Place in Poictou to receive him. As ſoon as he was return'd to London, he repented that he had follow'd this Advice; and upon a groundleſs Suppoſition that thoſe two Noblemen had acted in the Name and on the Behalf of all the others, he puniſh'd this pretended Fault by exacting ſuch Taxes of the Nobility, as they did not think he had a Right to impoſe on them, and with which they were very much diſguſted.

He reſolves to recover them, but is diſſuaded from it.

The next Year, Anno 1206, he carry'd an Army into Poictou, and recover'd part of that Province. But while he was making a greater Progreſs, he conſented to a Truce of two Years; after which he was no longer able to carry on the War, by reaſon of the Quarrel betwixt him and the Pope, of which I ſhall treat in the next Article.

Recovers part of Poictou, and makes a Truce.

The Acts relating to this Article are,

1. A Summons to Arthur Duke of Bretagne, to come and pay Homage to King John; dated at Andel, March 27. 1202.

Duke of Bretagne required to do Homage.

2. The King's Demand upon the Order of the Ciſtercians, for a Supply for the War againſt France; dated Dec. 11. 1202 *.

Demand of a Supply from the Ciſtercians, 132.

3. A Charter ſettling the Dowry of Iſabella of Angouleſme, Wife to John; dated at Porcheſter, May 5. 1203 †.

* Here are alſo ſeveral Letters from King John to the Abbots of the Ciſtercian Order, and to his Clergy, wherein he calls upon them for Aſſiſtance, as well againſt the King of France, as to ſupport the Emperor Otho. For as the beſt part of his Kingdom was given away to Monks and Churches, ſcarce any but the Clergy were able to furniſh the ready Penny. It came at length to that paſs, that Kings were forced to beg Alms as 'twere of thoſe very Perſons who had enrich'd themſelves by no other means than the Alms of Kings and People. "Becauſe 'tis but reaſonable, ſays King John in a Letter to the aforeſaid Abbots, dated in 1202, that all the "Members in general ſhould ſupport and defend the Head, we have thought fit to deſire your Society, ſince you "were founded and enrich'd by the Goods and Liberality of our Predeceſſors, to give us free and effectual Aſ"ſiſtance, to repel the Violence of ſo great an Enemy. We ſhall be much obliged to you for it, and ſhall make "the utmoſt Diſpatch in what your Devotion ſhall think fit to aſk of us. Know alſo, that we will not draw "the Supply you ſhall give us into a Precedent." Quia ad defenſionem capitis æquum eſt univerſalem membrorum ſubventionem accurrere, univerſitatem veſtram rogandam diximus quatenus vos qui de bonis & largitionibus Prædeceſſorum noſtrorum fundati eſtis & ditati, ad tanti hoſtis propulſandam violentiam, gratuitum nobis & efficax conferatis auxilium; ita quod vobis inde debeatis grates condignas impendere, & in his, quæ a nobis duxeritis expetenda, devotionem veſtram benignius expedire.

History tells us, that King John thereby embroil'd himſelf with his Clergy; but he treated the Laity every whit as bad, for he was a covetous ambitious Prince, who aim'd only to enrich himſelf with the Spoils of his Subjects, and obſerv'd no Laws.

† There are certain Acts in 1205, whereby the King took into his Protection the King of Man, which is a little Iſland between England and Ireland. See pages 137, 334, 339 of the firſt Tome of the Fœdera.

ARTICLE II.

John's Affairs with the Pope.

Auguſtin Friars chuſe their Sub-Prior Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

HUBERT Archbiſhop of Canterbury dying in 1205, a few of the Monks of St. Auguſtin's Monaſtery repair'd in the middle of the Night to Church, where they choſe Reginald their Sub-Prior; but they kept this Election ſecret, becauſe they deſign'd to get it confirm'd by the Pope, before the King and the other Monks were inform'd of it. For this purpoſe they managed it ſo, that Reginald was deputed to go to Rome, to ſollicit a certain Affair which concern'd the Society. But this indiſcreet Monk aſſuming the Title of Archbiſhop of Canterbury as ſoon as he was got over Sea, the King was inform'd of it, and not doubting but the whole Monaſtery was concern'd in it, he threaten'd the Monks, who had no way to appeaſe his Wrath but by chuſing the Biſhop of Norwich Archbiſhop, according to his Recommendation. This Election being over, the King put the Prelate elect in poſſeſſion of the Temporalities of the Archbiſhoprick, and the Monaſtery ſent a Deputation to the Pope to have it confirm'd. But Innocent III. thought it more proper to annul the two Elections already made, and to compel the Deputation of Monks to chuſe Cardinal Langton, an Engliſh Man, who was then at Rome. He not only confirm'd this laſt Election, which he had extorted from the Deputies by his Authority, but he even choſe to conſecrate the new Archbiſhop with his own Hand. That was the Reaſon of the great Quarrel betwixt John and Innocent, which laſted many Years. I do not propoſe to engage my ſelf in giving an exact Narrative here of all that paſs'd during this famous Quarrel, becauſe I think that it will be ſufficient to run over the principal Circumſtances of it, for underſtanding the Acts which relate to it.

Pope's Letter to the King with 4 Rings.

THE Pope, in order to ſupport what he had done, contented himſelf at firſt with a kind Repreſentation to the King of the Danger he was liable to if he ſhould oppoſe it. This he did by ſending a Brief to him, in which he gave him the myſterious Explanation of four Rings which he ſent him, ſet with different Stones, each of which had its particular Explication. But leſt John ſhould not fully underſtand his Meaning, he ſent him another Brief, to exhort him without any Evaſion to acknowledge Cardinal Langton for Archbiſhop, and at the ſame time order'd the Suffragan Biſhops to receive him in that Quality. John being nettled at the Pope's Conduct, and perſuading himſelf that he acted in concert with the Monks of St. Auguſtin, he turn'd them all out of their Monaſtery, and baniſh'd them out of the Realm. Then he wrote a reproachful Letter to the Pope, to which the latter return'd an Anſwer mild in appearance, but very mortifying to the King. At laſt Innocent perceiving that the King was obſtinately bent againſt acknowledging Langton, put the Kingdom under an Interdict, and next Year excommunicated the King, but deferred the publiſhing of the Excommunication. As John was neither belov'd nor eſteem'd by his Subjects, the Pope had a fair Field to improve his Authority; the rather becauſe at the ſame time the King exerciſed ſuch acts of Violence as were far from a Tendency to gain the Affections of the Magiſtrates and Populace. Mean time, as the Pope was willing to play a ſure Game, he was reſolv'd, before he proceeded farther, to be ſure whether the King's Obſtinacy was real or feign'd. With this View he ſent two Nuncios into England, on pretence of ſolliciting an Accommodation with the King, but it was only to ſound whether he was reſolv'd in good earneſt to maintain the Quarrel. John was bubbled by theſe Nuncios. After they had told him that the Pope paſſionately deſired to put an end to this Quarrel by gentle Methods, he ſeem'd to be overjoy'd, and made ſuch large Advances to them, that they eaſily perceiv'd that in the Temper they found him in, the Pope would obtain every thing he had a mind to demand of him. Therefore they rejected his Offers, and having broke off the Negociation, publiſh'd the Excommunication, and retired. Not long after this, the Pope abſolv'd John's Subjects from their Oath of Allegiance. John finding himſelf in this ſad ſituation, rais'd an Army under pretence of carrying the War into Wales; for he imagin'd that while he had an Army on foot, the Efforts of the Pope would be in vain: but having receiv'd ſecret Intelligence that he would be betray'd by his own Troops, he diſbanded them, and retired to London. In a ſhort time after, the Pope ſolemnly depoſed him, and committed the Execution of the Sentence to Philip Auguſtus, who accepted the Commiſſion, and made prodigious Preparations for putting it in execution. John did the like on his part, and the Sea-Coaſts on both ſides were cover'd with Troops.

WHILE the Army of France was preparing to embark, a Legate from the Pope, named Pandulph, arriv'd in England by the way of France, where he had exhorted Philip to behave like a true Champion of the Church. In the Conferences he held with John, he repreſented to him that probably he would be overpower'd by the great Force which France had on Foot, and that his own Subjects, who pretended a Readineſs to ſerve him, only waited waited for an Opportunity to deliver him up to his Enemies. This Information, which was agreeable to the Tidings he had already receiv'd, put him into a degree of Confuſion, which it was no hard matter for the Legate to diſcern. Pandulph feigning a Compaſſion at that time for his Fate, repreſented to him that he had but one Remedy left, and that was to put himſelf under the Protection of the Pope, who alone was able to ſupport him; but that in order to obtain it, he muſt infallibly engage to do whatever the Pope ſhould command him, who as a tender Father did not deſire his Death, but his Converſion. John who had taken Alarm, and ſaw himſelf abſolutely reduc'd to the Neceſſity of ſubmitting either to the Pontiff, or to the King of France, choſe rather to yield to the former, and promis'd a blind Obedience to him. Pandulph contented himſelf at firſt with hinting to him ſome of the Terms on which his Abſolution depended, ſuch as his owning Langton for Archbiſhop, recalling the Exiles, making entire Reſtitution to the Church, and paying 8000 l. Sterling, in ready Specie. Conſequently, John, who ſuſpected nothing farther, promis'd upon Oath to obey the Pope; imagining that his Oath extended only to the Conditions which had been mention'd to him. But as ſoon as he was bound, the Legate gave him to underſtand that there was another neceſſary Condition for obtaining the Peace of the Church, and that was to reſign his Crown to the Pope. The Step which John had taken, and which was known to the whole World, having entirely alienated the Hearts of his Subjects from him, he was no longer in a condition to refuſe what was demanded of him. Therefore the very next Day he went to Dover Church with all the Regalia, and ſurrender'd them to Pandulph, in preſence of the People, who were Spectators. He afterwards ſign'd a Charter, in which he acknowledg'd that, without being forc'd to it, and with the view only of atoning for his Sins, he reſign'd the Kingdom of England, and the Lordſhip of Ireland to the Pope; adding, that it was by conſent of the Barons, altho' they had not been conſulted *. The Legate kept the Crown three Days, and then reſtor'd it to the King, as a ſignal Mark of the Pope's Goodneſs. But John was fain to own himſelf the Pope's Vaſſal, and to do Homage to him, engaging moreover to pay him an Acknowledgment of 1000 l. Sterling per Annum, viz. 700 for England, and 300 for Ireland. When he had made this Step, he was for ever conſider'd as a Prince unworthy to wear the Crown, which he had ſo ſhamefully reſign'd.

John yields to the Pope's Terms of ſubmiſſion.

And does Homage to him.

PANDULPH having obtain'd what he wanted, return'd immediately to France, and order'd Philip in the Pope's Name to lay down his Arms, becauſe the King of England was become an obedient Son of the Church. Philip ſurpriz'd at this Alteration, refus'd at firſt to obey the Order, and would fain have engag'd his Vaſſals that were with him, to promiſe him upon Oath, that they would not abandon him, even tho' he ſhould be excommunicated. But the Earl of Flanders publickly oppos'd it, and ſaid that it would be much more expedient to reſtore to King John what had been taken from him in France, than to add a freſh Act of Injuſtice by robbing him alſo of his Crown. Philip being offended at the Inſolence of the Earl of Flanders, reſolv'd to chaſtiſe him; the rather becauſe he hop'd that would be a means to intimidate his other Vaſſals. With this View he caus'd his Army to march into Flanders, where it ſoon made a conſiderable Progreſs. But John having ſent his Fleet to the Aſſiſtance of the Earl of Flanders, the Earl of Salisbury, who commanded it, ſurpriz'd Philip's Navy, and entirely deſtroy'd it. 'Tis ſaid that upon this Occaſion,

* The moſt remarkable and ſcandalous thing of all was, the Inſtrument whereby he reſigned England and Ireland to the Pope, which Mr. Rymer has taken from a Manuſcript of the Cotton Library. This King, who was as cowardly in Adverſity as he was inſolent in Proſperity, there ſays, "That without "Force or Fear, but of his own Free-Will, and by the common Conſent of his Barons, he offers and "freely gives to God, to the Holy Apoſtles, St. Peter and St. Paul, to the Holy Roman Church his Mo"ther, to his Lord Pope Innocent III. and to all his Catholick Succeſſors, the whole Kingdom of England; "and all the Kingdom of Ireland, with all their Rights and Appurtenances, for the Remiſſion of all his Sins, "and thoſe of his Family, whether Living or Dead. That from thenceforth he receives and holds "his Kingdoms from God, and from the Roman Church.——That he had publickly perform'd Ho"mage for them to the Church——And that he had oblig'd his Succeſſors to do the like——That for a "Proof of ſuch Conceſſion, he would have a thouſand Marks Sterling paid to the Pope out of his Re"venues ariſing from his ſaid Kingdoms, beſides St. Peter's Penny †——And if any of his Succeſſors fail'd "herein, he ſhould forfeit his Right to the Kingdom."

AFTER this there follows a kind of Oath of Fidelity, which he took to the Pope as his Vaſſal. There is no cauſe to wonder if the Pope was extraordinary civil to him afterwards, and took his part againſt the Barons of the Kingdom, who would oblige him to govern according to the Laws, and to whom he was forc'd to grant what they call Magna Charta. Mr. Rymer has inſerted a great many Briefs from Innocent III. in his Favour, which are only owing to that King's mean ſpirited Behaviour. Among other things the Pope granted him as an extraordinary Favour, by a Letter dated in the Year 1214. that he ſhould not be excommunicated but by expreſs Order from his Holineſs.

sion, Philip lost 400 Ships; which unexpected Success oblig'd him to retire, and at the same time to lay aside his Designs, as well with regard to Flanders, as to England.

John inclines to carry the War into France.

BUT on the other Hand, John was so puffed up with this Advantage, that he was resolv'd to improve it, and for that end to carry the War into France. With this View he caus'd the Barons to be summon'd to Portsmouth to attend him, but they refus'd to obey 'till he was releas'd from the Excommunication. Therefore he was forc'd to stay for the arrival of Langton, and the banish'd Clergy, to whom the King had sent Letters of Safe Conduct. Langton arriving, made the King take an extraordinary Oath, whereby he engag'd to protect Holy Church, to reestablish the Laws of Edward the Confessor, to have Justice administer'd by the common Courts, and not by arbitrary Decrees as he had hitherto done; to restore to Corporations, and to private Men, their Liberties and Privileges, and to repair all the Damages he had been the occasion of, before the ensuing Festival of Easter. After this, the King confirm'd the Charter of Resignation, which he had given to Pandulph, and receiv'd his Absolution.

The Barons refuse to follow before he is absolv'd.

Langton arrives, and gives the King an Oath.

Absolves him.

JOHN being now secure of the Pope's Protection, thought he had nothing more to fear; but a little time convinc'd him that it was of no great Service to him. He was soon after embroil'd with his Barons, as we shall find in the next Article: and the Barons having made an Association against him, he was under the necessity of imploring the Pope's Assistance, who immediately sent a Legate into England. But this Legate would do nothing in the King's Favour, 'till he had resign'd his Crown to the Pope a second time, and dispatch'd a new Charter more extensive than the former. After this, he took off the Interdict, which the Kingdom had 'till then lain under, and discharg'd the King for a very moderate Sum, from the Restitution which he was bound to make.

Reaſons of the Barons Diſcontent with King John.

WHEN the Barons of England conſented to the Advancement of John to the Throne, in oppoſition to the Pretenſions of the Duke of Bretagne, it was owing only to the Aſſurances that had been given them on his part, that he would reſtore them to their Privileges, for which the Kings his Predeceſſors ſince the Conqueſt had ſhewn little Regard. But when he was ſeated on the Throne, he did not diſcover the leaſt Care to keep his Promiſes. This bred Suſpicions in the Breaſts of the great Men, which became as it were certain, when he was ſeen, upon ſeveral Occaſions, to exerciſe an Arbitrary Power, from which all the great Men paſſionately deſired to be deliver'd. On the other hand, his Conduct did not contribute to procure him the Love and Eſteem of his Subjects. The Diſſolution of his Marriage with Aviſa of Gloucester, the Indolence with which he ſuffer'd the Provinces of France to be taken from him, the Murder of his Nephew the Duke of Bretagne, the Reſignation of his Crown twice to the Pope, and the Servitude to which he had ſubmitted it; finally, the Arrogance with which he treated the Nobility, as well as the reſt of his Subjects, had render'd him odious and contemptible both to the Nobles and Commons. The Barons thought this a favourable Juncture to be reſtor'd to their Privileges, and reſolved to improve it. 'Tis highly probable that Cardinal Langton, before he ſet out from Rome, was enter'd into the Conſpiracy, if he was not himſelf the Author of it. Otherwiſe, 'tis hardly to be imagin'd, that before he gave the Abſolution to the King, he ſhould try to make him take the Oath I mention'd above, in which there were ſeveral Things that had no relation to his Quarrel with the Pope. 'Tis not at all likely that he receiv'd any ſuch Order from the Pontiff, who being become Sovereign Lord of England, could not reap any Advantage from enlarging the Privileges of the Engliſh. Be this as it will, the Deſign of the Barons broke out immediately after John receiv'd the Abſolution. They had already refuſed to accompany him to France, on pretence that he was excommunicated; and when that Pretence was taken away by his Abſolution, they had another ready, which was, that by their long ſtay at Portſmouth they had ſpent the Money Money which they had design'd for the Campaign. The King being disgusted at this Denial, was resolv'd to punish them; but Langton publickly oppos'd it, and threaten'd to excommunicate all that should take up Arms before the Interdict was removed. This Menace obliged John to desist from his Undertaking.

John resolves to punish the Barons, for which Langton threatens him.

The King desists.

LANGTON having not long after recover'd an authentick Copy of the Charter which Henry I. had formerly granted to his Subjects, assembled the chief Barons; and having shewn it to them, strenuously exhorted them to lay hold of it, and to take Advantage of the King's Folly for the Re-establishment of their ancient Privileges. The Barons were pleas'd to see this Charter, which confirm'd the Liberties the English had enjoy'd under the Dominion of the Saxon Kings, and made a Confederacy in order to obtain a Confirmation of it, and for their mutual Defence. John being inform'd of it, and dreading the Consequences, implor'd the Pope's Protection, and took the Cross as if he had a design to go and fight the Infidels. It was upon this occasion that the Pope sent a Legate into England, who oblig'd the King to resign his Crown to the Pope a second time, but did nothing in his favour except taking off the Interdict, under which the Kingdom had groan'd for many Years. But John thought this was enough to let the Barons see that the Pope's Favour would not fail him in case of need. Consequently, thinking he had sufficiently provided for his own Safety, he went to Rochel with a numerous Army, and recover'd Poicton with great ease, because the King of France was employ'd elsewhere. From thence he march'd into Anjou; but Prince Lewis, Son to Philip, stopp'd him in his Career, so that John was afraid to give him Battle, because he found himself abandon'd by the Inhabitants of Poicton. After this, the News of the Victory at Bovines, which Philip had just gain'd over the Emperor and the Earl of Flanders, convincing John that he should soon have this Enemy upon his Back, he desir'd a Truce, which was granted him for five Years.

John sues to the Pope for Protection.

Carries the War into France, and subdues Poicton.

John obtains a Truce.

THIS Truce only procur'd John a little Respit, in order to cast him into greater Troubles. He had domestick Enemies about him, who were as much to be fear'd as the King of France. The Barons, as I have said, were resolv'd to improve the favourable Conjuncture arising from the universal Contempt of the People for the King, and from the Situation he stood in with regard to the Powers abroad. They knew well that John would not find many Friends in England, and that he could hope for no Assistance either from France or Scotland, much less from the Emperor his Nephew, and from the Earl of Flanders, who were quite ruin'd by the Loss of the Battle of Bovines. In pursuance of this Design they assembled at St. Edmondsbury, and after having renew'd their Association, went in a Body to the King, and presented him a very respectful Petition, whereby they desir'd the Confirmation of the Charter granted by Henry, and the Re-establishment of the Saxon Laws. The King, who only sought to amuse them, desir'd time to consider of it, and promis'd to answer their Petition at the ensuing Feast of Easter. During this, the Barons made ready to compel the King, if it was necessary, to grant them their Demands; and the King wrote to the Pope to desire his Protection against the Barons. As this is an Affair of vast Importance, and what was attended with great Consequences, the Reader will not be sorry to see here in a few Words, wherein consisted the Rights of the Barons, and the Reasons which the King had for rejecting their Demand.

JOHN.

The Barons Association for the Restoration of their Liberties.

Examination of the Pretensions of the King, and of the Barons.

'TIS very certain, whatever some Historians may say of it, that William the Conqueror oppress'd the English very much; whether it was from political Reasons, or to punish them for the frequent Rebellions which they were guilty of in his Reign, this is not a Place to examine: But it cannot be deny'd that he depriv'd the English Noblemen of the Fiefs which they held of the Crown, in order to give them to the Natives of Normandy, Bretagne, and others who had serv'd him in his Conquest. This Violence was strain'd to such a Point, that at last there was scarce an English Nobleman that possess'd a Fief, was it ever so inconsiderable. The Saxon Laws reduc'd into a Body by Edward the Confessor, were not mention'd at that time without Ridicule. If William the Conqueror did not expressly repeal them, at least no regard was had to them in his Trials. At that time the new Possessors of the Fiefs did not think it a Grievance that the King made use of a despotick Power, because it was in their favour. But when at last they saw themselves in quiet possession of the Estates which had belong'd to the English, they began to think that the same Royal Authority which had granted them those Estates, had also a Right to take them away. Then it was that they wish'd to be incorporated with the English, and to enjoy the same Privileges which the English had enjoy'd under the Saxon Kings. Opportunities naturally presented for their improving this Claim; for the three first Kings who succeeded William the Conqueror, having no Right to the Crown, were oblig'd to promise whatever the Barons had a mind to require of them, before they could ascend the Throne. This Promise was ill observ'd by William Rufus. Henry I. who had so much reason to dread the Attacks tacks of his elder Brother Robert, liſted the Barons in his Intereſt, by granting them a very advantagious Charter; but when he found he was well eſtabliſh'd, he diſpens'd with himſelf from obſerving it. Stephen behav'd after the ſame manner; and the War which he was engag'd in againſt Maud, proceeded only from the Diſcontent of the Barons, who complain'd that he did not perform his Promiſes. Mean time theſe Engagements of thoſe Kings, tho' ill obſerv'd, did nevertheleſs give the Barons a Right, which otherwiſe they could not have legally claimed. For it was in the Breaſt of the Conqueror whether he would give them the Lands he had taken from the Engliſh, without thereto annexing the Privileges which the old Poſſeſſors enjoy'd, and which the new ones had no right to demand of him, or his Succeſſors. All the Right of the Barons was therefore only founded upon the repeated Promiſes, and upon the Charters of ſome of the Kings who were the Conqueror's Succeſſors. But as thoſe Charters, and thoſe Promiſes were never duly obſerv'd, John did not intend to be any more bound than his Predeceſſors. From the non-performance of their Promiſes, he deriv'd an Argument which he thought very plauſible for refuſing them Privileges they had never enjoy'd, tho' they had offer'd to extort them from the preceding Kings. That was the true Foundation of John's Quarrel with the Barons, of which I ſhall now briefly proſecute the Narrative.

King John cauſes the Barons to renew their Fealty and Homage They preſs the King for his Anſwer to their Petition.

BEFORE the Expiration of the Term fix'd by the King for returning his Anſwer, he caus'd all the Barons to renew their Homage, and Oath of Allegiance. But this did not hinder their repairing to Stamford, to the number of about 1000 Knights well arm'd and mounted, beſides Eſquires and Domeſticks. John who ſtay'd for them at Oxford to give them an Anſwer from his own Mouth, not thinking it fit to ſtand to their Mercy, ſent William Marſhal Earl of Pembroke to demand of them what were thoſe Laws and Liberties which they talk'd of in their Petition. They anſwer'd this Queſtion by a long Memorial, in which they inſerted all the Articles contain'd in the Charter of Henry I. and ſent Word to the King that that was what they deſir'd, and that if they could not obtain it by fair means, they were reſolv'd to make uſe of Force. John having read this Memorial, haughtily rejected it, ſaying that he would not make himſelf the Slave of his Subjects. Hereupon the Barons rais'd Troops, choſe a General, and commenc'd Hoſtilities.

He rejects it.

They chuſe a General, and begin Hoſtilities.

During this, the King retir'd to the Tower of London, from whence he did not dare to ſtir, becauſe he had not had time to aſſemble his Troops, and becauſe moreover he had few Friends in the Kingdom. But not long after, the Barons being introduc'd into London by the Citizens, beſieg'd the King in the Tower, and caus'd it to be publiſh'd throughout the Realm, that they would not ſuffer a Neutrality, and that ſuch as did not join with them ſhould be treated as Enemies. As they were in a capacity to execute their Menaces, and as the King was beſieg'd in the Tower, their Party grew ſo ſtrong, that the King finding himſelf abandon'd by every body, ſubmitted at laſt to all the Conditions they were pleas'd to require of him. For this purpoſe he went with all the Barons to a Place call'd Runnemede, between Staines and Windſor, where he ſign'd two Charters drawn up by the Barons, who had therein inſerted what they had a mind to. The firſt of theſe Charters was call'd the Charter of Liberties, or the Great Charter, and the other the Charter of the Foreſts. The former has been ſince that time regarded as the Baſis of the Liberties of Engliſhmen, and from which they have never departed, whatſoever Efforts John and ſome of his Succeſſors have made uſe of to free themſelves from this Yoke.

They beſiege the King in the Tower of London.

He ſubmits.

And ſigns Magna Charta and the Charter of Foreſts.

JOHN had no ſooner ſign'd theſe two Charters, than he ſought for Means to revoke them. But finding almoſt the whole Kingdom ſet againſt him, he ſent Perſons into foreign Countries, there to raiſe Troops, with a Power to engage in his Name, that he would give to thoſe who would come and ſerve him, the forfeited Eſtates of the rebellious Barons: At the ſame time he wrote to the Pope to beg his Aſſiſtance and Protection. While he waited the Iſſue of theſe Precautions, he retir'd to the Iſle of Wight with a very ſmall Retinue, leſt if he took too much Company with him, his Secret ſhould be found out. Not long after, Innocent III. ſent a thundring Brief to the Barons, in which he commanded them to give up the Charters they had extorted from the King, if they would not draw down upon their Heads the Indignation of the Holy See *. But the Barons, without regarding this Order, ſtill went on as they had begun, and put themſelves in poſſeſſion of Rocheſter, which was deliver'd up to them by Cardinal Langton. It was in this Place that John had erected a great Magazine of Ammunition and Proviſion for his Service in caſe of need. Mean time the Pope, being

* THE Pope did not care how much the King tyranniz'd over his Subjects, provided he was but ſubmiſſive to the Church, which had conſequently the greateſt ſhare in that Arbitrary Power which the King pretended to claim.

HERE therefore we have, 1. A Letter of the ſame Year 1215, wherein the Pope entirely diſapproves of the Agreement which had been made between the King and the Barons.

to the laſt degree provok'd at the Diſobedience of the Barons, repeal'd the two Charters by his ſingle Authority, and loos'd the King from the Oath he had taken to obſerve them. At the ſame time, the King being inform'd that the Agents, whom he had ſent into Foreign Countries, had ſucceeded perfectly well, repair'd to Dover, there to wait for the Troops which were brought to him in great numbers. As ſoon as they were arriv'd, he put himſelf at the Head of them; and after having retaken Rocheſter, he ravag'd the Lands of his Enemies without Mercy. Not long after this, the Pope fulminated againſt the Barons a Bull of Excommunication, which was publiſh'd by Pandulph, and the Biſhop of Norwich, upon the refuſal of Langton, who had receiv'd an Order to publiſh it, but excus'd himſelf from obeying it, on pretence that the Pope was ſurpriz'd into it. But the Barons did not value this Excommunication, becauſe none of them in particular was nam'd in the Bull. This was the Reaſon that the Pope ſent a ſecond, wherein all, and every one in particular were excommunicated by Name, and moreover their Lands, and the City of London, were put under an Interdict. But this was not more effectual than the former. The Barons hinder'd it from being publiſh'd in London, maintaining that the Pope exceeded his Power, by meddling with Affairs which did not concern him.

MEAN time, the King ſtill continuing to ravage the whole Kingdom with his Army of Foreigners, the Barons at length choſe the deſperate Expedient to call to their aſſiſtance Prince Lewis, Son to Philip Auguſtus, by promiſing to own him for their King; and this Prince, by the Conſent of the King his Father, accepted of the Invitation. Immediately after this, great Preparations were made in France, notwithſtanding the Pope's Menaces, to which Philip had no regard; and Lewis went over to England with a good Body of French Troops. Then the Barons Affairs began to look with a new Face. Lewis beſieg'd and took Rocheſter; and tho' the Abbot of St. Auguſtin by the Pope's Order had ſolemnly declar'd him excommunicate, the Barons own'd him as King of England, and took the Oath of Allegiance to him. The King of Scotland alſo went to pay him Homage for the Lands which he held of the Crown of England. Finally, Lewis brought all the Southern Counties under his Subjection in a little time; and Dover, of which Hubert de Burgh was Governour, was the only Place that he beſieg'd in vain.

THO' John had a conſiderable Army, yet as it was compos'd for the moſt part of French Officers and Soldiers, he was afraid to truſt to his Troops, or to offer the Enemy Battle. On the contrary, he endeavour'd to avoid it by marching into the Eaſtern Counties, where he committed great Ravages. But hearing that Lewis and the Barons were preparing to follow him, he reſolv'd to retire into Lincolnſhire. He narrowly miſs'd periſhing with his whole Army as he paſs'd over a large Moraſs, by ſtaying ſo long 'till the Tide overtook him. But he could not ſave his Baggage, his Money, nor his Crown, which he caus'd to be carry'd with him. His Grief for this Loſs threw him into a violent Fever, which in a few Days carry'd him to his Tomb, after he had made a Will, whereby he appointed his eldeſt Son Henry, who was twelve Years of Age, to be his Heir. He had alſo a ſecond Son nam'd Richard, who was Earl of Cornwal.

The REIGN of HENRY III.

ANNO 1216.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

IN order to give a tolerable Idea of this Reign, which lasted 56 Years, I find my self oblig'd to divide it into two Parts; the first of which shall contain what pass'd in England from the Death of King John to the Year 1254. This first Part shall be divided into five Articles, viz. 1. The Domestick Affairs. 2. Henry IIId's Affairs with France. 3. The Affairs with Scotland. 4. His Affairs with the Welsh. 5. The Behaviour of the Popes towards England.

THE second Part shall contain what passed from the Year 1254, to the Death of Henry III. which happen'd in 1272, and shall be divided into three Articles, viz. 1. What relates to the Grant of Sicily made by the Pope to Henry, for Edmund his second Son. 2. The War of the Barons. 3. The Remainder of this Reign, from the end of the Civil War to the Death of the King.

PART I.

ARTICLE I.

Of Domestick Affairs.

UNDER this Article we find a great Crowd of Facts, which, tho' of little importance in themselves, and independent on one another, serve however to discover the Temper and Character of Henry III. and his Ministers, and to give an Idea of the Government of this Prince, which at last produced a Civil War. Among these Facts, I shall single out some of the most considerable, and especially those relating to the Efforts made by the King and the Barons severally, to annul or to maintain the Charters granted by King John. Throughout the whole History of this Reign, we see a King of very mean Merit, who was inconstant, capricious, and imprudent; Ministers who were insolent and haughty, kept no Measures with the Subjects, and shew'd no Regard to the Welfare of the Kingdom; and on the other hand, a Class of stubborn Lords, who would not suffer themselves to be stripp'd of what they had gain'd in the preceding Reign, nor let go the Opportunity which a weak King, who was not of a martial Temper, offer'd them to maintain themselves in their Privileges. Finally, we see the Popes exercising a barefaced Tyranny over the Clergy of England, and treating that Kingdom as a conquer'd Country. To this may be referr'd almost all the Events of the Reign of Henry III. of which I shall only run over some of the chief, for fear of making this Extract too long.

HENRY III.

General Character of his Reign.

Anno 1216. As soon as John's Eyes were clos'd, the Earl of Pembroke who had always been attach'd to the Service of that Prince, assembled the few Lords who adher'd to his Party, and with their Approbation, caus'd Henry, John's eldest Son, who was but in the 12th Year of his Age, to be crown'd; and by the same Lords he himself was declared Regent. The Coronation of the new King being notify'd to the whole Kingdom, several Barons fell off from Lewis's Interest, their Aversion to John being extinct with his Death. Besides, they were not pleas'd with a Foreign Prince, who mistrusting the Fidelity of the English, committed the Defection of the Barons from Lewis.

* To be more particular; the King complain'd that the Barons were not so submissive to him since he was become the Pope's Feudatory, and that they blam'd him for it in an especial Manner; wherefore he intreats the Pope to take care of a Kingdom which was his.

† The Reason given for all this Thunder was, because they disturbed a Kingdom that belonged to the Church of Rome.

IN this manner did the Court of Rome favour the Tyranny of a very wicked King, when the Laity only were to be the Sufferers by it; but she oppos'd some Attempts which he had made, as she pretended, against the Rights of the Church, with that Violence, as to excommunicate him. If we compare these Acts with Polydore Virgil, and other Writers of the History of England, it will evidently appear, That the same may be of great Service to correct and supply many Errors and Defects, which 'tis not so material to mention here.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

Custody of Places to none but Frenchmen. This Discontent, the Death of John, the tender Age of Henry, who was not guilty of the Faults of the King his Father, the Abilities of the Earl of Pembroke who knew how to make a good use of those Dispositions, the Favour and Protection of the Pope, which was at that time a very considerable Support, fram'd a Party for the young King, which put him in a Capacity to resist his Enemy.

Lewis begs and obtains a Peace.

Anno 1217. As the Detail of this War would be very needless in this place, I shall only say in one word, that Lewis was at length reduc'd to the Extremity of desiring Peace, that he might return to France with Safety. This Peace was very soon concluded. Lewis who was block'd up in London, only study'd by what means to free himself from the Danger to which he was render'd liable by the Revolt of the English, who were visibly inclin'd to favour the new King. The Regent on his part desir'd nothing so much as to see the Kingdom clear'd of the French, and almost all the Barons were of the same mind; and tho' they still reserv'd a seeming Attachment to Prince Lewis's Party, it was only in hopes of finding their Security in a general Treaty. For Lewis protested that he would not sign a Treaty, which did not secure his Friends against all manner of Prosecution. The Regent did not think fit to refuse this Condition, because his View was to restore Tranquillity to the Kingdom, and to cause his young Pupil to be recogniz'd in all places. Yet 'tis pretended, and perhaps not without some Foundation, that Lewis, in order to obtain this Point, with the Liberty of returning home, made a Promise, that when he was upon the Throne of France, he would restore the Provinces which Philip his Father had taken from King John. Indeed the Treaty I have been speaking of, made no mention of such Engagement: but the Historians of both Nations have asserted it very positively, and we discover some Traces of it in the Scruples which were afterwards made upon this Head by St. Lewis, that Prince's Son.

It block'd up in London.

The View of the Barons in his Party.

LEWIS being withdrawn, Henry made his Entry into London, and swore to observe the two Charters of the King his Father. Thus the whole Kingdom was reconcil'd to the Obedience of young Henry, and Peace was entirely restor'd.

Henry's Entry into London upon the withdrawing of Lewis.

Anno 1218. THERE were indeed some turbulent Spirits who still endeavour'd to excite Disturbances, but they were reduc'd to their Duty. As the Efforts which John had made to deliver himself from the Yoke of the two Charters, had been the sole Cause of the preceding War, the Earl of Pembroke took care to let the Barons know that it was his Intention to have them punctually observ'd, by giving several Orders diverse times upon that Head.

HENRY III.

Anno 1219. BUT this great Man, who had the welfare of his King and Country so much at Heart, dying not long after, the Bishop of Winchester, a Native of Poicton, who was made Regent in his place, and Hubert de Burgh, who had the Post of Chief Justice, happen'd to be of a very different Character; and were the cause of all the Misfortunes with which England was oppress'd in this Reign. These two Men, who govern'd the Kingdom during the Minority, inspired the young King with Principles directly contrary to the Liberties establish'd by the two Charters; and during their Administration, they continually infring'd them. Henry being come to Age, and having imbib'd the same Principles, try'd all possible Efforts to free himself from the Yoke of those Charters; and the Barons continually sought ways and means to maintain them. This is the principal Subject of the Domestick Affairs of this Reign, of which I shall now run over the most considerable Events, according to the Order of Years in which they happen'd.

Anno 1220. HENRY was crown'd a second time with more solemnity than he was before. Next Year a Nobleman nam'd William of Albemarle rebell'd, and gave the Regent some Disturbance.

He is crown'd a second time.

Earl of Albemarle's Revolt.

A Quarrel which happen'd in 1222, betwixt the Inhabitants of Westminster, and the Citizens of London, upon a trifling Account, occasion'd a violent Tumult in London. A Citizen thereof, whose Name was Constantine, march'd at the Head of the Populace to Westminster, crying out as they pass'd, Montjoye St. Denis, which was the Military Shout of the French; and reveng'd an Affront which the Citizens of London pretended to have receiv'd from the Neighbours. The Tumult being over, Hubert de Burgh the Chief Justice, went to the Tower, of which he was Governour; and by good Cunning wheedled the principal Rioters thither, of which number was Constantine, whom he detain'd and hang'd upon the Spot. Next Day he caus'd others of the most noted Rioters to be taken out of their Houses, and had their Feet and Hands cut off.

Quarrel betwixt London and Westminster.

The Rioters punish'd arbitrarily.

Anno 1223. THO' the Punishment of the guilty Persons was just, yet as it was inflicted by Arbitrary Power, the Parliament which assembled soon after, was very much dissatisfy'd with it, and demanded of the King that he would take care to have Magna Charta strictly observ'd, as he was bound by Oath. When this Addreſs was preſented to the King, the Biſhop of Wincheſter anſwered, that the ſaid Charter having been extorted from the late King, there was no Juſtice in ſuch Demand. But the Archbiſhop of Canterbury reply'd very ſharply, and reproach'd him, that he only wanted to plunge the Kingdom into freſh Troubles. The King, who was then in his 16th Year, took the Archbiſhop's part, and ſaid, without conſulting the Regent, that he agreed to the Parliament's Demand; and in purſuance thereof, he ſent Orders over all the Kingdom to have the two Charters executed.

Parliament complain of it by Addreſs. Diſpute about it, betwixt the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Biſhop of Wincheſter.

King's Order for the Obſervation of the Charters.

THIS was a Mortification to the Regent, but it was not long before he met with a worſe. Hubert de Burgh who engroſs'd all the King's Favour, finding himſelf incommoded by the Regent's Authority, got the Pope to declare the King to be of Age, tho' he was not yet attain'd to the Year preſcrib'd by the Laws. The Lords indeed ſtrenuouſly oppos'd it; but Hubert, who had engag'd the King in his Deſign, brought it about by mere Artifice. As it was to no purpoſe to have had the King declar'd to have been of Age, becauſe the great Men would not agree to it, and becauſe it was a matter of too great difficulty to extort their Conſent, while the ſtrong Places were in their Hands, he got the King to demand of him thoſe that were in his keeping; and accordingly he deliver'd up Dover and the Tower of London to him. Some of the Barons follow'd his Example; and when once the King was in poſſeſſion of their Places, he reſtor'd thoſe he had receiv'd from Hubert. The Nobility were very much diſpleas'd at being thus over-reach'd. Many of thoſe who had Offices, reſign'd their Commiſſions to the King; and they who had not deliver'd up their Places, reſolv'd to keep them, notwithſtanding the Excommunication with which Hubert threaten'd the them. In general, the Step which King had now taken, gave the Lords a bad Opinion of him, and all the People a mortal enmity to Hubert.

The King and Hubert hated for it.

Anno 1224. THE King of France having made himſelf Maſter of Rochel, Henry demanded a Subſidy of the Parliament, to enable him to recover it. The Parliament granted it, with this Condition however, that the two Charters ſhould be ſtrictly obſerv'd, to which the King agreed; and even ſent Orders for that purpoſe throughout the Kingdom; by which, it appear'd that there had been ſome remiſsneſs in the Execution of thoſe Charters.

Parliament grants a Supply for the recovery of Rochel.

King declared of Age. His falſe Step at firſt ſetting out.

Anno 1226. THE Parliament having declar'd the King of Age, he began his Majority by a Step which diſpleas'd every body. For, in order to raiſe Money, he oblig'd all that had Offices or Patents, to get them renew'd, and impos'd a Tax upon every one of them.

HENRY III.

Anno 1227. THE Biſhop of Wincheſter being no longer neceſſary to the King, Hubert order'd it ſo that he was ſent to his See, and thereby he enjoy'd the King's Favour ſolely. As ſoon as this Miniſter ſaw himſelf without a Rival, he put it into the King's head, that it was unworthy of a Prince to live a Slave to Charters which had been extorted from the King his Father; and he found him a very apt Scholar to learn his Leſſons. Soon after this, the King demanded a Loan of 5000 l. Sterling of the Citizens of London, on pretence of their having lent the like Sum to Prince Lewis when he left England. The Town of Northampton was alſo compell'd to give him 1200 l. Nor were the very Monaſteries exempt, for they were forced to give the King whatever he thought fit to demand of them, and it was in vain for them to appeal to the Pope. Finally, Henry annull'd King John's two Charters, on pretence that they had been extorted, and that he was not bound to ſtand to what he had ſeveral times promis'd upon Oath during his Minority. But not long after, the Lords enter'd into a Confederacy for the maintenance of the Charters; and Richard Earl of Cornwall, the King's Brother, who was at variance with him, put himſelf at the head of the League, which nevertheleſs came to nothing, becauſe by Hubert's Counſel the King took care to make the Chief eaſy, by gratifying his private Views.

Anno 1228. HENRY having rais'd an Army to carry the War into France, when his Troops were juſt ready to embark, there were no Ships to tranſport them, by which means he was forced to put off his Expedition to the following Spring. He was in ſuch a Paſſion upon it, that he offer'd to kill Hubert with his own Hands, but Hubert found a way to pacify him.

Anno 1231. PRINCE Richard married the Counteſs Dowager of Glouceſter, Siſter to the Earl of Pembroke. The ſaid Earl dying not long after, and having made the ſaid Richard his Heir, the King ſeiz'd his Inheritance, and refus'd to reſtore it to the Heir, on pretence of certain imaginary Crimes of which he accuſed him. But Richard retiring to Ireland, invaded the King's Lands there by way of Repriſal for the Eſtate which was kept from him in England. At laſt the King was forced to recall Parliament will not grant the King Money.

Anno 1232. NEXT Year the King demanded Money of the Parliament, which bluntly refuſed him, becauſe he had made a very ill Uſe of what had been granted him before. Moreover, all the Subjects were diſſatisfied, as well with the Repeal of the Charters, as with the Favour which the King openly ſhew'd to the Exactions of the Court of Rome, and his Connivance at the Intruſion of a very great number of Foreigners into Benefices.

Biſhop of Wincheſter recall'd to Court.

THE Enemies of Hubert de Burgh having made way for the Biſhop of Wincheſter's Recall to Court, the ſaid Prelate was no ſooner there, but he made uſe of all his Power to ruin Hubert, and at length he ſucceeded. The Particulars of the King's Conduct throughout this whole Affair, his Inconſtancy, his Acts of Injuſtice and Violence towards this diſgraced Favourite, would be of great uſe to diſcover his Temper and Character. But my Fear of being too prolix, makes me paſs over all thoſe things, to ſay in one word, that Hubert de Burgh was not only diſgraced and turn'd out of all his Offices, and the greateſt part of his Eſtate, but actually oppreſs'd, perſecuted and impriſon'd, and that it was with very great difficulty that he eſcap'd with his Life.

Hubert's Ruin.

Anno 1233. THE People of England got nothing by the Change of the Miniſter. The Biſhop of Wincheſter, who ſucceeded him, and was as fond as he for eſtabliſhing a deſpotick Government, endeavour'd immediately to reduce the too great Power of the Nobility; for it appears that of them and the Clergy the Parliament did then conſiſt. At leaſt I have never ſeen any Proof ſtrong enough to convince me that the Commons ſent any Members thither at that time. Be this as it will, the new Miniſter perſuaded the King that the Engliſh Barons were not very well affected to him, that they aim'd to keep him in a ſort of Dependency, under colour of their pretended Liberties, by not granting him Money 'till ſuch time as they thought fit; that in order to reſtrain their Inſolence, it was abſolutely neceſſary to remove them by degrees from thoſe Offices and Governments which ſerv'd to feed their Pride; and that this might eaſily be done by giving the Lucrative Offices, and the Cuſtody of the ſtrong Places to Foreigners, who might grow rich and powerful enough in time to check the Engliſh Barons. Henry approving of this Advice, a ſwarm of People came into England on a ſudden from Poictou, to whom the Biſhop of Wincheſter, their Countryman, gave the beſt Employments. The Barons murmur'd ſadly to ſee Foreigners ſo well provided for; and the Earl of Pembroke made a ſtrong and publick Remonſtrance to the King, of the Inconveniencies with which it might be attended: But the Biſhop of Wincheſter anſwer'd for the King, That if the Number of Foreigners already in England was not ſufficient to tame the Rebels, he would ſend for more. From that time the Engliſh Barons withdrew from Court, and began to form a Confederacy for maintaining themſelves in their Privileges.

SOME time after this, the King having call'd a Parliament, the Barons refus'd to repair to it, tho' they were ſeveral times ſummon'd. At length hearing that another great Tribe of People was arriv'd from Poictou, they met together on ſome Pretence, and ſent word to the King, that if he did not remove the Biſhop of Wincheſter and the other Foreigners from his Perſon and Councils, they were reſolv'd to chuſe another King that ſhould be more obſervant of the Laws of the Realm. The Biſhop of Wincheſter finding he had ſo fair an Opportunity to exaſperate the King againſt the Barons, gave him to underſtand that it was high time to uſe Force to puniſh them; and the King actually began to proceed againſt ſome of them. Afterwards he call'd a Parliament, on a Suppoſition that the greateſt number of the Barons would not venture to go to the Houſe, and that this would give him a good handle to proſecute them: But, contrary to his Expectation, the Barons went to Parliament ſo well accompany'd, that they had nothing to fear, either from the King or his Miniſter. The Earl of Pembroke, who was at the Head of the Confederacy, was upon the Road to London; but hearing that the Miniſter was brewing ſome Miſchief againſt him, he turn'd back and retir'd to Wales, where he obtain'd the Protection of Lleolyn Prince of that Country, and made an Alliance with him. The Withdrawing of the Earl of Pembroke and ſome others, having furniſh'd the King with the Pretence which he wanted, he cauſed their Eſtates to be plunder'd, and gave the Spoil to the Inhabitants of Poictou. This he did with the more eaſe, becauſe a Difference ariſing among the Barons, they had not taken any Meaſures for their Defence. The King purſuing his Point, beſieg'd a Caſtle belonging to the Earl of Pembroke; and finding it too difficult to make himſelf Maſter of it, he made as if he was willing to refer the Quarrel he had with the abſent Barons, to the Deciſion of the Parliament, which was to meet in October. But he demanded, that for his Honour, the Place which he beſieg'd might be deliver'd up to him, promiſing to give it back again to the Earl in a Fortnight after. This being granted Parliament's Remonſtrance to him.

THE Parliament, which met in October, made a ſerious Remonſtrance to the King upon his Conduct in general, and more particularly for his repoſing all his Confidence in Foreigners, and aſſuming to himſelf the Power of declaring and treating Perſons as Traitors and Rebels who had not been legally condemn'd. The Biſhop of Wincheſter, who upon theſe Occaſions was always Spokeſman for the King, anſwer'd this Remonſtrance after a manner ſo harſh and haughty, that the Biſhops threatned to excommunicate him. Mean time the Earl of Pembroke having retaken his Caſtle, which the King had refus'd to reſtore to him, the King march'd with a Deſign to go and chaſtiſe him; but to his Misfortune the Earl ſurpriz'd him in the Night, put his Army to the rout, and forced him to return to Glouceſter. After that time, the Earl growing more and more formidable, the Biſhop of Wincheſter contriv'd to have his Eſtate in Ireland ravag'd, and to draw him by that means into that Iſland, where he cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated.

AT length the Archbiſhop of Canterbury having remonſtrated to the King what Dangers he expos'd himſelf to by following the violent Counſels of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, prevail'd ſo, that this hateful Miniſter was diſcarded, together with Peter de Rivaux his Son, who paſs'd for his Nephew, Segrave, Paſſelew, and the other Natives of Poictou, on whom the King had conferr'd the moſt important Offices of State.

The new Queen brought into England Athelmar, one of her Brothers, who had been elected Biſhop of Valence, and afterwards became a Favourite of the King. So that the Engliſh Barons were no great Gainers by the Expulſion of the Poictovin Miniſters. The Parliament made ſuch a ſmart Complaint to the King of his continuing ſtill to repoſe all his Confidence in Foreigners, that the King fearing ſome Inſult from that Quarter, would fain have remov'd to the Tower; but the Barons refuſing to go thither, the King was obliged to return to Weſtminſter, and to promiſe them ſome Satisfaction of their Grievances. Not long after, inſtead of keeping his Word with the Barons, he recall'd his old Miniſters from Poictou, except the Biſhop of Wincheſter, who was gone to Rome. He was alſo inclinable to revoke all the Grants which he had made during his Nonage, on pretence that the Pope had not confirm'd them: But the Parliament refus'd their Conſent to ſuch Revocation, and chiefly on account of the Bull which the King founded his Plea upon.

HENRY III.

Old Miniſters recall'd from Poictou.

Parliament will not let him revoke his old Grants.

Anno 1237. THE King having a great occaſion for Money, and finding the Parliament not diſpos'd to give him any, promis'd upon his Honour to cauſe King John's two Charters to be obſerv'd; and on this Condition his Demand was granted.

Obtains Money of Parliament on promiſe of a regard to King John's Charters.

AT that time, Simon de Montfort began to be in the King's Favour. He marry'd the Counteſs of Pembroke, Siſter to the King, and was made Earl of Leiceſter. He was Son to the famous Simon de Montfort, General of the Cruſado againſt the Albigenſes. Prince Richard complain'd ſharply to the King againſt this Marriage, not only by reaſon of the Inequality of their Conditions, but becauſe Montfort had had the boldneſs to debauch their Siſter, who was big with Child when he marry'd her, and becauſe the King, without ſhewing any Reſentment, had cauſed the Marriage to be ſolemniz'd in his Chapel. Richard's Complaints oblig'd Montfort to go to Rome, there to get his Marriage confirm'd by the Pope. At his Return he was very well receiv'd by the King, who afterwards indeed was inclinable at one time to puniſh him for debauching his Siſter, but at laſt he reſtor'd him to his Favour and Confidence.

Simon de Montfort's Origin and Marriage.

The latter confirm'd by the Pope.

Anno 1238. FOREIGNERS ſtill encreaſing in Favour and Credit, Prince Richard, who was no leſs diſguſted than the Barons, put himſelf at the Head of 'em; and they all in a Body ſent to deſire the King, that he would pleaſe to remember what he had promis'd. The King choſe to amuſe them by a general Anſwer; but as 'twas not long e'er they all repair'd to London well accompany'd, the King was forced to comply, and to give his Conſent to a Regulation which was made for the Government of the Kingdom, tho' it was very ill obſerv'd.

The King's variable Diſpoſition towards him.

The King is forc'd to comply.

Anno 1239. HENRY had a Son born, to whom he gave the Name of Edward.

Anno 1240. IN the Year following, the King ſent Itinerant Juſtices into the Counties, on pretence of reforming certain Abuſes; but it was only to get a lump of Money by Fines and Forfeitures, which thoſe Judges inflicted for ſmall Faults, and by arbitrary Sentences. Prince Richard

HENRY III.

Richard ſet out this ſame Year to make a Voyage to the Holy Land.

Henry ſqueezes Money out of the Jews to entertain the Earl of Savoy.

THOMAS Earl of Savoy, Uncle to the Queen, arriving in England, in 1241, and the King wanting Money to give him a ſumptuous reception, he forc'd the Jews to raiſe him 20000 Marks, threatning otherwiſe to drive them out of the Kingdom.

Anno 1242. HENRY being engag'd in a War againſt France, demanded an Aid of the Parliament, but had the Mortification to meet with a flat Denial, accompany'd with tart Reproaches for the Non-obſervance of the Charters, and the Breach of his Promiſe. As he ſaw that he could get nothing of the Parliament, he had recourſe to diverſe unjuſtifiable and violent Methods of extorting Money from private Men; after which he went to Poictou. He had very ill Succeſs in this War. He was twice defeated, and forc'd to fly to Bourdeaux, where he obtain'd a truce for five Years. He ſpent the Winter there, but was ſo bare of Money that he had not wherewithal to defray the Expences of his Houſhold, inſtead of being able to pay his Troops, which ſuffer'd extremely for want of Proviſions, the Gaſcons refuſing to let them have ſubſiſtence. At laſt he wrote to the Archbiſhop of York, whom he had left Regent in England, to confiſcate the Eſtates of ſome of the Barons who had left the Army without Leave. But the Regent refus'd to execute this Order, for fear of kindling a Fire too difficult to quench. This Method failing, he gave Orders to the Archbiſhop to borrow of the Ciſtercian Friars one Year's Revenue of their Wool; but he could obtain nothing, and the Regent was ſenſible that to uſe Violence would be very dangerous. At laſt the Archbiſhop hearing that the King was in a poor plight, aſſembled the Parliament, who granted the King ſome Money, which came to him in a very good Seaſon; but it was ſoon conſum'd, and the Regent receiv'd a freſh Order to demand a Loan of Money of ſuch private Men as were reckon'd the moſt able to ſpare it. This Order was executed in part; but the Regent acquainted the King that this was the laſt ſhift he could make, and conjur'd him to return forthwith to his Kingdom. Theſe Intreaties oblig'd Henry to ſet out homewards, where he was no ſooner arriv'd, but he demanded a great Sum of the Jews.

THE Counteſs of Provence, Mother-in-Law to the King, arriv'd in England not long after, bringing with her Sanche her ſecond Daughter, to be marry'd to Prince Richard, whoſe firſt Wife was dead. The King was at the Expence of this Wedding, and 'tis ſaid that 30000 Diſhes were ſerv'd up at the Marriage Feaſt.

Marriage of Prince Richard.

Anno 1244. THE King conven'd the Parliament, and deſir'd a ſupply of Money; but he found the two Bodies of the Clergy, and the Nobility, ſo united together, that he not only foreſaw he ſhould obtain nothing, but that it was even dangerous to keep the Parliament ſitting any longer. For meaſures were already taken in it to deprive him of the Adminiſtration of the Government. For this Reaſon he prorogued them, after having made them a poſitive Promiſe, that at the next Seſſion he would give them all the Satisfaction they could wiſh for. When the Parliament met again, the King renew'd his Demand, and promis'd upon Oath to cauſe the two Charters to be executed; and he even conſented that the Biſhops ſhould excommunicate him if he broke his Promiſe. Which Declaration of his was the very thing that put him in poſſeſſion of what he deſir'd.

Parliament is prorogued becauſe they will not grant the King an Aid.

He obtains it at laſt on a promiſe to keep the Charters.

Anno 1245. HENRY had another Son born, to whom he gave the Name of Prince Edmund.

Prince Edmund born.

Anno 1247. Two Years after this, arriv'd in England three of the King's Brothers by the Mother's ſide, who were Sons to the Earl of Marche, and of the Queen Dowager, who after the Death of King John, marry'd that Earl to whom ſhe had formerly been contracted.

Arrival of the King's 3 half Brothers.

Anno 1248. THO' the King had promis'd upon Oath to have the two Charters obſerv'd, he had not perform'd his Promiſe. Notwithſtanding this, he again demanded a Supply of the Parliament, which met in the beginning of the Year 1248. but he receiv'd ſo ſharp an Anſwer from it, that he prorogued it inſtantly. At the next Seſſion he ſpoke very roughly to the Lords, and they anſwer'd him in the ſame Tone; which was the reaſon that the Parliament was diſſolv'd.

His Parliament prorogued and diſſolved, for taxing him with breach of his Promiſe.

Anno 1249. HENRY not being able to obtain any thing of the Parliament, and having a preſſing occaſion for Money, becauſe his Brothers, and the Queen's Relations ſpent a vaſt deal, ſold his Plate; and moreover, he demanded a great Sum of the City of London. He would alſo have fain borrow'd Money of ſome private Men; but as he was not belov'd, nor much confided in, this Method fail'd him.

The King ſells his Plate, and tries other vile means to raiſe Money.

Demands a Sum from London.

Anno 1250. THE next Year Henry being inform'd that the Gaſcons were upon the point of revolting, ſent Simon de Montfort Earl of Leiceſter into Guyenne, who found means to reconcile them to their Duty.

ample of the King of France, who was already set out upon the like Design. Not that Henry intended to perform such Engagement, but he thought it was a sure way to bring Money into his Coffers, and that the Parliament would not venture to refuse him any Sum when he demanded it upon this pretence. A multitude of People follow'd his Example, and prepar'd to make a Voyage to Palestine. But when they were ready to set out, the King, who had made no Preparation on his part, obtain'd a Prohibition from the Pope to the Croises, to set out without him, and by that means the Expence they had been at became of no effect. Mean time, tho' the King of France's Expedition was attended with ill Success, because that Prince fell into the hands of the Infidels, Henry still pretended an Inclination to set out forthwith. But as he wanted Money, and did not dare to ask it of the Parliament, after he had so ill executed his Promises, he appointed Commissioners to go into the Counties, to inquire into the Misdemeanors committed in the Forests. This Commission procur'd the King a great deal of Money; but the Vexations exercis'd by the Commissioners occasion'd a universal murmuring.

Pope forbids the Croises to set out before him.

Inquisitions touching the Forests.

Anno 1251. THE Earl of Leicester being return'd to give an account to the King of the Command which he had in Guyenne, he brought Guy de Lusignan, one of his Brothers by the Mother's side, whom the King mightily caress'd and loaded with Presents. His Brothers, and the Queen's Kindred swallowed up all his Revenues, and every Penny that he could raise elsewhere by such ways and means as were not always lawful.

Return of Guy de Lusignan the King's half Brother, whom he loads with Presents.

Anno 1252. THE Gascons were so dissatisfy'd with the Earl of Leicester, that they made great Complaints against him to the King, and accus'd him of having tyranniz'd over them in an extraordinary manner. Hereupon the King sent Commissioners into Guyenne to know the Truth of it. But tho' those Commissioners at their Return fully discharg'd the Earl, yet the Gascons renew'd their Complaints; and the Archbishop of Bourdeaux came to Court to plead against him, in quality of Deputy from the whole Province of Guyenne. This Prelate so artfully turn'd the King's Mind, by possessing him with the Fear that he would lose all Guyenne if the Earl was not punish'd, that the King took up a Resolution to make a Sacrifice of that Nobleman to the Gascons. But the Earl found so many Friends among the Lords before whom he was oblig'd to make his Appearance, and defended himself with such good Arguments, that he render'd the Archbishop's Complaints of no effect. The King perceiving that he could not accomplish what he had undertaken, fell into a violent Passion, and told the Earl of Leicester that he was a Traitor. The Earl being stung with this Reproach, and forgetting that he spoke to his Sovereign, told him to his Face that he ly'd, in presence of all the Peers. One would have thought that an Insult of this nature would not have been easily pardon'd; but the King did not dare either to take Revenge himself, or to cause the Earl to be apprehended, because he observ'd that all the Peers were in a disposition to espouse this Nobleman's Quarrel. He was actually oblig'd in a manner to be reconcil'd to him, tho' it was only in outward appearance, and to send him back to Guyenne. But not long after, that he might have a pretence to take that Government from him, he invested his eldest Son Prince Edward in the Duchy of Guyenne.

THIS Affair being ended, the King attempted to obtain an extraordinary Subsidy of the Clergy, to enable him to support the Charges of his pretended Voyage to the Holy Land, but the Clergy were inflexible.

He demands a Subsidy of the Clergy.

Anno 1253. HENRY imagin'd that he had prevented the Revolt of the Gascons, by removing the Earl of Leicester from the Government of Guyenne, but he was ignorant how Things stood in that Country. The Gascons had only acted against the Earl to remove too vigilant a Governour, and that they might have the better Success in the Conspiracy they had form'd to deliver up Guyenne to the King of Castille, who began immediately after this Earl's Departure, to declare openly that he had Pretensions to this Duchy. Henry perceiving himself in danger of losing Guyenne, resolv'd to go into that Country himself, in order to secure it: But foreseeing that it would be a hard matter for him to get the Money from the Parliament, which was necessary for that Voyage, he made the Expedition to the Holy Land his Pretence, and demanded a Supply proportionable to his Necessities. The Parliament readily granted it, but it was upon condition that sufficient Security should be given for the Observation of the two Charters, and the King was willing to consent to it. The Security was, that all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal went into the Great Hall at Westminster, where the Archbishop denounc'd a Curse upon those that for the future, directly or indirectly, oppos'd the Execution of the two Charters. This done, the Lords, who had each of 'em a Wax Taper in his Hand, threw their Tapers on the Ground, wishing that they who should violate the Charters, might smoke after the same manner in Hell. The King did not care to carry a Taper, but he always held his Hand to his Heart during the whole Ceremony, as a Mark of the ſincere Approbation which he gave to the Anathema. Mean time the Parliament was no ſooner diſſolv'd, but he deſir'd the Pope to give him a Diſpenſation from his Oath.

Henry's Departure for Guyenne.

HENRY being ſet out for Guyenne, made ſome Progreſs there at firſt againſt the Rebels, who were Friends to the King of Caſtille; but as he knew himſelf to be in no condition to maintain an Army in that Country as long as it would be neceſſary, he found Means to rid himſelf of that Difficulty, by ſending to the King of Caſtille, to deſire one of his Daughters in Marriage for Edward his eldeſt Son. This Propoſal being accepted, the King of Caſtille yielded up his Pretenſions to Guyenne to his future Son-in-Law, and the Marriage was conſummated next Year.

The King of Caſtille's Daughter marry'd to Prince Edward.

Henry tries to get Money from the Parliament, on pretence of the War in Guyenne.

As this Negotiation had been kept ſecret, Henry was willing to make a Trial if he could force the Parliament to do ſomething more for him, under pretence of the Danger which Guyenne was in of being invaded by the Caſtillians. But when the Queen, who was Regent in the King's Abſence, went to make this Demand, the Lords, who knew more of the matter than ſhe imagin'd, made anſwer, that they would hold themſelves in a readineſs to ſerve the King with their Perſons, upon the firſt Advice they ſhould have that the Caſtillians were enter'd into Guyenne. The King not being able to get any thing from the Parliament, return'd to England thro' France, where Lewis being lately come back from his Slavery among the Infidels, paid him all the Honours due to his Rank. He was ſcarce arriv'd at London, but upon ſome Pretence or other he demanded a Preſent from that City.

ARTICLE II.

Affairs of Henry III. with France.

Philip of France his Death and Successor, who refuses to perform his Oath.

PHILIP Augustus dy'd in 1223 and was succeeded by Lewis VIII. his Son. As soon as this Prince was upon the Throne, Henry sent Ambassadors to challenge the performance of the Engagement he had enter'd into when he left England, to restore to him those Provinces which Philip his Father had taken from King John. But whether the Promise he made was not so positive as Henry pretended, or whatever else was the reason, he made answer that he would submit it to the Judgment of the Court of Peers; which was the same thing as a Denial.

NEXT Year Lewis caus'd all Henry's Territories in France to be confiscated. His pretence for it was, that Henry had not assisted at his Consecration; but according to all appearance, the true reason was, that he had a mind to take the Advantage of Henry's Minority to rob him of his Domains.

He attacks Saintonge and Rochel.

IN pursuance of that Confiscation he march'd into Saintonge, and after having made himself Master of some little Places, he besieg'd Rochel, which was surrender'd to him in a few Days, by Savary de Mauleon the Governour of it, who enter'd into his Service. This unexpected Attack having convinc'd Henry's Council of the necessity of opposing the Designs of the King of France betimes, the Parliament was conven'd, and it was therein resolv'd to raise an Army, and Prince Richard the King's Brother was sent into Guyenne to command it, having under him the Earl of Salisbury, who was Bastard Brother of King John. Richard presently took possession of the Town of St. Macaire which revolted, and then besieg'd Reole, of which the Earl of Marche caus'd him to raise the Siege. The French Historians say that this Prince retir'd on the other side of the Dourdogne, and that soon after he return'd to England. But 'tis certain that he was still in Guyenne Anno 1227. The Detail of this War, concerning which the Historians of the two Nations are not agreed, would be of no Service here. It will be sufficient to mention, that before it was ended, Lewis being declar'd General of the Crusado against the Albigenses, obtain'd an Order from the Pope to Henry to suspend Hostilities, while he was taken up in this Expedition. Lewis dy'd at Perpignan in 1226, leaving for his Successor his Son Lewis IX. a Minor, under the Government of Blanche of Castile his Mother.

An Army sent into Guyenne under Prince Richard.

Lewis VIII. Head of the Crusado against the Albigenses.

His Death and Successor. 457.

Troubles in France.

Anno 1228. THE Regency of this foreign Queen bred Discontents in France, that at length rose to a Civil War, of which Henry might have made great Advantage, if he had taken Time by the Forelock. But whether it was owing to his extreme Blindness, or to the Treachery of his Ministers, he let the fair Opportunity slip; and it was upon this occasion that he was going to lay violent Hands upon Hubert de Burgh.

Anno 1229. AT last when it was too late, he went and landed at St. Malo, where the Duke of Bretagne receiv'd

* SEE the Letters Patent, of which Mr. Rymer has caus'd a part to be engrav'd. There's a Gold Seal, of the Weight of about a Mark Sterling, fix'd to this Patent, of which Matth. Paris makes special mention: There are likewise other very particular Ornaments. Mr. Rymer was of Opinion, that this is an Act not unlike those Privileges which are call'd in Spanish, Privilleios Rodados, from the Mark of a Wheel in the Royal Signature.

† IT appears by some Acts, that the Jews then in England endeavour'd, according to Custom, to make an Interest at Court. For certain Services which two Jew Brothers Cresse, and Hagen, had perform'd to Richard his Brother, the King discharg'd them in 1257 from all Taxes, &c. for five Years, on paying down a Mark and a half of Gold, of which the said Cresse, who was Son to Mr. Moses a Jew at London, was to pay the Mark, and Hagen the half. By a Patent of this Year, the King deposed a Jew nam'd Elias, whom he calls a Bishop and Sacrificer of the Jews, which is as much as to say a Rabbi, for a Fault he had committed against his Majesty, and against Richard King of the Romans. The two Jews above-mention'd gave the King three Marks of Gold, to obtain Leave for the Society of Jews in England to chuse whom they pleas'd for Rabbi.

him, and put his ſtrongeſt Places into his Hands. The French having had all the Winter to make their Preparations, were poſted in Anjou, where Henry gave them all the time that was neceſſary to fortify themſelves, and to hinder his Paſſage into Poictou. Mean time, the Malecontents of France taking freſh Courage when they heard that the King of England was in Bretagne, the Army of France was oblig'd to quit Anjou, in order to go and oppoſe their Deſigns. Then was the time for Henry to have acted vigorouſly, the rather, becauſe the Normans offer'd to receive him in their Country. But inſtead of improving this opportunity, he went to Guyenne, there to receive the Oath of Allegiance of the Gaſcons. Afterwards he return'd to Bretagne, where he trifled away his time, and embark'd at laſt for England, when he heard that the Army of France was coming down upon him, after having reduc'd the Malecontents to their Duty. This Conduct gave the People of England ſo bad an Opinion of him, that from that time the Parliament would grant him no more Money for ſuch Expeditions. This War was determin'd without any Treaty either of Peace or Truce. The King of France who had attack'd the Duke of Bretagne, forc'd him at laſt to ſubmit to his own Terms, and Henry did nothing to ſupport the Duke, who put himſelf under his Protection.

Marches into Guyenne, and returns to Bretagne and England.

Anno 1241. THERE was a new War betwixt Lewis IX. and Henry, from which the latter, according to Cuſtom, came off very badly. Henry having inveſted his Brother Prince Richard in the Earldom of Poictou, Lewis who poſſeſs'd part of that Province, made a Preſent to Alphonſus his Brother, of that part which was in his Power, and gave him the Inveſtiture of it. Hugh de Luſignan Earl of Marche, who had marry'd Henry's Mother, and whoſe Eſtate lay in that part of Poictou which had been juſt given to the Prince Alphonſus, had always perform'd Homage for it to the King of France; but the Pride of the Queen his Wife would not ſuffer her to ſee her Husband bend the Knee to Alphonſus. Therefore ſhe teaz'd him to ſuch a degree, that at laſt ſhe perſuaded him to refuſe paying Homage to the new Earl of Poictou. But as he plainly foreſaw that the King of France would not let ſuch a Neglect paſs unpuniſh'd, he engag'd Henry to make War upon France, and promis'd him a Force ſufficient to drive the French out of all Poictou, provided he would defray the Expence of the War. Henry accepted of his Offers, and repair'd to Poictou, but he found things there far ſhort of what he had been made to expect. His Army was very weak, and much inferior to that of Lewis, which was already enter'd into the Province, and beſieging Fontenay. Tho' Henry was in no condition to force him to raiſe the Siege, yet he ſent Ambaſſadors to him to demand of him all the Provinces which the King his Father had engag'd to reſtore, and in caſe of refuſal, to declare War againſt him. Lewis, who was canoniz'd after his Death, had a tender Conſcience, and in all appearance had ſome ſcruple of Mind concerning the Engagement of the King his Father. He offer'd therefore to reſtore to Henry part of Poictou and Normandy, and to conſent to a Truce of three Years, provided he would deſiſt from protecting the Earl of Marche. But Henry rejected theſe Offers, how advantagious ſoever they were as things then ſtood with him. Mean time, Lewis having made himſelf Maſter of Fontenay, advanc'd towards Henry, who had retir'd behind the Charente; but Lewis having gain'd the Bridge of Taillebourg, and being got over to the other ſide, gave him ſuch a terrible ſhock, that he forc'd him to fly to Xaintes, where he again defeated great part of his Army. Theſe two Loſſes one upon the Neck of another, oblig'd Henry to go and ſhut himſelf up in Bourdeaux. Mean time the Earl of Marche made his ſeparate Peace with Lewis, and left the King of England to ſhift for himſelf as well as he could. Nothing could have hinder'd Lewis from carrying his victorious Arms into Guyenne, but the Plague in his Army, which made him willing to grant Henry a Truce of five Years.

Affairs of Henry III. with Scotland.

THE Affairs which paſs'd betwixt England and Scotland during the Reign of Henry III. were of no great Conſequence; ſo that this Article will not be long.

King of Scotland's Homage to Henry.

THE King of Scotland, who had perform'd Homage to Lewis, when that Prince was call'd into England by the Barons, embraced the Offer made to him to be compriz'd in the Treaty which was concluded betwixt Henry and Lewis in 1217. As ſoon as he heard that Lewis was return'd into France, he repair'd to England, where he perform'd Homage to Henry for the Lands he held in that Kingdom, and reſtor'd Carliſle to him, which he had taken during the Civil War.

His Marriage to Henry's Siſter.

Anno 1221. HENRY made a Progreſs to York, where he agreed to the Marriage of Joanna his Siſter with Alexander II. King of Scotland. This Princeſs, who had been contracted to the Son of the Earl of Marche, being in the hands of her intended Father-in-Law, it was no eaſy matter to get her away: But at length the Earl ſent her back to the King her Brother, and her Nuptials with the King of Scotland were celebrated.

Anno 1236. HENRY being not much dreaded by his Neighbours, by reaſon of the Miſunderſtanding that prevail'd between him and the Barons, Alexander renew'd his Pretenſions to Northumberland, and demanded that Province with an air of Bully, which the Kings of Scotland did not uſe to ſhew to the Kings of England. Henry, far from repaying him the ſame Language, took a Journey to York, there to negotiate a Treaty with him, and made no ſcruple to purchaſe a Peace, by granting him a Penſion of 80 Marks of Silver.

Henry's diſhonourable Treaty with him.

Death of the Queen of Scotland.

HENRY's Siſter Joanna Queen of Scotland dying in 1238, and Alexander having marry'd a French Woman to his ſecond Wife, ſignified to Henry that he would pay him Homage no longer. He expected that Henry, as he had done before, would decide this Affair by a Negotiation, in which he hoped to be a Gainer: But the Parliament was ſo incens'd at this Bravado, that a War with Scotland was reſolv'd on, and an Army immediately rais'd, which march'd as far as Newcaſtle. When Alexander ſaw the Engliſh ſo near him, he deſir'd a Peace, which Henry readily granted him, on condition that he would perform the ſame Homage as his Predeceſſors.

He ſues for Peace.

His Death and Succeſſor.

THIS Prince dy'd in 1249, leaving for his Succeſſor his Son Alexander III. a Minor, who in 1251 marry'd Margaret the Daughter of Henry III. The two Kings repairing to York, where the Nuptials were to be celebrated, Henry would fain have engag'd the young King his Son-in-Law to perform Homage to him for the whole Kingdom of Scotland. But Alexander, tho' earneſtly preſs'd to it, made a handſome Excuſe, and only pay'd the ſame Homage as his Predeceſſors had done for the Lands he held of England. And with this Henry was ſatisfied; either becauſe he did not think he was right in his Demand, or becauſe he had not a mind to diſturb the Feaſt. We ſhall find hereafter that Henry's Son Edward I. left no Stone unturn'd, but made it his Buſineſs to improve his pretended Right; for the Eſtabliſhment of which the King his Father had only made a ſlight Attempt.

ARTICLE IV. HENRY III.

Affairs of Henry III. with the Princes of Wales.

THE Welsh were the Descendants from the ancient Britons, who having been drove out of their Country by the English Saxons, retir'd to a mountainous Country situate on the West of the Severn. The Saxons call'd that Country the Country of the Gauls, because they suppos'd that the Britons were of Gallish Extract. Therefore when they gave that Country the Name of the Gauls Country, they thereby intended to denote that it was the Country to which the Britons were retir'd, in order to distinguish it from the rest of Britain, which they themselves had conquer'd. As to the Britons or Welsh, they call'd themselves Cambri, and the Country situate on the West side of the Severn, to which they retir'd, retain'd among them the Name of Cambria. This was probably the Name they gave to the Country which they inhabited in the Isle of Great Britain, tho' the Greeks and Romans had only known it by the Name of Britannia, which was the Appellation given to the Island by Foreigners.

Origin of the Welsh.

AFTER the English Saxons had made themselves Masters of Britain, there were continual Wars betwixt them and the Welsh, who inhabited on the other side of the Severn, but the former could never make themselves Masters of Wales. After the Dissolution of the Heptarchy, the Saxon Kings made several Attempts to conquer it; but all that they could do was to keep it in some sort of Dependance on their Crown. The Norman and Angevin Kings who reign'd in England after the Conquest, very often attempted likewise to make themselves Masters of it, but always in vain. Indeed they frequently compell'd the Princes of Wales to pay them Homage, but this Dependance lasted no longer than while it was exacted by force of Arms. Whenever the Kings of Their History.

A Mistake of Buchanan in the History of this King rectify'd. p. 278, 327.

HE observes also in his Preface, that George Buchanan, in the seventh Book of his History of Scotland, was in the wrong to charge Henry III. King of England, with Breach of his Promise to match the two Sisters of Alexander King of Scotland, his Brother-in-Law, within a certain time, because it appears by two Acts in this Collection, that they were actually marry'd. There is first of all a Declaration of King Henry, dated June 15, 1220, by which he promises to give his eldest Sister Joan, when she came into his Hands (for she was then with the Earl of Marche in France) to Alexander King of Scotland, by Michaelmas Day following; or if he could not get her over, that then he would match his youngest Sister Isabel to the said King Alexander in the space of a Fortnight after; and that he would match the two Sisters of the said Prince, who were Margaret and Isabel, in England, within a Year, reckoning from St. Dennis's Day, 1220. If Henry broke his Word, it was only in point of Time; because it appears by an Act of May 12, 1225, that the said Isabel was then marry'd to the Son of the Count le Bigod; and by another, dated November 13, 1252, that the other Sister, Margaret, was marry'd to Hubert du Burgo. p. 278. p. 327.

IT appears likewise by the Acts of the Year 1221, that the Earl of Marche, who marry'd the Mother of Henry King of England, after the Death of his Father, sent him his Sister Joan, and that she was marry'd to the King of Scotland. This seems to have been the Motive of King Henry's restoring to his Mother the Lands that were assign'd to her in England for her Dowry, as appears by two Acts of the Year 1222. Nevertheless they had Disputes afterwards, in which the Pope intermeddled, as may be seen by other Acts. p. 253.

* ACCORDING to Skene de verb. signif. verbo Bovatæ terræ, Librata terræ contains four Ox-gangs, and every Ox-gang 13 Acres. In the Regist. Orig. fol. 1. B. Librata terræ is suppos'd to amount to twelve score Acres. And in the same Regist. fol. 94. A. and fol. 248. B. it seems that Librata terræ is so much Land as yieldeth 20 s. per Annum.

UNDER the Reign of King John, Lewellyn * Prince of Wales taking advantage of the Difference which happen'd betwixt the King and the Barons, ſeiz'd ſeveral Places which the Engliſh had taken from his Predeceſſors, and was excommunicated by the Legate who was ſent over to England to favour the King's Party. Peace being reſtor'd in the Kingdom by the Treaty which was concluded in 1217, betwixt Henry III. and Prince Lewis, the Regent, whoſe Aim was to eſtabliſh the young King firmly on the Throne, did not think it adviſable to undertake a new War for the ſake of diſpoſſeſſing Lewellyn of thoſe Places which he had taken. He choſe rather to grant him an honourable and advantagious Peace, on condition that he ſhould perform Homage to the Crown of England. Lewellyn preceiving the Troubles of England at an end, accepted the Peace, and after having perform'd his Homage, receiv'd Abſolution from the Legate.

War with the Welſh.

TEN Years after, viz. Anno 1228, the Welſh being deſirous to take Advantage of the univerſal Diſguſt in England occaſion'd by the Revocation of the Charters, made Incurſions into the Counties that lay near theirs, and by ſo doing engag'd Henry to bring an Army upon their Frontiers. But as he was not a Prince of a warlike Genius, he had ill Succeſs in his Expedition, and return'd without having done any thing conſiderable.

The Prince makes a League with the Earl of Pembroke againſt Henry.

AFTERWARDS, Anno 1233, Lewellyn eſpous'd the Intereſt of the Earl of Pembroke, and made a League with him againſt the King. Had it not been for the Prince of Wales's Aſſiſtance, the Earl of Pembroke could not have ſtood his Ground. After the Death of this Nobleman, who was kill'd in Ireland, Henry ſent the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhop of Cheſter, to the Prince of Wales, with whom they concluded a Peace.

Another Peace with the Welſh.

Anno 1237, Lewellyn who was grown old and infirm, finding himſelf perſecuted by Griffin his Son, put himſelf under the Protection of the King of England, and paid him that Homage voluntarily which his Predeceſſors never did without being forc'd to it.

Prince of Wales does Homage to Henry.

THIS Prince died in 1241, leaving his Dominions to David and Griffin his Sons, who were to ſhare them equally, but David ſeiz'd his Brother's Portion, and ſhut him up in a Priſon. Griffin's Wife finding her Husband robb'd and impriſon'd, made Application to the King of England, and promis'd him in her Husband's Name a Preſent of 600 Marks, and a yearly Tribute of 300, if he would releaſe him from Priſon, and put him in Poſſeſſion of his Rights. Henry accepted of this Offer, and ſent a Summons to David to ſet his Brother at Liberty. David finding himſelf preſs'd, determin'd with himſelf to gain the King of England's good Will, by making him Offers which were much more advantagious than thoſe of his Brother; and Henry accepted them without Heſitation. He actually took upon him to ſee that Griffin ſhould be remov'd under a Guard to the Tower of London, to which this Prince was committed; and as he attempted three Years after to make his Eſcape out at a Window, he fell into the Ditch and broke his Neck.

Hit Death and Diſpute betwixt his Sons.

Anno 1244. DAVID was no ſooner rid of his Brother, but he fell out with Henry; and upon ſome very far-fetch'd Pretence, made Incurſions upon the Engliſh Frontiers. Henry making no Stir to repel this Inſult, the Country People themſelves took Arms in their own Defence, but were always beaten. This was juſt at the time that an Engliſh Army was on the march towards Scotland, which having no occaſion to act, by reaſon of the Peace which was concluded betwixt Henry and Alexander, the Prince of Wales did not doubt but it would be turn'd againſt him. On this Suppoſition, as he was in no condition to make Reſiſtance againſt ſo ſtrong a Force, he wrote word to the Pope, that he had been compell'd to perform Homage to the King of England, and to pay him a Tribute of 5000 Marks, by a Treaty which had been extorted from him. Therefore he deſir'd the Pope to diſcharge him from his Oath, and to annul the Treaty, upon his Offer to perform Homage to the Holy See, and to pay it the ſame Tribute as he paid to the King of England. Innocent IV. who was then in the Papal Chair, was far from refuſing this Offer. Yet to give ſome Colour to the Undertaking, he gave Commiſſion to two Abbots of Wales to enquire into the Affair; and if they ſhould find that David had been forc'd, he gave them a Power to abſolve him from his Oath, and to make the Treaty void. Theſe two Abbots having had the Inſolence to ſummon the King before them, the Parliament was ſo enrag'd at it, that a War with Wales was resolv'd on in the Year 1245, but it was faintly carry'd on by the English, who were always beaten: At last in 1246, Henry going to put himself at the Head of his Army, the Welsh retir'd to their Mountains, where it was not possible to overtake them; for which Reason Henry, after having caus'd a Castle to be built in an advantagious Place, retir'd. David dying a little while after without Issue, was succeeded by his Nephew Lewellyn, Griffin's Son.

FROM that time, the English and Welsh liv'd in a good Understanding for ten Years. But in 1256, Henry having given the Welsh some Cause of Disgust, they took up Arms and made Incursions into England. Prince Edward, who was then about 17 Years of Age, was very eager for repulsing them; but he could not accomplish it, because for want of Money he was very ill serv'd by his Troops.

Anno 1257. AT length the Progress of the Welsh oblig'd the King to march in Person into their Country. But as at his approach they laid waste their own Lands, and then retir'd to their Mountains, he was forc'd to halt. Mean time, while he thought his Enemies at a great distance from him, they surpriz'd him on a sudden, and put his Army to the Rout. After that time, other Affairs hinder'd the English from continuing the War.

ARTICLE V.

Henry IIId's Affairs with the Court of Rome.

Henry's Homage to the Pope's Legate.

Anno 1216. IMMEDIATELY after his Coronation, Henry III. perform'd Homage to the Pope before the Legate; the Regent who thought fit to engage the Court of Rome in the Interests of the young King, confirming by this Homage what had been done by the King his Father. He wrote to the Pope at the same time to acquaint him with the Death of John, and the Coronation of Henry, and to desire his Protection for this young Prince. The Pope was far from neglecting his own Interests on such an occasion as this, when the Point in Question was the Preservation of England, which was become the Patrimony of St. Peter. Therefore in order to favour Henry all that lay in his Power, he sent a new Legate to England, who renew'd and aggravated the Excommunication against Lewis and all his Adherents: And Lewis on his part solemnly protested against every thing that the Legate should do to his Prejudice.

Pope's Legate proceeds against the Clergy that adher'd to Lewis.

THE Treaty which was concluded the Year following, viz. 1217, betwixt Henry and Lewis, was not strong enough to shelter those Clergymen who had adher'd to a foreign Prince, from the Resentment of the Pope. Tho' it provided in express Terms, that no Person should be call'd to account for having espous'd Lewis's Party; yet the Legate pretended that the Clergy could not be included in this Article, because as they had disobey'd the Pope by not observing the Interdict, it was an Affair which related to Religion, and with which the two Princes had no Concern. Therefore they who were guilty of this Crime, were forc'd to purchase their Pardons with great Sums of Money, the Regent refusing to protect them, for fear of drawing down the Pope's Anger upon the King, at a time when he was scarce settled on the Throne.

HENRY III.

He demands the promis'd Tenths.

An extraordinary demand of the Pope.

Anno 1226. THE Pope ſent a new Legate to England, who demanded at his Arrival that the Parliament might be called, to conſider of a Propoſal which he had to make from the Pope. His Demand being granted him, he propos'd, that by the Authority of Parliament two Prebends might be ſet apart for the Pope in every Cathedral, and two Monks Portions in every Monaſtery. He back'd his Propoſal with theſe Reaſons: That it had been publickly complain'd for a long time that the Court of Rome granted no Favour without Money; that to wipe off this Scandal, there was an abſolute neceſſity of removing the Cauſe that produced it, viz. the extreme Poverty of the Holy See, and to provide for its Neceſſities after another manner. The Parliament having ſeparated without returning any Anſwer to this Propoſition, the Legate took a Journey into the Northern Counties, where he ſo oppreſs'd the Churches, that they were forced to complain to the Pope, who recall'd him for fear of exaſperating the Engliſh, and prejudicing his Demand; from which the Pope was ſo far from receding, that on the contrary he enjoin'd the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to get the Parliament conven'd again, and to inſiſt ſtrenuouſly upon the Demand which had been made by his Legate; but he could not obtain any thing.

Pope inſiſts upon it, but in vain.

IN 1227. Honorius III. was ſucceeded by Gregory IX.

Death of Archbiſhop Langton, and the Election of another, whom the King refuſes to confirm.

CARDINAL Langton, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, dying next Year, the Monks of St. Auſtin immediately choſe one of their Brethren, without any Leave had from the King. But the King refuſing to acknowledge him, and the Suffragan Biſhops denying their Conſent to the Election, there was a neceſſity of carrying this Affair to Rome. As the Pope was in no great haſte to determine it, the King, without conſulting the Parliament, made an Offer to him of the tenth Part of the Moveables of England and Ireland, provided he would vacate the Election. This Offer ſo weaken'd the Title of the Archbiſhop elect, that the Pope annull'd his Election, and at the ſame time with his own Authority, confer'd the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury on Richard le Grand, a Canon of Lincoln, who probably had been recommended to him by the King. Tho' this was a manifeſt Injuſtice, the King was far from complaining of it, and the Suffragan Biſhops were content, after they had ſeen the Election by the Monks of St. Auſtin made void. Not long after, the Pope ſent a Nuncio into England to receive what had been promis'd to him. The King having aſſembled a Parliament upon this occaſion, the Lords ſtrenuouſly oppos'd the Pope's Demand: But ſome of them having been gain'd over by Promiſes, and others frighten'd by Threats, the Nuncio at length obtain'd his Ends: Afterwards, in purſuance of a Power which he had from the Pope, he himſelf levy'd that Tax with ſo much Rigour, that he compelled the People to pay him the Tenth of the Fruits which were not yet gather'd. Moreover, he forced the Biſhops to advance the Money for the reſt of the Clergy, and left them a Power to reimburſe themſelves afterwards. As to thoſe who had no Money ready, the Nuncio had a Remedy at hand, for he carried with him Italian Uſurers, who lent it to them at extravagant Intereſt.

Pope nominates another.

THE Archbiſhop of Canterbury having ſome Difference with the King, ſet out in 1231, to carry his Complaints to the Pope. That Prelate dying this very Year at Rome, the Friars of St. Auguſtin choſe the Biſhop of Chicheſter in his place, and the King put him in poſſeſſion of the Temporalities of the Archbiſhoprick. But the Pope being inform'd that the Archbiſhop elect was too much a Dependant on the Court, made the Election void, and order'd the Monks to proceed to another. The ſecond Election, which was in 1232, not being to the Pope's liking, he would needs have a third, which fell upon Richard Bland, a Profeſſor of Divinity at Oxford, whom the Pope did not like neither. But at laſt, for fear that the Monks ſhould miſtake again, he gave them a Power to elect Edmund a Canon of Salisbury, who was actually choſe, and confirm'd by the Pope.

And a third.

THIS ſame Pope publiſh'd a Cruſado in 1236, becauſe the Truce which Frederick II. had made with the Saracens was on the point of expiration: A multitude of People took up the Croſs on ſuppoſition that a War would now be made upon the Infidels in good earneſt; but while Preparations were making for the Voyage, the Pope iſſued a Bull, whereby he excuſed the Croiſes from their Vow, on paying a Tax which he impos'd on each of them.

A Cruſado publiſh'd.

IN 1237 the Pope ſent a new Legate named Otho into England, tho' there did not ſeem to be any neceſſity for one then; but it appear'd afterwards that the King had requir'd one, that he might make uſe of his Power and Protection againſt the Barons who threaten'd him.

ing a Body of Engliſh Troops to the Emperor's Service, that for ſome time the Engliſh Clergy there were very ill receiv'd. But the King and the Pope ſtood too much in need of one another to continue long at variance. The Biſhop of Wincheſter dying this ſame Year, the King recommended the Biſhop of Valence to the Chapter of that Church, who was the Queen's Brother: But without Regard to ſuch Recommendation, the Chapter elected the Biſhop of Chicheſter; which Election not being agreeable to the King, he made Advances towards a *Reconciliation with the Pope, and at length got it to be annull'd.

Death of the Biſhop of Wincheſter. Henry recommends the Queen's Brother to that See.

Anno 1239. AFTER the Legate Otho came to England, he never ceas'd extorting Money from the Clergy, on various Pretences. His Exactions were puſh'd to ſuch a degree, that the Clergy complain'd of him to the Pope, who had a great mind to recall him, but the King ſtill oppos'd it. At laſt, the Clergy ſeeing that there was no End of the Oppreſſions which they ſuffer'd from the Legate, had an extraordinary Aſſembly to conſider of ſome Remedy for that Evil, and were no ſooner met, but the Legate demanded of them a Supply of Money for the preſſing Neceſſities of the Holy See: But he was told in plain Terms, that the Clergy were reſolv'd to bear his Oppreſſions no longer: And then the Aſſembly ſeparated, for fear of giving the Legate an Opportunity to inſiſt upon his Demand. However, the Pope was no Loſer by it, becauſe the Legate made the Monaſteries pay what he had thought fit to demand of the Clergy.

The Legate's Exactions.

He demands a Subſidy of the Biſhops, who deny him.

THIS Legate, who was always inſatiable, not content with having pillag'd England with Impunity, had a mind to do the ſame in Scotland: But when he came upon the Frontier, he there found the King of Scotland, who ſtay'd to prevent his Entrance into that Kingdom, and actually gave him to underſtand, that his Perſon would not be ſafe among a People who were not accuſtom'd to ſee the Pope's Legates. The Legate inſiſted on his Entrance, and even threaten'd to excommunicate the King of Scotland, who did not ſeem to be much concern'd at it. At laſt, ſome Lords interpoſing to accommodate them, the King conſented he ſhould enter Scotland as a private Perſon, on condition that he would by a Writing ſign'd with his own Hand, acknowledge that when he had that Permiſſion granted him, it was not in regard to his Dignity, but only to his Perſon. Notwithſtanding this, when he came to Edinburgh, he extorted ſome Money from the Clergy of Scotland; and that was the only Buſineſs of his Journey.

The Legate makes a freſh Attempt upon Scotland.

HENRY III.

Extorts Money from the Clergy there.

THE King favour'd the Court of Rome upon all Occaſions, becauſe the Pope's Protection was the only Remedy he had againſt the Diſcontent of his Subjects. In order not to diſoblige the Pope, he had given Leave that the Excommunication of the Emperor his Brother-in-Law ſhould be publiſh'd in all the Churches of England; and when the Emperor † thought fit to complain of it, he told him, that as he was a Vaſſal of the Holy See, he could not diſpenſe with his Obedience to the Pope's Orders. After this, 'tis no Wonder that the Legate continued to oppreſs the Clergy of England with all the Severity imaginable, becauſe he was ſure of being ſupported by the King. But the Clergy was not the only Body that ſuffer'd; for in the Year 1240, the Legate made Proclamation throughout the Kingdom, that he had not only a Power to excuſe the Croiſes from their Vow, but alſo to compel them on pain of Excommunication, to compound for their Abſolution by Money.

IMMEDIATELY after this, the ſaid Legate demanded of the Clergy the Fifth Part of all their Goods, to go towards the Defence of the Church againſt the Attacks of the Emperor. The Biſhops at firſt loudly refus'd what was demanded of them; but at laſt the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was willing to live in Peace, made the Clergy conſent to give the Fifth Part of their Revenues. The Legate accepted of the Gift, but with as much Difficulty as if he had been giving his Maſter's Money to the Clergy. The Archbiſhop ſeeing there was no way to turn the Heart either of the King or the Pope, and deſiring to ſpend the remainder of his Life in quiet, retir'd to the Monaſtery of Pontigny in France, where he dy'd that ſame Year with the Character Retirement and Death of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

* THIS Reconciliation was made in Preſence of the Pope's Legate, and was ſign'd, according to Cuſtom, by many Biſhops and Barons of England. What is ſurprizing here, is, that the very next Piece is a Letter from the King of Scotland to the Pope, whom he calls Innocent, tho' the then Pope's Name was Gregory, and Innocent was his Succeſſor.

† IT is pity that there were not more Facts in the Emperor's Writings, and leſs of the Rhetoric of that time, which is by no means pleaſant to read. It appears by the Emperor's Complaint, that his Brother-in-Law, the King of England, was very much inclin'd to favour the Pope, who perhaps, to reward him, wrote over into England the next Year, which was 1239, to order that no Perſons diſagreeable to the King, ſhould be elected to the Sees of Wincheſter and Durham; for at that time of day, the King did not dare to nominate to Biſhopricks.

THIS Prelate was no ſooner gone, but a new Nuncio came, one Peter Roſſi, who brought a Liſt of Three hundred Italians, on whom the Pope order'd the firſt vacant Benefices ſhould be conferr'd, notwithſtanding all Right of Election, Patronage, or any other whatſoever. But that was not the only Motive of his Voyage: He had a more important Commiſſion, which was, to ſqueeze Money from all the Religious Houſes, in a way that it might not ſeem as if they were forced to give it. For this end he engaged ſome Abbots to ſign a Writing, whereby they promis'd to give a certain Sum to the Pope. He afterwards made uſe of this promiſſory Note, to induce others to follow the Example, by telling them how dangerous it would be for them to diſtinguiſh themſelves from the others by a Refuſal: But this Trick being too ſoon diſcover'd, he could not ſucceed in his Project. Mean time the Legate made a new Demand upon the Clergy, ſtill upon pretence of defending the Church againſt the Emperor. The Clergy publickly refus'd to ſubmit to that Exaction, and parted without granting any thing: But the King and the Legate having found Means to intimidate ſome of the Members, the latter ſuffer'd themſelves to be prevail'd on, and the others were in a manner forced to do as they did: So that every one did for himſelf what they had refus'd in a Body.

THE Papal Throne was fill'd in 1243 by Innocent IV. This new Pope ſent a Nuncio to England nam'd Martin, who was authoriz'd to fill up all the vacant Benefices. Moreover, he had a Power to ſuſpend, excommunicate, and depoſe all Eccleſiaſticks that ſhould prove refractory; that is to ſay, ſuch as refus'd to give whatever Money was demanded of them. This Nuncio, after having committed an infinite number of private Extortions by vertue of his Power, demanded alſo an extraordinary Subſidy of the Clergy, to pay the Debts which Gregory IX. had contracted in the War againſt the Emperor, but he could not obtain any thing.

AT length, in 1245, the Barons perceiving that the Court of Rome drain'd the Kingdom of Money, and that the Clergy always relax'd, when they ſhould have withſtood the Pope, reſolv'd to oppoſe thoſe Extortions with their own Authority. For this purpoſe they order'd the Governours of the Sea-Ports to arreſt all Perſons that came into the Realm from the Pope. Not long after this, a Courier from Rome was apprehended, who came furniſh'd with ſeveral Bulls to demand Money of the Clergy: Upon Complaint made of it by the Nuncio, the King caus'd every thing that had been taken from the Courier to be reſtor'd; but the Nobility made a ſmart Remonſtrance to him on that Head, and ſhew'd him by an exact Calculation, that the Revenues of the Italian Benefices far exceeded thoſe of the Crown. The King was ſurpriz'd at it, and permitted the Nobility to make their Complaints to the General Council which was aſſembled at Lyons. They therefore wrote a long Letter to the Council, by Ambaſſadors ſent on purpoſe, to repreſent their Grievances to it: But as the Nobility apprehended that this Affair might be ſpun out to a greater length than they would have had it, they met, notwithſtanding the King's Prohibition, and ſent a Knight to the Nuncio, who commanded him in their Name to quit the Kingdom immediately, unleſs he had a mind to be cut in pieces. It ſignify'd nothing for the Nuncio to apply to the King, who was not then in a condition to protect him. Proteſt againſt the Tribute promis'd by King John.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

Complaints: But when they were gone, he endeavour'd to make the Council believe that he intended to remedy those Abuses. For this purpose he publish'd two Bulls, the first of which granted it as a Favour to such English as had the Right of Patronage, to nominate whomsoever they pleas'd to those Benefices which belong'd to them. The second order'd, that when a benefic'd Italian dy'd, or quitted his Benefice, the English should not be oblig'd to put another Italian in his Place. He made a great flourish with these two Bulls, as if he had thereby entirely redress'd all the Injuries which England complain'd of: But as soon as the Council was broke up, he compell'd all the Bishops of England, on pain of Excommunication, to subscribe the Charter of King John's Resignation, and Henry suffer'd it without opposing it.

Pope pretends to satisfy the English.

He forces the Bishops to sign John's Charter of Resignation.

Anno 1246. THE Complaints of the Barons were not effectual to put a stop to the Exactions of the Court of Rome. Next Year, the Pope impos'd an intolerable Tax upon the Clergy of England, and the Bishops did not dare to stir: But it was not so with the Temporal Lords, who got the Parliament to pass a Resolution to have the Grievances of the Nation committed to Writing, and to demand Satisfaction from the Pope, by a Letter which was sign'd by all the Lords both Spiritual and Temporal. This Letter, as vigorous as it was, produced an Effect contrary to what was expected. The Pope being resolute, whatever was the Consequence, compell'd the Clergy to subscribe the Excommunication which he had fulminated against the Emperor; after which, pretending that all the Churches, and more especially that of England, were equally concern'd to support him in his War with that Monarch, he oblig'd every Member of the Clergy to supply him with Money for raising and maintaining his Troops. Moreover, by a Bull he appropriated to himself the Estates of all the Clergy that dy'd without a Will. And finally, to compleat his Oppression, he offer'd to lay a Tax upon the Clergy of England of One third of the Moveables of those who resided at their Benefices, and of One half of those who were Non-Residents: But the King could not help prohibiting the Clergy from submitting to that Imposition.

Fresh Exactions of the Court of Rome.

Pope claims the Goods of the Clergy dying intestate, and lays a heavy Tax on them.

IN the beginning of the Year 1247, a new Legate arriv'd, who immediately demanded a Present of One thousand Marks from the Bishops and Abbots of England, and Five hundred from those of Ireland. In order to compensate the King for his ordinary Complaisance, with regard to the Exactions of the Court of Rome, the Pope sent him a Bull, whereby he order'd that no Italian, not even a Nephew of any of the Cardinals, or of the Pope himself, should be put in possession of any Benefice in England without the King's Consent: But he well knew that such Consent would very easily be obtain'd.

HENRY III.

IN the Year 1250, Henry caus'd Athelmar, his Brother by the Mother's side, to be chose Bishop of Winchester, and the Pope confirm'd the Election.

Henry's half Brother chose Bishop of Winchester.

I might enter into a more particular Enumeration of the Exactions of the Court of Rome upon the Clergy of England; but I think what I have already related is sufficient to shew the Avarice of the Popes; and the rather, because I shall be oblig'd in the Second Part of this Reign to give more undeniable Proofs of it.

Article I.

Henry IIId's Affairs with the Popes, touching the Grant of the Kingdom of Sicily.

IN the last Article of the first Part, we saw that the Pretence of all the Exactions of the Court of Rome upon the Clergy of England was the War which the Church was engag'd in against the Emperor. This Article is properly but another Link of the former. Here we shall find Exactions yet more intolerable, tho' under another Pretext; which will shew to what a degree the Popes push'd their Avarice of Money, and their Severity to the Clergy of England. In order to convince the Reader of this Truth, I shall here as briefly as possible explain those two Pretexts which I have been speaking of, because that which is the Subject of this Article is but a Sequel and Dependant of the former.

Tancred King of Sicily's Death and Successor.

I took notice before, in the Abridgment of the Reign of Richard the First, that Tancred, the natural Son of Roger King of Sicily seiz'd that Kingdom, and kept possession of it to his Death, notwithstanding the Efforts of the Emperor Henry of the House of Suabia, whom

* In 1250, Pope Innocent IV. publish'd a Bull for a Croisado, which is in this Collection, together with other Briefs relating thereunto; and the History of that time informs us, that they were not without effect. There is another Bull to the same purpose, which was issu'd Anno 1252, and other Acts concerning the same thing. The Popes were very glad to send the Western Princes into Asia, because in their Absence they had more Authority in their Dominions, and because those Princes commonly returning Beggars from beyond Sea, they were more submissive to the See of Rome, than if they had been in a better Condition.

† Besides the thousand Marks Sterling, which England paid every Year to the Pope, the Clergy of this Kingdom complain'd in 1252, that the Court of Rome drew away fifty thousand Marks more for the Grant of Benefices. * Innocent wrote a Letter upon it to pacify the Complaints of the English; but in his Writings there is more Flattery than Sincerity, according to the Custom of the Church of Rome.

* This Pope was a violent Persecutor of the learned and pious Grosthed, Bishop of Lincoln, for calling him Antichrist; And Matth. Paris, Cestrensis, and other Historians of that time, say, That he was frighten'd by the Bishop's Apparition after his Death, summoning him to Judgment; and that he thereupon sicken'd and languish'd for a short time, 'till he died. He first instituted Cardinals Red Hats.

the Pope had caus'd to marry Conſtantia of Sicily, tho' 50 Years of Age. After the Death of Tancred, his Son William III. aſcended the Throne of Sicily; and the Emperor Henry renewing his Pretenſions to that Kingdom, repair'd to Italy, and beſieg'd Naples. Sicily was at that time divided into two Parts, the firſt of which contain'd that part of the Iſland which is call'd Sicily beyond the Fare, and the ſecond that part which is now call'd the Kingdom of Naples, and then known by the Name of Sicily on this ſide of the Fare. Henry meeting with more Difficulties in the Siege of Naples than he expected, made a Propoſal of an Accommodation to William, which was accepted. By the Treaty which was concluded on this Head, the Emperor had Sicily beyond the Fare, and William kept the Kingdom of Naples. But Henry having contriv'd to ſeize the Perſon of William, caus'd his Eyes to be put out, and ſent him Priſoner to Germany. After this, he made himſelf Maſter of Naples, and kept the two Kingdoms united 'till his Death, which happen'd in 1199. Frederick his Son who was 11 Years of Age, ſucceeded him, and was crown'd at Palermo with the Approbation of the Pope, who gave him the Inveſtiture of both Sicilys. Conſtantia the Emperor's Widow dying three Years after, left the ſame Pope Innocent III. to be Guardian of her Son Frederick, who at the Age of 14 marry'd Conſtantia of Caſtille. This ſame Prince was elected Emperor by Innocent the Third's Party, which oppos'd that of the excommunicated Emperor Otho; but he was not crown'd 'till after the Death of Otho in 1220, by Pope Honorius III. Conſtantia of Caſtille dying in 1222, Frederick marry'd Yolante, Daughter of John de Brienne, titular King of Jeruſalem. As this Kingdom was ſtill in the hands of the Saracens, Honorius III. publiſh'd a Cruſado in 1224, of which Frederick was declar'd General, in order to recover that Kingdom from the Infidels.

WHILE the Emperor was preparing for this Expedition, certain Towns of Italy revolted from him; and as he did not care to leave that Country in Trouble during his Abſence, he reſolv'd before he went, to reduce thoſe Towns. But Gregory IX. Succeſſor of Honorius, preſs'd him very earneſtly to go, on pretence that the Croiſes could no longer be without their General; but probably his ſecret Reaſon was a deſign to take advantage of the Emperor's Abſence to foment the Revolt of Italy. Be this as it will, Frederick being no longer able to withſtand the preſſing Sollicitations of the Pope, embark'd as if he had a Deſign to make a Voyage to Paleſtine; but was no ſooner aboard the Veſſel, than he gave Orders for his being put aſhore again by reaſon of Sickneſs. That was what gave the Pope a handle to excommunicate him, becauſe he declar'd not only that his Diſtemper was feign'd, but alſo that a very great number of the Croiſes who had been actually at the Holy Land were return'd home, when they ſaw that the Emperor did not arrive. This Excommunication ſo provok'd the Emperor, that he put himſelf at the Head of his Army, and march'd directly to Rome, from whence the Pope was forc'd to depart. Nevertheleſs the Emperor ſet out next Year for the Holy Land, where he made great Progreſs, tho' he was thwarted by the Knights Hoſpitallers, who had even laid a Plot to deliver him up to the Saracens, probably with a View to do the Pope a Pleaſure. For Gregory had renew'd the Excommunication of the Emperor, becauſe he ſail'd away before he had made his Peace with the Church. At the ſame time, he gave the Command of an Army to John de Brienne, in order to go and make himſelf Maſter of the Kingdom of Naples. Thus have I trac'd the Origin of this famous War, which coſt Italy ſo much Blood, and gave Birth to the two Factions of the Guelphs and Gibelins, who worry'd each other ſo long, and fill'd that Country with Murders and Maſſacres. England, tho' very remote from Italy, was alſo a Sufferer by it, becauſe this ſame War furniſh'd the Pope with a Pretext for oppreſſing the Clergy.

Revolt of Towns in Italy from the Emperor.

INNOCENT IV. who was Succeſſor of Gregory IX. walking in the Footſteps of his Predeceſſor, made all poſſible Efforts to take the Kingdom of Sicily from the Emperor, and even to deprive him of the Empire. He ſolemnly excommunicated him at the Council of Lyons, and endeavour'd to arm all the Powers in Chriſtendom againſt him. But notwithſtanding all his Efforts, Frederick kept Sicily and the Empire to his Death, which happen'd in 1250.

Innocent IV. his Succeſſor alſo excommunicates him.

Emperor's Division of the Sicilys among his Sons.

THIS Prince having Children by three Wives, ſhar'd his Succeſſion among them by a Will. He had given Auſtria to Henry his eldeſt Son by his Wife Conſtantia; Sicily on this ſide of the Fare, or the Kingdom of Naples, to Conrad his Son, by Yolante of Brienne; and the Iſle of Sicily to Henry, whom he had by his third Wife Iſabella of England, Siſter to Henry III. He had likewiſe a natural Son named Manfred, to whom he left the Principality of Tarentum, with the Regency of the two Kingdoms, viz. of that of Naples in the abſence of Conrad, and of that of Sicily during Henry's Minority. Manfred having taken poſſeſſion of the Regency of Sicily, went to aſſume that likewiſe of the other Kingdom, but the principal Cities refuſing to admit him, he preſs'd Conrad to come in Perſon into that Country, and cauſe himſelf to be recogniz'd there. Germany being at that time divided into two Factions, as well as Italy, one part of the Princes had elected Conrad for Emperor, and the Pope's Party had made choice of William Earl of Holland.

Conrad excommunicated

Conrad was no ſooner elected than the Pope excommunicated him; but this did not hinder his going to the Kingdom of Naples, there to ſupport his Party againſt the Pope, who had cauſed the greateſt Cities to revolt. This War proving very expenſive to the Pope, he endeavour'd to perſuade Prince Richard, who was Henry the third's Brother, to accept the Crown of Sicily, of which he made him an Offer. Richard, who was a Prince of very great Oeconomy, had heap'd up vaſt Wealth, while the King his Brother was always in want. 'Twas this that made the Pope caſt his eye upon him, in hopes that he wou'd be profuſe of his Treaſure in order to procure himſelf a Crown. Indeed Richard did not reject the Propoſal, but he inſiſted on ſome Security which the Pope did not like. When he offer'd him the Crown, he thought that he wou'd be content with the bare Title of King of Sicily, ſuffer himſelf to be directed by his (the Pope's) Counſels, and make him Maſter of his Purſe. But Richard not thinking it fit to be his Tool, the Negotiation broke off.

Innocent offers Sicily to Pr. Richard.

His Terms not lik'd by the Pope.

MEAN time Conrad, who ſtill carried on the War againſt the Pope with Vigour, made himſelf Maſter of the City, and almoſt the whole Kingdom of Naples. This oblig'd Innocent IV. to tack about to the King of England, and to offer him the Crown of the two Sicilys, provided he wou'd engage to conquer them. But Henry refus'd the Preſent, it being a Scruple with him to deprive his Nephew Henry of the Portion which was fallen to his ſhare. During this, Conrad contriv'd to have Henry his Brother put to death, and to make himſelf Maſter of Sicily. This Action gave the Pope an occaſion to renew the Excommunication of this Prince, who about 5 Months after died, as 'tis ſaid, of Poiſon given him by his Baſtard Brother Manfred, who had always pretended a Devotion both to his Perſon and Service.

Excommunicated and poiſoned.

IMMEDIATELY after Conrad's death, Innocent IV. improving the Opportunity, made himſelf Maſter once again of the Kingdom of Naples; and Manfred, tho' he harbour'd in his Breaſt a Deſign to ſeize the two Sicilys, feign'd an entire Devotion to him. He knew ſo well how to diſſemble, that the Pope thinking him wholly in his Intereſt, form'd no Reſolution with regard to his new Conqueſts without conſulting him. Mean time as the Pope cou'd not maintain the Army which he had carried to Naples without a very great Expence, he apply'd once more to the King of England, and offer'd him the Crown of Sicily, that is to ſay of both Kingdoms, for Edmund his eldeſt Son; telling him, that ſince the Death of the King of Sicily his Nephew, there was no more room for his Scruples. Henry was weak enough, inconſiderately to accept of a Preſent which was only ſo in appearance, the Deſign of it being his Ruin. He did not only immediately ſend the Pope all the Money he cou'd raiſe, but was alſo ſo imprudent as to engage for the Payment of all the Sums which the Pope ſhou'd borrow to place Prince Edmund on the Throne of Sicily. After he was ſo far engag'd, he was continually preſs'd to ſend Money to Rome. But it not being in his power to diſpoſe of the Purſes of his Subjects, as I have already ſhewn, the Pope undertook to put him in a way to raiſe Money; which was by continually impoſing Tenths and other Burdens upon the Clergy of England, on pretence of relieving the King in his Neceſſities, but in reality for defraying the Expences of the War in Sicily.

Innocent becomes Maſter again of Naples.

Manfred outwits him.

Henry accepts it.

Pope's Contrivance to help the King to Money.

THO' Innocent was Maſter of Naples, and of the other chief Cities of that Kingdom, yet there was a Party againſt him, which was ſupported by the German Troops that Conrad had brought thither, and which were under the Command of the two Princes of Bavaria. Manfred, who, as I have already ſaid, had formed a Deſign to be Maſter of both Kingdoms, had as many Difficulties to cope with, in all appearance, from the Pope, as from the two German Princes who ſupported the Intereſts of young Conradin the Son of Conrad. But as he was not at that time in a condition to make uſe of Force, he reſolved to have recourſe to Fraud; and this was the Stratagem which he tryed for his Deliverance. He perſuaded the Pope, who had no manner of Suſpicion of him, that the City of Naples being too much burden'd by the long Stay which the Army had IMMEDIATELY after Conrad's death, Innocent IV. improving the Opportunity, made himself Master once again of the Kingdom of Naples; and Manfred, tho' he harbour'd in his Breast a Design to seize the two Sicilys, feign'd an entire Devotion to him. He knew so well how to dissemble, that the Pope thinking him wholly in his Interest, form'd no Resolution with regard to his new Conquests without consulting him. Mean time as the Pope cou'd not maintain the Army which he had carried to Naples without a very great Expence, he apply'd once more to the King of England, and offer'd him the Crown of Sicily, that is to say of both Kingdoms, for Edmund his eldest Son; telling him, that since the Death of the King of Sicily his Nephew, there was no more room for his Scruples. Henry was weak enough, inconsiderately to accept of a Present which was only so in appearance, the Design of it being his Ruin. He did not only immediately send the Pope all the Money he cou'd raise, but was also so imprudent as to engage for the Payment of all the Sums which the Pope shou'd borrow to place Prince Edmund on the Throne of Sicily. After he was so far engag'd, he was continually press'd to send Money to Rome. But it not being in his power to dispose of the Purses of his Subjects, as I have already shewn, the Pope undertook to put him in a way to raise Money; which was by continually imposing Tenths and other Burdens upon the Clergy of England, on pretence of relieving the King in his Necessities, but in reality for defraying the Expences of the War in Sicily.

Pope's Contrivance to help the King to Money.

THO' Innocent was Master of Naples, and of the other chief Cities of that Kingdom, yet there was a Party against him, which was supported by the German Troops that Conrad had brought thither, and which were under the Command of the two Princes of Bavaria. Manfred, who, as I have already said, had formed a Design to be Master of both Kingdoms, had as many Difficulties to cope with, in all appearance, from the Pope, as from the two German Princes who supported the Interests of young Conradin the Son of Conrad. But as he was not at that time in a condition to make use of Force, he resolved to have recourse to Fraud; and this was the Stratagem which he tryed for his Deliverance. He persuaded the Pope, who had no manner of Suspicion of him, that the City of Naples being too much burden'd by the long Stay which the Army had made there, it was neceſſary to eaſe it, by diſperſing the Troops into different Places; that moreover it was not for the Pope's Advantage, to let the Germans, who were at one of the Extremities of the Kingdom, have the liberty of extending their Quarters as far as they pleas'd, and that it was abſolutely neceſſary to keep them in awe, by ſending ſome Troops that way. The Pope followed this Advice, and diſtributed his Army into ſeveral Quarters. This firſt Branch of the Project being put in execution, Manfred conſulted how to manage the two Princes of Bavaria. For this end he gave them to underſtand by ſome ſecret Emiſſaries, that tho' he feign'd to be devoted to the Pope, it was only that he might make a better uſe of the Opportunities which ſhou'd preſent to ſerve Conradin as he was in duty bound; but that he ſaw no proſpect of his being able to procure him the Poſſeſſion of that Kingdom, with the few Troops which the deceaſed Emperor had left, conſidering the great Force which the Pope had brought with him; that he adviſ'd them therefore to go and make new Levies in Germany, and that during their abſence, he wou'd undertake to provide for the Maintenance of their Troops, by putting the Pope in hopes that at the ſame time he furniſh'd them with ſome Subſiſtance and a little Money, he wou'd engage them to retire voluntarily; but that he wou'd order it ſo, that the Negotiation ſhould laſt till their Return. The two Princes falling into this Snare, ſet out for Germany, and left their Troops without any Perſon of Diſtinction at the head of them, truſting entirely to Manfred, who had made them believe, that it was a ſure Way to deceive the Pope. The third thing which Manfred had at heart, was ſecretly to get Aſſurance of Aſſiſtance from the Saracens, who were ſtill very numerous in the Kingdom, and Maſters of ſeveral Places. His Meaſures being thus concerted, it happen'd that after he had kill'd a Man that had affronted him, he left the Pope's Court upon pretence of abſconding from Juſtice, and retir'd to the little Town of Nocera, of which the Saracens were in poſſeſſion. He was ſummon'd to appear and take his Trial, and upon his refuſal the Pope ſent a part of his Army to ſeize him in the very Place to which he was fled. But Manfred who foreſaw it, and was already prepar'd, went to meet thoſe Troops upon the Road, ſurpriz'd them, and entirely routed them. Innocent then opened his Eyes, and perceiving Manfred's Treachery, it ſtuck ſo much to his Heart, that it carry'd him to his Grave. Alexander IV. was his Succeſſor. Mean time Manfred keeping his Deſigns ſtill ſecret, openly eſpous'd Conradin's Party, and by this means he diſpoſed of the German Troops that were in the Kingdom.

Pope Innocent farther outwitted by Manfred.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

Manfred flies from the Pope's Court for Murder.

The Pope purſues him and is beat.

Pope's Death and Succeſſor.

THE new Pope being reſolved to make War againſt Manfred, borrowed Money every where upon the account of the King of England, who was under an Engagement to pay it; and at laſt he aſſembled an Army of 60000 Men, at the head of which he put Cardinal Ubaldini, an experienc'd General, and gave him for Lieutenant the Marquis of Herebroke a German, who had faithfully ſerved Innocent IV. but after that Pope's Death had ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted by Manfred. The Cardinal being in a readineſs to march with his whole Army againſt Nocera, the Marquis gave him to underſtand, that the neighbouring Country was deſtitute of Forage and Proviſion; that moreover there wou'd be no great Honour in attacking a paultry Town with ſo great an Army, the rather becauſe while Manfred ſhut himſelf up in that City, it was a Token that he was not in a Condition for any Enterprize. The Cardinal believed what he ſaid, and only march'd with part of his Troops; but Manfred, who was quickly informed of it, marching out of Nocera, met the Enemies Army betwixt Troya and Foggia, and entirely defeated it. After this, having neither the Pope nor the Germans to fear, he took off the Maſque, and cauſed himſelf to be crown'd King of the two Sicilys.

HENRY III.

He raiſes an Army againſt Manfred.

Manfred defeats it.

Is crowned K. of Sicily.

THE Pope having loſt the beſt part of his Army, and not being in a condition to raiſe another, made no conſiderable Effort after that time to wreſt the Crown from the Uſurper. Nevertheleſs, he made a handle of that War, to draw prodigious Sums from the King, the People, and eſpecially the Clergy of England, beſides what he had borrow'd in the King's Name. In order to feed the hopes of this too credulous Prince, he ſent the Biſhop of Bologna into England, who ſolemnly inveſted Prince Edmund in the Kingdom of Sicily, by putting a Ring upon his Finger. The King who was as much pleas'd to ſee this Ceremony, as if the Prince his Son had thereby been really placed upon the Throne of Sicily, did not trouble himſelf ſo much as to inquire into the State of Affairs of that Kingdom; and the Legate was as far from giving him a faithful Account. I have already ſaid, that Alexander IV. had loſt all Hopes of diſpoſſeſſing Manfred. It cou'd not be done without exceſſive Charge, and yet he gave Henry to underſtand that the thing was eaſy, and on the point of being executed, provided he wou'd furniſh ſome Money to haſten the raiſing of the Troops; an imaginary Levy which was never made, and for which nevertheleſs Alexander drain'd England of Money. The extraordinary Methods he made uſe of to draw Money from England, is the principal Subject of this Article. I will only mention ſome of them, becauſe it won'd be too tedious to enter into the Particulars, which if any one has Pope inveſts Pr. Edmund with Sicily.

I

Fœdera Tom. I.

has the curioſity to ſee, he need only conſult the Hiſtory of Matthew Paris relating to the Reign of Henry III.

Henry III.

Sends Ruſtand his Nuncio into England with Bulls.

In 1255, a Nuncio named Ruſtand, came into England with ſeveral Bulls. He immediately produced two of them, the firſt of which order'd the raiſing of the Tenths in England, Scotland, and Ireland, for the Neceſſities of the King and the Holy See; that is to ſay, for the pretended Conqueſt of Sicily, notwithſtanding all the Oppoſition whatſoever that could be imagined. The ſecond authoriz'd the King to change the Vow which he had made to go to the Holy Land, into that of undertaking the Conqueſt of Sicily; a Conqueſt which, according to the Pope, was more neceſſary, and more advantageous to the Church, than that of Jeruſalem.

In 1256, eight different Bulls came abroad, the ſole View of which was to extort Money from the Clergy for the pretended Conqueſt: I will not here mention the Contents of them, becauſe as they are inſerted in the Fœdera, they may be found in the Specification of the Acts which refer to this Article. Nothing can be a better Proof of what Matthew Paris has writ upon this Subject, notwithſtanding the Attempts made to render his Teſtimony ſuſpicious.

A ſtrange Method us'd by the Pope to get Money from the Clergy.

All thoſe Bulls, and the Money which they had produc'd, not being ſufficient to ſatisfy the Pope's Avarice, any more than a drop of Water caſt into the Sea, the Clergy of England were alſo fain to pay 135,540 Marks, which the Pope pretended to have borrowed for the King. But as the Pope was afraid that while he furniſh'd the King with the means of drawing Money from the Clergy, ſuch Money might be apply'd to any other uſe, by the King himſelf, or by his Miniſters, he obtain'd of the King, in the firſt place, that all the extraordinary Levies of Money which were made in England, ſhou'd be employ'd in the Payment of that Debt. As ſoon as the King had conſented to this, the ways and means of raiſing Money were never wanting; of which, this was one of the ſtrangeſt we ſhall read of. The Nuncio Ruſtand caus'd a great number of Bonds or Promiſſory Notes for divers Sums to be drawn up, whereby the underwritten own'd they had ſeverally received, by way of Loan, from ſuch a Merchant of Sienna or Florence, the Sum of ——, which they obliged themſelves to pay by ſuch a time, on pain of being excommunicated. After this, he inſiſted that every Member of the Clergy ſhould ſign one of thoſe Bonds, as if he had actually borrowed the Sum therein mentioned. But the Oppoſition which Ruſtand met with in his Enterprize, notwithſtanding his Menaces and his Paſſion, was ſo great, that he was forc'd to make a Journey to Rome to inform the Pope of it. The Clergy alſo ſent a Deputation on their part, to acquaint the Pope with the reaſons of their Refuſal; but all they cou'd obtain of the haughty, greedy Pontiff was, that the Clergy ſhou'd pay the Sums ſpecify'd in the Obligations, on condition of being reimburs'd out of the Tenths which ſhou'd be granted to the King afterwards. This is Tyranny of ſuch a ſtamp, that one wou'd hardly credit it upon the Teſtimony of Matthew Paris, if it was not confirm'd by a Letter from the Pope to Ruſtand, which he has inſerted in his Hiſtory.

Though the Money ariſing from the Bonds I have juſt now mentioned, was at firſt deſign'd for the Payment of the Sums borrowed by the Pope, that was not ſo much as talk'd of after the Bonds were ſign'd. The King inſiſted that the Clergy ſhould be his Security for thoſe very Sums, and that moreover they ſhou'd conſent that the Tenths which had been granted for three Years, ſhould be continued for five Years longer. The Clergy would fain have withſtood this new Demand, but the Pope having ſpoke in an imperious Tone, they were forced to obey, or at leaſt to give ſuch a Sum as the King demanded.

Henry requires the Clergy to be bound for him.

The Pope preſſes the King for Money.

The Army which the Pope pretended he was oblig'd to maintain for the Conqueſt of Sicily, ſubſiſted only in his Imagination; and yet he teaz'd the King inceſſantly to ſend him Money. He even threatned him to give away the Kingdom of Sicily to another Prince, becauſe he was ſo remiſs in performing the Articles of their Agreement. But it was not in the King's power to raiſe Money upon his People whenever he thought fit. The Barons, who did by no means approve of the Engagements into which he was enter'd, were far from ſupplying him with the Succours he demanded for that chimerical Enterprize *. The King excus'd himſelf to the Pope in the handſomeſt manner he cou'd, upon the Reſiſtance of the Parliament; and nevertheleſs, in order to ſatisfy him in ſome meaſure, he alſo ſent him 4000 Marks, and caus'd the Conventions I have been ſpeaking of to be ratify'd by Prince Edward his eldeſt Son. But ſo ſmall a Sum not being ſufficient to content the Pope, he again ſent freſh Bulls into England, which all tended to help the King to Money by oppreſſing the Clergy.

Prince Edward ratifies the Contract relating to Sicily.

Pope ſends freſh Bulls over to raiſe Money.

In

* In 587 of this Tome of the Fœdera, there's a Letter from the King Anno 1256, to certain Cardinals, wherein he ſays, that the Barons of his Kingdom thought the Terms of his Engagement too hard; but he declares in this Letter, that he was reſolved to puſh on the Enterprize, though he could not execute it ſo ſpeedily as the Treaty required, by reaſon of the impoſſibility of raiſing ſo great a Sum of Money. However, there the Affair ſtopp'd, and the King of England was not willing to engage in ſo deſperate an Undertaking: but he could not help furniſhing great Sums of Money for it, to the Court of Rome, as may be ſeen by a great many Acts; inſomuch, that Simon de Montfort, in the King's Name, renounc'd his Pretenſions to the Kingdom of Sicily, as we ſhall ſee hereafter.

FOEDERA Tom. I.

IN 1257, which was the Year following, the King demanded a new Supply of the Clergy ſtill, for the Affair of Sicily. The Clergy wou'd at firſt have pleaded Poverty, but Ruſtand oblig'd them by his Menaces to give the King 42,000 l. Sterling. All this Money was carry'd to Rome; and yet the Pope was far from being contented with it. Ruſtand having made a trip to Rome, return'd with a Power in form to excommunicate the King, if he did not immediately undertake the Conqueſt of Sicily. The Pope pretended that the Sums which he had received were not ſufficient to defray the Expences already incurred, and that the King ſhould ſend an Army into Sicily, with a good General, to wreſt that Kingdom from the Uſurper. Henry being quite at a loſs which way to turn himſelf, made it his humble Requeſt to the Pope by Prince Edmund, that he would pleaſe to abate ſomething of the Rigour of their Conventions*. But the Pope returning no Anſwer, Henry was at laſt obliged to nominate Ambaſſadors to go to Rome, to renounce the Crown of Sicily in the Name of Prince Edmund. Such a Renunciation did not pleaſe the Pope for two Reaſons. In the firſt place, he wanted to ſqueeze more Money out of England. Secondly, the Grant of Sicily made to Edmund, was a thing ſo little known in Italy, that we meet with no Hiſtorians of that Country who mention it; and a publick Renunciation would have diſcovered this Secret, which the Pope had a mind ſhould be concealed. Among many Hiſtorians of Naples and Sicily, whom I have read, I find but one that mentions en paſſant the Grant made by the Pope to a Son of the King of England, though he is miſtaken in the Name of the Prince to whom the Grant was made.

Extorts an Aid from the Clergy.

King petitions the Pope to ſoften the Terms relating to Sicily.

He offers to renounce that Crown.

ALEXANDER IV. not caring to accept of the Renunciation juſt now mention'd, ſent a new Nuncio named Arlot into England, with power to make ſome ſmall Alteration in the Conventions. But at the ſame time he made freſh Efforts to engage Henry more and more, by granting him new favours, but ſtill at the Expence of the Clergy.

THOUGH this Affair held a Year longer, I find myſelf obliged to ſtop here, becauſe it was interrupted by the War of the Barons. Moreover, the Reaſon which broke it off, has a natural Relation to the Affairs which I am to treat of in the next Article, where we ſhall find the Concluſion of it.

* At this time, the King of England being weary of laying out ſo much Money for the Buſineſs of Sicily, and no Good like to come of it, ordered M. Ruſtand, the Pope's Chaplain and Nuncio in England, to depoſit all the Money which he had rais'd in this Kingdom upon that ſcore, in the new Temple at London, and hindered him from paying it to the Pope's Bankers. The Pope was horridly vex'd at it, and ordered his Nuncio, in ſpite of the King's Prohibition, to employ all the Sums he had out of the Tenths, the Redemption of Vows, and all the other Methods that he had uſed to draw Money from the Engliſh, towards paying the Debts of the Holy See. It appears that this Affair was afterwards accommodated, though the King of England declared from that time, that he was ready to renounce the Kingdom of Sicily.

ARTICLE II.

The Barons War.

The ground of the Barons War.

FROM the very beginning of this Reign, or at leaſt from the Death of the firſt Regent, Complaint was made of the Government. I have already ſhewn that the Barons, by extorting the two Charters ſo often mentioned from King John, had Views which extended farther than the Age in which they liv'd. Their Aim was to ſap the Foundations of deſpotick Government, and to put it out of the King's power to deprive either themſelves or their Poſterity, of the Fiefs which their Anceſtors had received as Gifts from William the Conqueror, and to prevent him from impoſing what Taxes he thought fit upon thoſe Fiefs, without conſulting them. That was the Ground of the War they carry'd on againſt King John, in which they would undoubtedly have ſunk, if it had not been for the Aſſiſtance of France. After that War was happily determined by the good Conduct of the Earl of Pembroke, the Barons continually had an eye upon the Behaviour of thoſe who were intruſted with the Government, during the Minority of Henry III. for fear of loſing the Privileges which they had preſerved, or rather acquired with ſo much Hazard and Toil. Hubert de Burgh, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, looking upon thoſe Privileges as extorted, were for advancing the Royal Prerogatives; and that convinc'd the Barons of the neceſſity they were under to be upon their Guard, in order to hinder them from putting their Deſign in execution. The Barons complain'd; but as what they ſaid was not very much regarded, they made uſe of the ordinary Method to ſupport themſelves againſt the Regal Power, by fomenting Diſcontents among the People, and endeavouring to engage them in their Intereſt, by continually alarming them with the proſpect of Tyranny, and Arbitrary Power. The young King's firſt Miniſters took no care to prevent thoſe Intrigues by a juſt Government. On the contrary, they ran into ſuch Lengths, as began to deprive the King of the Affection of his People, a Loſs which in the end ſeldom fails of producing fatal Effects.

Henry's ill Conduct.

HENRY III. who was a Prince of a mean Genius, and commonly acted more from Caprice than from Reaſon, gave even a greater handle than his Miniſters for the Diſcontent of his Subjects. He not only revok'd the Charters of the King his Father, but afterwards, when he was often compell'd, by the want of Money, to promiſe that he would reſtore them, and cauſe them to be obſerved, he always broke his word. And above all, he was ſo imprudent as to ſhew no regard to the City of London, but always treated it on the contrary with a great deal of Severity. On the other hand, the Conſent which he gave tacitly or expreſſly to the Extortions of the Court of Rome, drew upon him the Contempt and Hatred of the Clergy, who finding themſelves without Protection, were as impatient as the reſt of the Subjects to ſee the Government in other hands. Thoſe were the general Cauſes of the War betwixt the King and the Barons, which is to be the Subject of this Article. It is needleſs to repeat the particular Reaſons here, becauſe I have already treated of them in the foregoing Articles. I would only have it obſerv'd, that the pretended Grant of Sicily, in order to drain all the Money out of the Kingdom, forc'd the Barons, as it were, to ſeek a Remedy for this Evil, of which they ſaw no

The Revenue of thoſe Non-Reſidents who abſented without Leave or Diſpenſation. 3. One Year's Revenue out of all the Benefices that ſhould happen to be vacant within five Years. 4. The Tenth of all Eccleſiaſtical Revenues, according to their juſt Valuation. 5. The Houſhold-Goods of thoſe who died inteſtate. no end; all the ready Cash of the Kingdom flowing into Rome, as into a Gulph, from whence it never return'd.

HENRY III.

Parliament refuses him Money, and why.

IN 1256, the King having conven'd the Parliament, desir'd a Subsidy of them for maintaining an Army which the Pope required him to send to Sicily. The Parliament flatly refus'd what the King demanded, and presented an Address to him, to acquaint him with the Reasons of their denial. These Reasons were, 1. The Poverty of the Kingdom. 2. The Difficulty, or rather the Extravagance of such an Undertaking. 3. The Danger there was in sending Forces out of the Kingdom, to a Country so far distant. 4. That the King had engag'd in this Affair without consulting his Parliament. 5. That by the Conventions which he had sign'd, the Pope reserved to himself the Power of retracting, whereas the King had made no such Stipulation for himself. The King was oblig'd to sit still, his Poverty putting him out of a condition to undertake any thing, in order to force the Parliament to grant him his Demand.

King's Profuseness to his Half-Brothers.

THIS Poverty of his was occasion'd, in the first place, by the unhappy Affair of Sicily, which swallow'd up all the King's Revenues, and whatever else he could rake together by extraordinary Methods. 2. By his Brothers of the Mother's side, and by those of the Queen, who were always begging Money of him. The King was so easily led away by them, that not being able to content them, he suffer'd them to pillage the Kingdom as they thought fit, and even without fear of Punishment; because he had expressly forbad the Chancellor to issue out any Writ that might be prejudicial to them. The great Influence of these Foreigners was to the Barons a most intolerable Grievance, because they were in possession of the best Offices, and almost all the Governments in the Kingdom.

Prince Richard chose King of the Romans.

TO compleat the People's Misery, in 1257, Prince Richard, the King's Brother, after having heap'd up immense Wealth, was chose King of the Romans, by the Intrigues of the Pope, who aim'd at setting him in opposition to the King of Castille, who was elected by another Party; and he went to Germany with all the ready Money that he could amass, as well to reward those who had elected him, as to defray the Charges of his Coronation, which was perform'd at Aix la Chapelle *.

IN 1258, the King finding himself teaz'd by the Pope for Money to such a degree that he threatened him to give away Sicily to some other Prince, resolv'd at last to reassemble the Parliament, though he was not very well pleas'd with the last Session. Immediately, he made a fresh Demand of Money for the War of Sicily: But he was quickly made to see that he had not timed it well. The Lords had already resolv'd between themselves, in their secret Conferences, to reform the Government, and to continue strictly united together, in order to execute their Design. Consequently, the Parliament, instead of granting his Demand, presented an Address to him, which contain'd very mortifying Reproaches of him for his Conduct, and especially for the Breach of his Promises; and they gave him to understand very plainly, that they had resolved in spite of him to endeavour the Establishment of better Government in the Kingdom. The Lords having already concerted Measures for executing their Design, and the King not having made any Preparation, he try'd again to amuse them with general Promises, and an Acknowledgment of his Faults; but nothing would pacify them. All that he could do was to adjourn the Parliament to Oxford, to gain a little time. But he could not get the Consent of the Lords to this Adjournment, without giving a Writing under his Hand, by which he engag'd to agree that the Government should be reform'd by the Advice of twenty-four Lords, of whom he should name twelve, and the Parliament the other twelve.

Barons Project for reforming the Government.

Parliament adjourn'd to Oxford.

King agrees to the Reformation by 24 Commissioners.

THE Barons were so diffident of the King, that they repair'd to Oxford with a great number of armed Men, and a firm Resolution to execute their Project, whatever it cost them; so that the King could not find one Pretext to evade his Promise. Therefore they proceeded immediately to the choice of the twenty-four Commissioners, who not long after delivered in a Regulation consisting of six Articles, to which the Parliament, in their Approbation of them, reserved to themselves the Liberty of adding from time to time what they thought fit. These six Articles, which were called the Provisions or Statutes of Oxford, were in substance as follows:

The Regulation by them propos'd, call'd the Provisions or Statutes of Oxford.

1. THAT the King should confirm Magna Charta.

2. THAT the Office of chief Justiciary should be conferr'd on a good Man, approv'd by the Parliament.

3. THAT the Chancellor, Treasurer, and the Judges of the Realm, should be appointed by the twenty-four Commissioners.

4. THAT all the strong Places should be put into the hands of the twenty-four Commissioners, who should appoint such to be Governors as they thought fit.

* But Richard was never own'd by all the Princes and States of Germany †.

† Mr. Daniel's History of his Reign tells us, that Richard carried this Election against no less a Competitor than Alphonsus King of Spain, after having first sent over the Earl of Gloucester and Sir John Mansell, to try the Princes Affections; and that the King of Spain pretended he was first elected, but he being a Philosopher, and studious of the Mathematicks, which he revived in Europe, was drawing Lines when he should have drawn his Purse, and so lost his Hopes, and Richard steps in before him.

Dr. Howel says, he paid a large Sum of Money for the Honour, and that he was reputed at this time to possess as much ready Coin, as would every Day, for ten Years, afford him a hundred Marks upon the main Stock; besides his Rents and Revenues in Germany, and the English Dominions.

Foedera Tom. I.

5. That it ſhould be High-Treaſon to oppoſe the Orders of the twenty-four Commiſſioners directly or indirectly.

6. That the Parliament ſhould meet at leaſt once a Year, to make ſuch Statutes as ſhould be thought neceſſary.

There were twelve Deputies of the Commons in this Parliament; but whether they ſat in it by Right, or by an extraordinary Favour, is what I ſhall not venture to determine, becauſe the Engliſh themſelves are not agreed in this point. All that I ſhall add upon this Head is, that if the Commons were called to the Parliament before that time, 'tis very ſtrange that on this ſingle occaſion Hiſtorians ſhould agree to take notice of this Circumſtance, which on ſuch a Suppoſition ſeems very unneceſſary. But 'tis the general Opinion, that the Lords who aim'd to ſecure the People in their Intereſt, hoped by this Condeſcenſion to gain their Suffrage for the Change which they were reſolved on *.

Oppoſition to the Oxford Statutes.

The Statutes of Oxford at firſt met with ſome Oppoſition: Prince Edward, though he had ſign'd the Engagement above-mentioned with the King his Father, ſtudied what ſhifts he ſhould make uſe of to come off. Henry, Son to the King of the Romans, abſolutely refuſed to approve of an Alteration of ſo great conſequence, made in the abſence of the King his Father. But they were roundly given to underſtand, that their Oppoſition would be to no purpoſe, and that a Method would be taken to oblige them to conform to the Reſolutions of the Parliament. On the other hand, the King's Brothers by the Mother's ſide, and the Queen's Relations, openly proteſted that they would quit neither the Offices, nor the Governments of which they were in poſſeſſion. But they could not ſtand their ground when all the Barons were confederated againſt them; and at laſt were glad to deſire Paſſports to retire out of the Kingdom.

Foreigners expelled the Kingdom.

Barons Aſſociation.

This done, the Lords made an Aſſociation with one another, which was confirmed by a ſolemn Oath, to maintain the Statutes of Oxford. Afterwards the Parliament broke up, leaving the Government in the hands of the twenty-four Commiſſioners, at the head of whom was the Earl of Leiceſter, either by Election in quality of Preſident, or by the Superiority of his Genius. Theſe Commiſſioners quickly abuſed their power. They gave all the Offices, and beſt Employments, to their Friends and Kindred, on pretence of putting them into ſure hands; and whereas the end of their Eſtabliſhment was only to moderate the Power of the King, the Royal Authority was run down to nothing. But as the King was neither beloved nor eſteemed, few People were concerned at the Injuſtice which was done him. On the contrary, the City of London entered into an Aſſociation with the Barons, and the next Parliament made an Act for the eternal Baniſhment of thoſe Foreigners, whom the Barons of their own Authority had expell'd out of the Kingdom.

Ill Conduct of the twenty-four Commiſſioners.

Henry III.

London enters into the Barons Aſſociation.

The King being no longer conſulted in the Affairs of Government, the Barons wrote a long Letter to the Pope, ſign'd by all their Names, to juſtify their Conduct in three things eſpecially. 1. Concerning their Refuſal to aſſiſt the King for the Conqueſt of Sicily. 2. Concerning the Statutes of Oxford. 3. Concerning the Baniſhment of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, for whom the Pope might have a particular regard. The Pope deferr'd his Anſwer to this Letter for a while, and gave the King ſecret Aſſurance of his Protection. At the ſame time he preſs'd him upon the Affair of Sicily, as if the King had been in a condition to furniſh him with the Money he demanded, and which he pretended to have borrow'd for him of certain Merchants of Italy. But the Times being changed, it was not in the King's power to ſatisfy him.

Barons Letter to the Pope in their own Vindication.

The Pope continues to preſs the King on the Affair of Sicily.

Mean while, the King of the Romans after his Coronation, having an Inclination to return to England, wrote to the Barons Anno 1259, and offer'd them his Aſſiſtance for appeaſing the Troubles of the Kingdom. But the twenty-four ſent Deputies to him, to acquaint him that they would not ſuffer him to ſet foot again in the Kingdom, if he did not promiſe to ratify the Statutes of Oxford. Richard anſwered thoſe Deputies very haughtily, that he thought it very ſtrange that ſuch great Alterations ſhould be made in his abſence, and without his participation; and he proteſted, that he would not take the Oath which they thought to extort from him. But afterwards, when he heard that a Fleet was equipping to hinder his Return, he relax'd, and promis'd to ratify the Statutes, as he effectually did in Dover Church, in preſence of the King, Prince Edward, and a great number of the Barons.

But is forc'd to ſwear to them.

The twenty-four Commiſſioners actually exerciſing the Royal Functions without controul, judg'd, that in order to keep poſſeſſion of their Authority, it was neceſſary to ſecure France in their Intereſt, becauſe that was the only Quarter from whence they could apprehend any diſturbance. They therefore reſolv'd to make a Treaty with that Crown in the King's Name, in which it ſhould find an advantage, in order by that means to engage it to ſupport the Government newly eſtabliſhed in England. According to this Scheme, the Earl of Leiceſter went to Paris, and made a Treaty there with the King of France, by which Henry quitted all his Pretenſions to Normandy and Anjou, and Lewis IX. on his part, yielded up to him the Limouſin and Perigord, Perigord, with all that France poſſeſſed beyond the Garonne. This Treaty being concluded, Henry was obliged to go and meet Lewis at Abbeville, where the general States of the Kingdom were aſſembled, and there to ratify the Treaty.

Foreigners deprived of the Revenues of their Benefices.

WHILE the King was in France, the twenty-four ordered all that farm'd the Benefices of Foreigners, to depoſite the Money which they were to pay to the Proprietors, in the hands of certain Receivers, who were ſettled in every Province. By this means the Kingdom was at laſt clear'd of a great number of Italian Leaches, that had ſuck'd it a long time.

Earl of Gloceſter jealous of the Earl of Leiceſter.

Anno 1260. THE Earl of Leiceſter, who, as I have already ſaid, was at the head of the twenty-four Commiſſioners, aſſumed a Preheminence over his Collegues, which made ſome Lords of that Party jealous.

He raiſes a falſe Report of Prince Edward, who clears himſelf.

The Earl of Gloceſter, above all the reſt, not being able to endure that Superiority, ſtudied how to ruin it, by ſpreading a Report, that he was entered into an Alliance with Prince Edward, to place him upon the Throne during the Life of the King his Father. But the Prince eaſily acquitted himſelf of this Charge, which had no manner of Foundation. The Earl of Gloceſter miſcarrying this way, attack'd the Earl of Leiceſter directly, and after having accus'd him of ſeveral Miſdemeanors, demanded that he might have a day appointed him to exhibit his Proofs. But when that Day came, ſeeing that Leiceſter boldly made his Appearance to anſwer the Charge, he let it drop upon ſome Pretext or other, and at laſt the King of the Romans found means to reconcile them together, at leaſt in outward appearance.

Gloceſter attacks Leiceſter directly, but drops his Accuſation.

THIS Broil, betwixt two of the moſt powerful Barons, having put the King in hopes that he ſhould gain ſome advantage from it, he made haſte before it was decided, and requeſted the Pope that he wou'd pleaſe to abſolve him from the Oath which he had taken, with reſpect to the Statutes of Oxford. At the ſame time, as he did not doubt but the Pope would grant him his Requeſt, he recalled the Biſhop of Winchеſter, to make uſe of his Counſels when it was time for Action. But this Prelate died as he was on the Road for England. This did not hinder Henry from purſuing his Point. Alexander IV. readily granted him his Requeſt, but that Pope dying before the Bull was diſpatch'd, he was oblig'd to wait for a new Pope. This happened to be Urban IV. who not being more ſcrupulous than his Predeceſſor, cauſed the Diſpenſation to be diſpatch'd.

Biſhop of Winchеſter's Recall and Death.

Henry is abſolved by the Pope from his Oath relating to the Oxford Statutes.

He tells the Parl. he will obſerve the Oxford Proviſions no longer.

AS ſoon as the King was furniſhed with this Bull, he went to the Parliament, and there openly declared that he would no longer obſerve the Statutes of Oxford. The reaſon he alledg'd for it was, that the Promiſe made to him had not been kept, which indeed was true; but he did not mention a word about the Pope's Diſpenſation. After this, repairing to the Tower, the Governour of which he had gained to his ſide, he turned out all the Magiſtrates eſtabliſhed by the twenty-four, and named others in their room. This caus'd extraordinary Confuſion in the Kingdom, ſome being for Obedience to the Magiſtrates eſtabliſh'd by the twenty-four, and others for obeying thoſe of the King, ſo that Juſtice could not be adminiſtered but with great difficulty. The Barons immediately reſolv'd to preſent an Addreſs to the King, in which they deſired him to remember his Oath, but he deferred his Anſwer, on pretence that he expected the Return of the Prince his Son, who was gone into France. Edward hearing what had paſſed in England, returned thither forthwith, and, contrary to the King's Expectation, publickly blamed him for having broke his Word. That was a mortifying ſtroke to the King; but he ſoon met with another more fatal Blow, in a Reconciliation, which was more hearty than the former, between the Earls of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, upon whoſe Diſagreement he had founded his Hopes. This Reconciliation having left him no Remedy, he reſolved to ſue to the Barons for an Accommodation; and the ſame was actually ſet on foot: But the King, who thought to render his cauſe the better, being ſo weak as to ſhew the Bull which he had obtained from the Pope, the Negotiation broke off, becauſe the Barons found that they could depend no longer upon the King's Engagements. Not long after, they endeavoured to ſeize the King, who was gone to Winchеſter, but he had the good luck to be informed of their Deſign early enough to ſecure himſelf in the Tower. All things tending manifeſtly to a Civil War; the Governors of the Cinque Ports eſpous'd the Barons Party, and caus'd fifty Ships to be fitted out, as they were oblig'd by their Charter, pretending that it was for the Service of the King, tho' the Fleet was intended to ſerve againſt him.

Cinque Ports declare againſt the King.

AT length in 1262, the King of the Romans perceiving the King his Brother in a very unhappy Situation, found means to induce him to promiſe that he would confirm the Statutes of Oxford, and engaged the Barons to give up thoſe Articles which were of moſt prejudice to the Regal Authority.

King promiſes to confirm the Oxford Proviſions.

PROBABLY the power of the twenty-four was aboliſhed, or at leaſt limited by this Accommodation, which entirely diſunited the Barons Party, ſome of whom accepted it for preventing a Civil War, and others entirely rejected it. The Earl of Leiceſter was one of the latter, and retired to France, that he might not remain expoſed to the King's Reſentment. But the Calm which this Accommodation procur'd, was of no long continuance.

gaining time, had no design to keep his Word, because he set out for Guyenne without having confirmed the Oxford Statutes, though the Barons on their part had executed their Engagements with very great exactness. This Non-observance on the part of the King alarms the Barons. They who had not signed the Accommodation, made those uneasy who had accepted it, by persuading them that it was only a Snare to surprize them, and an Artifice to break the Association. The Earl of Gloecester dying while these things were transacting, his Son Gilbert went to Guyenne to wait upon the King, in order to receive the Investiture of the Fiefs which had been in the possession of the Earl his Father, and returned very much out of humour with the King, because he was forced to pay a great Sum of Money in order to obtain it. At length the Earl of Leicester being informed of the Disposition of the Barons, returned immediately to England, and was extraordinary sollicitous to feed the Flame which began again to break out.

And the King likewise.

IN 1263. HENRY hearing of what pass'd in England, set out thither immediately, but came too late. The Barons had already concerted Measures to put themselves in such a condition, that they might have no further occasion to trust to his Promises. He was no sooner arrived, than they summoned him to perform his Engagements concerning the Statutes of Oxford. But the King instead of returning a mild Answer, as they expected, treated them as Rebels, and threatned to punish them. He was emboldened to do this, because while he was gone to Guyenne, he had gained the Prince his Son, and the King of the Romans, and engaged them in his Interests. Edward had actually rais'd some Troops in France, and sent them into England, on pretence of making War upon the Prince of Wales. Tho' a War in England seem'd unavoidable, yet it did not begin as soon as was believed. Neither of the Parties had as yet made any Preparation, but both sides endeavour'd to amuse each other with Negotiations, which only tended to give each of the two Parties time to make their Preparations; for indeed Troops were openly rais'd on both sides, and the Barons had already made choice of the Earl of Leicester for their General. While the Negotiations were still kept on foot, tho' without much appearance of Success, the People were incens'd against the Foreigners, who were become odious, because of the preference which the King gave them before his own Subjects. A great number of them were very ill treated, while the Earl of Leicester on his part caused the Estates of the King's Favourites and Counsellors to be plundered without Mercy. At length the City of London openly espous'd the Barons Party against the King, who shut himself up in the Tower till his Troops were ready; for the Levies that were made for him were not so soon compleated as those for the Barons.

Barons call upon him to perform his Engagements, but he threatens them.

London declares for the Barons.

THOUGH a War was resolved on both sides, yet the two Parties temporiz'd. Each wanted his Enemy to strike the first Blow, because the main point in view was to gain the common People, who on such occasions ought by no means to be neglected. It was with this View that the Barons caused a very respectful Petition to be presented to the King, wherein they offer'd their Consent that a free Parliament should reform the Statutes of Oxford, on condition that the King's Ministers should be chosen out of Persons who were Natives of the Kingdom, as was the Practice every where else. The King returned no Answer to this Petition, tho' he was closely block'd up in the Tower, because he hoped that the Prince his Son would speedily come to his Relief. But the Barons being encamped at Thistleworth, stopp'd up the only Avenue through which the Prince must pass, and thereby broke his Measures as well as the King's. The King, upon the failure of this Resource, was obliged to signify to the Barons, that he would confirm the Statutes of Oxford. Tho' the Barons did not place abundance of Confidence in his Promises, yet they were afraid to reject this Offer, because it was all that they wanted; and their Refusal might have given cause for a suspicion that they were resolv'd upon a War without any necessity. A Treaty was therefore made, containing these four Articles. 1. That the Oxford Statutes should be inviolably observed. 2. That all the strong Places should be put in the hands of the Barons. 3. That all Foreigners, except such as should be allowed by the unanimous Consent of the Barons, should be banished the Kingdom. 4. That the Administration of Affairs should be committed to natural-born Englishmen, approved of by the Barons. The King signed this Treaty without any design, as far as appear'd, to put it in execution, his Aim being only to extricate himself from that unhappy Situation in which he was plung'd. An Insult committed by the Populace upon the Queen, as she pass'd in a Boat under London-Bridge, furnished the King with the Pretext, which, in all appearance, he wanted. He began therefore to fortify the Places which he had in his hands, and which, according to the Treaty, he should have delivered up to the Barons; and by that means he plainly let them see that it was too soon to disband their Troops.

But the People of Briſtol being deſirous to ſhift off the Yoke which was prepared for them, block'd up the Caſtle ſo cloſely, that Edward, who went thither to give the neceſſary Orders, was forced to make uſe of a Stratagem to come back again. He ſent word to the Biſhop of Worceſter, that his Deſign was to go and wait upon the King, in order to exhort him to give the Barons entire ſatisfaction; but that not being able to ſtir out of the Caſtle, he deſired him to be his Security to the Citizens of Briſtol, and to accompany him to London to be Witneſs of his Conduct. The Biſhop having done as Edward deſired, the Blockade was raiſed, and they both ſet out for London; but when they came near Windſor, the Prince ſuddenly clap'd Spurs to his Horſe, rid away from the Prelate without taking leave of him, and went and ſhut himſelf up in his Caſtle of Windſor. The Barons, who were encamp'd at Kingſton upon Thames, having Intelligence how he had impoſed upon the Biſhop, march'd immediately and beſieged Windſor, which was too ill provided for a long Reſiſtance. Anno 1264. MEAN while, as the King was not yet ſufficiently prepared to execute his Deſigns, he ſent to the Barons to deſire a Truce, which was granted him, and was followed with a Peace on the ſame Conditions as the former. But the King broke it altogether as ſoon as the other, by a fruitleſs Attempt which he made to take Dover-Caſtle by ſurprize. This Proceeding loſt him all the Confidence of the Barons, who now thought of nothing but War. The Earl of Leiceſter having entered London, ſo fortify'd himſelf by the Aſſiſtance of that great City, that the King was oblig'd once more to deſire an Accommodation. But as all Treaties hitherto had been to no purpoſe, they agreed at laſt to make the King of France Mediator, and to ſubmit themſelves to his Award. Lewis having accepted the Office of Arbitrator in this Affair, pronounced a Sentence which was altogether in the King's favour. But becauſe in that ſame Sentence he declared that he did not intend to offer any prejudice to the lawful Privileges of the Engliſh, the Barons rejected it, pretending that there was a manifeſt Contradiction in it, becauſe the Statutes of Oxford, which were repealed by the Sentence, were only made to maintain them in their Privileges.

At laſt he reſolved to march directly to London, in hopes that the City would be ſo diſpirited as to open its Gates to him, and that by that means the Barons Party would be entirely ruin'd. But the Earl of Leiceſter, who was got into the City before him, ſo exaſperated the Citizens, by repreſenting to them the Terrors of being at the King's Mercy, that they offered him a Body of their Militia to go and fight the Royal Army. Henry being informed of this Reſolution, did not think fit to give Battle at the Gates of London, but retired into the County of Suſſex, and went and encamped at Lewes, where the Earl of Leiceſter, being reinforced by the Militia of London, arrived almoſt at the ſame time. The two Armies being ſo near one another, that it was in a manner impoſſible to avoid a Battle, the Barons cauſed a very ſubmiſſive Petition to be preſented to the King, in which they pray'd him to act in conjunction with them for reforming the Abuſes in the Government, in order to prevent the Effuſion of Engliſh Blood. But this Petition was received with ſo much Diſdain and Contempt, that the provok'd Barons publickly renounc'd their Obedience to the King, and declar'd him and his Adherents Enemies to their Country.

Barons renounce their Fealty.

ALL hopes of Peace being vaniſh'd by this Declaration, the two Armies rang'd themſelves in order of Battle, to decide the Quarrel by the Sword. † May 14. Prince Edward, who commanded the right Wing of the King's Army, charged the Militia of London, who were poſted over-againſt him on the Left of the Enemy's Army, with ſuch Vigour and Succeſs, that he forc'd them to give ground; but purſuing them too far, he found as he returned to the Field of Battle, that the Royal Army was put to the rout, and the King his Father, and the King of the Romans taken Priſoners. The Barons Army being diſordered in purſuit of the flying Enemy, Prince Edward would fain have attack'd them immediately with the victorious Body under his Command. But he did not find Reſolution in his Troops to make the Onſet ſoon enough; and while he miſs'd the critical Juncture in perſuading them, the Earl of Leiceſter rallied his Forces with all poſſible diligence, and in order to gain time, caus'd Propoſals of Accommodation to be made to Prince Edward, who was ſo weak as to ſuffer himſelf to be amus'd, while his Enemy, at the ſame time that he prolong'd the Negotiation, had thereby an opportunity to ſend Detachments from all Quarters, to cut off his Retreat. To be ſhort, Edward found himſelf in that unhappy Situation, as to be able neither to fight nor retreat without without manifeſt Danger. For this Reaſon he was forced at laſt to accept of the Terms which the Earl offered him. It was agreed therefore betwixt them, that the Statutes of Oxford ſhould be amended by four Biſhops, and four Barons to be choſe by the Parliament; and in caſe thoſe Commiſſioners could not agree, the matter ſhould be referred to the Arbitration of the Earl of Anjou, Brother to the King of France, aſſiſted by four French Noblemen; and that till every thing was ſettled by the Parliament, Edward, and Henry Son to the King of the Romans, ſhould remain as Hoſtages in the hands of the Barons. This is what was call'd la Miſe, or the Agreement at Lewes, which was never executed.

The Miſe of Lewes.

THE Earl of Leiceſter having the King, and almoſt all the Royal Family in his power, made uſe from thenceforth of the King's Name and Authority, and challeng'd all Obedience to himſelf. He made the King his Priſoner iſſue Orders to his own Creatures to deliver up the Places which they had in their power, and treated thoſe as Rebels who refuſed implicit Obedience to the King, from the time that he was his Priſoner. Not long after, the Barons form'd a new Plan of Government, and were reſolv'd to get it approved by the Parliament. In order to render this Aſſembly, from which they propoſed to exclude all the King's Party, the more numerous, and the more ſolemn, they eſtabliſh'd in every County four Officers, to whom they gave the Title of Conſervators, with a very great Authority. They afterwards procured an Order from the King, directed to thoſe Conſervators, to make choice of four Knights of their Diſtrict to ſit in Parliament. There are many who found the Origin of the Commons Right to ſit in Parliament by their Deputies, on this Inſtance. Others think the ſaid Right of the Commons much more antient *. However it be, this Parliament thus compos'd, approv'd of the Barons new Plan; which contain'd in ſubſtance, "That "the Parliament ſhould nominate three great "Commiſſioners who ſhould have the power "of chuſing nine Counſellors, to whom the "Adminiſtration of publick Affairs ſhould "be committed. That if two thirds of the "nine were not of one and the ſame Opinion, "the Affair in diſpute ſhould be referr'd to "the three great Commiſſioners. That the "King, with the conſent of the three great "Commiſſioners, might caſhier or alter the "nine Counſellors, or part of them, and even "the three Commiſſioners with the Appro-"bation of the Barons. That the publick Of-"fices ſhould be at the Diſpoſal of the nine "Counſellors." It would be eaſy to ſhew that this new Plan was altogether in favour of the Earl of Leiceſter. But I don't think there's any manner of neceſſity for inſiſting on this matter. The King and the Prince were oblig'd to approve of this new Form of Government.

HENRY III.

King and Pr. forc'd to conſent to it.

WHILE theſe things paſs'd in England, Urban IV. had appointed for his Legate in this Kingdom, Guido, Cardinal of St. Sabine; who, on his arrival at Paris, received a Letter from the Earl of Leiceſter, acquainting him that he would not be received in England. Notwithſtanding this, the Legate proceeded as far as Boulogne, from whence he ſummoned all the Biſhops of England to come to him, in order to give an account of their Conduct. But the Biſhops did not think fit to obey this Summons. When the Affairs of the Government were regulated after the manner above-mentioned, the Barons thought it neceſſary to give ſome ſatisfaction to the Legate, by ſending him four Biſhops to juſtify their Conduct. But thoſe Deputies found him ſo incens'd, that inſtead of hearkening to Reaſon, he charg'd them with an Order in writing to excommunicate the Earls of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, and to put their Eſtates, and the City of London, under an Interdict. The Deputies having ſent an Account to England of the Order which was given them in charge, met a Ship at Sea, as they were returning home, the Commander of which pretending to be a Pirate, took away their Papers, together with the Legate's Order, and threw them over-board. The Legate ſeeing that this was not a time of day to aſſert or exert the Authority of his Maſter, returned to Rome, where he was ſoon after elected Pope by the Name of Clement IV.

NOT long after this, the Earl of Leiceſter was perplex'd on a ſudden with two Affairs, which made him uneaſy. The Queen had rais'd an Army in France, and ſent it to Gravelin, in order to go on board there for England; while, on the other hand, ſome Lords took Arms for the King in the Counties which border'd upon Wales. The Earl's good fortune gain'd him a happy Deliverance. In the firſt place he prevented the Rebels, by engaging Llewellin Prince of Wales in his Intereſt, on whoſe Aſſiſtance they had depended: after which he beat them, and forced them to lay down their Arms. On the other hand, the French Troops were ſo long windbound, that the Queen was obliged to disband her Army, having no more Money to ſubſiſt it.

Revolt of ſome Engliſh Lords againſt the Barons Government.

THIS Perplexity was follow'd by another in 1265, the Conſequences of which were much more fatal to the Earl of Leiceſter. He had been ſuſpected for ſome time of Views too ambitious, and of no leſs a Deſign than to pave Leiceſter ſuſpected of aſpiring to the Crown.

* Dr. Brady thinks this was the firſt Convention wherein the Sheriffs were ordered to return two Knights for each County, and the Cities and Burghs two Citizens and Burgeſſes reſpectively; and that Simon de Montfort ſummon'd this Convention, and altered the antient Uſage, becauſe of the Danger that he and his Friends apprehended from the Concourſe of the Nobility and their great Retinues, and the Example of his and the Barons Practices at Oxford. pave his own way to the Throne. This Suſpicion was principally founded upon his detaining in Priſon Prince Edward, who according to the Agreement at Lewes, ought to have had his liberty, becauſe he was only a Hoſtage till the Government was regulated; which Regulation was already made. The Earl of Leiceſter being conſcious that his Conduct was cenſurable upon that head, endeavour'd to blind the Publick, by pretending to reſtore that Prince to his liberty, and keeping a Guard upon him all the while. For this purpoſe he call'd a Parliament, and gave out, that it was to find out ways and means to ſet the Prince at liberty. Upon this Occaſion every County had Orders to depute two Knights, and every City two Burgeſſes to ſit in Parliament; which 'tis pretended was the firſt time that the Towns ſent Deputies to Parliament. But without entring here into ſo difficult a Queſtion, I ſhall only ſay, that from the time of the Earl of Leiceſter's Adminiſtration, the Right of the Commons to ſit in Parliament was never once diſputed. This Parliament, which was almoſt entirely at the Earl's Devotion, order'd, that the Prince ſhou'd be ſet at liberty, and that he ſhou'd always continue with the King his Father, to obey him in all things. But as the King was a Priſoner, this was ſtill leaving the Prince in the Cuſtody of the Earl of Leiceſter, who indeed caus'd him to be very narrowly watch'd.

THIS Proceeding only ſerv'd to confirm the Suſpicion of the Publick, and particularly of the Earl of Gloceſter; who, not thinking ſuch Satisfaction ſufficient, took Arms, and drew in a great number of Men to his Party. The Earl of Leiceſter being unwilling to give him time to make himſelf formidable, caus'd him to be proclaim'd a Traitor; and putting himſelf at the head of the Army, march'd directly to Hereford, that he might be at hand to attack him, taking along with him the King and the Prince, who were both well guarded. But his Precautions were in vain. Edward having found means to eſcape *, went to meet the Earl of Gloceſter, who yielded the Command of his Troops to him, after he had made him take an Oath that he wou'd do his utmoſt, to put the ancient Laws in force, to reform Abuſes, and to remove Foreigners from the King's Perſon.

THE Prince's Eſcape was a mortal Blow to the Earl of Leiceſter, who nevertheleſs diſſembled his Uneaſineſs as much as poſſible, always acting as if his Affairs were not in the leaſt affected by that Event. It was at the ſame time, that by virtue of a Commiſſion from the King, he ſolemnly renounced for the King and Prince Edmund, all Pretenſions that they might have to the Kingdom of Sicily: after which he caus'd the ſaid Renunciation to be notified to the Pope by a Letter from the King.

He renounces the Pretenſions to Sicily.

As ſoon as Prince Edward was at the head of an Army, the number of his Troops increas'd ſo conſiderably, that he was ſoon in a condition to go in queſt of the Earl of Leiceſter; who finding himſelf inferior, retired from place to place, to advantageous Poſts, in order to avoid a Battle. He waited with impatience for the Succours that Simon de Montfort his Son was bringing to him from Kent, which actually arriv'd about a Day's Journey from Eveſham, where the Father was encamp'd. But Edward, who had been inform'd of Montfort's March, met and entirely defeated him †. Immediately after this Victory, he return'd back, and fell upon the Earl of Leiceſter, who had not yet received the News of his Son's Defeat. In this Battle, which was fought juſt by Eveſham, the Earl of Leceiſter was kill'd, his ‡ Army put to the Rout, and the King whom he carried along with him, recover'd his liberty.

HENRY was no ſooner free, but he reſolv'd to be reveng'd of his Enemies, and by that means made ſome of them deſperate. Simon de Montfort, who had the King of the Romans under his Care in Kenelworth-Caſtle, ſet him at liberty without requiring any Ranſom, in hopes of engaging that Prince to be his Protector. But this Protection not being ſufficient to procure him the King's Pardon, he quitted Kenelworth, after having left a good Gariſon there, and retir'd to the Iſle of Axholm in the Shire of Lincoln. There it was that he rallied the ſcatter'd Remains of his Father's Army; and as that Iſland might eaſily be guarded, he gave the King occaſion to repent of his too great Severity.

Simon de Montfort's Retreat to the Iſle of Axholm

IN the beginning of the Year 1266, the Queen and Prince Edmund arriv'd from France, to which Kingdom they retired after the Battle of Lewes. They were ſoon followed by a Legate from Clement IV. Succeſſor to Urban IV. who excommunicated the Earl of Leiceſter, tho' dead ‖, with all his Adherents, whether dead or alive. Then he notify'd to the King a Bull from Urban IV. which revok'd the Grant of Sicily to Prince Edmund. This Bull was hitherto kept ſecret, becauſe the Court of Rome had been in Treaty upon this very Affair with Charles Earl of Anjou, Brother to the King of France, to whom Clement IV. gave this very Year the Inveſtiture of Sicily, on condition that he ſhou'd diſpoſſeſs Manfred, who till then had kept poſſeſſion of it.

Edw. reduces the Cinque Ports.

SIMON de Montfort growing every day more and more formidable in the Island of Axholm, Edward caus'd the Army to march that way: and at last, tho' with very great difficulty, he oblig'd Montfort to surrender, and to promise to deliver up Kenelworth-Castle. But it was not in his power to perform his Contract, the Governour of the Castle refusing to obey his Order. In a little time after, Edward found a way by fair means to reduce the Cinque Ports to the King's Obedience.

Kenelworth besieg'd.

WHILE the Court thought they had nothing more to do than to reduce the Castle of Kenelworth, some of the Malecontents made themselves Masters of the Isle of Ely, where their Party grew so strong, after being join'd by a great many others that took Refuge there, that this became a very momentous Affair, by reason of the Situation of the Island, which had formerly given William the Conqueror a great deal of Trouble. Nevertheless it was thought fit before all things to besiege Kenelworth-Castle. But as that Place was strong and well provided, the King was oblig'd to turn the Siege into a Blockade.

Parl. held there.

Anno 1267. IT was during this Blockade, and in the very Town of Kenelworth situate below the Castle, that the King assembled a Parliament, which offered very advantagious Terms to the Rebels of Ely: but they did not think fit to accept them, for Reasons which we shall see presently. In fine, the Garison of Kenelworth capitulating, after having sustain'd a long Blockade, the King immediately thought of Methods to humble the Rebels of Ely. But new Troubles arose, which he did not foresee. After the Battle of Evesham, he steer'd his old course; and thinking that he had nothing more to fear, he carried his Authority as far as ever he had done, without being much concern'd for either the Laws or Privileges of the People. Even Edward, tho' engaged by Oath with the Earl of Gloceſter, took not one Step to perform his Promise. The Earl of Gloceſter, provok'd at this Conduct, was resolved to make both the King and the Prince sensible that he was not to be despised with impunity. Besides, he found by their Conduct, that if the Rebels of Ely were once oppress'd, it wou'd be too difficult to confine the Royal Authority to the Bounds which he desired. Therefore he sent early notice to the Rebels of Ely, that he was coming to their Assistance; and indeed he made Preparations which gave the King Umbrage: and as he cou'd not tell what to think of it, he sent to him to know what was the Motive of his arming. The Earl answer'd, that 'twas only to defend himself against Mortimer his Neighbour and Enemy; and gave a Writing signed with his own Hand, whereby he promis'd never to bear Arms against the King. This Promise laid the King asleep; who fearing nothing more on that side, went to Cambridge with his Army, in order to go and besiege Ely. The Earl of Gloceſter was no sooner inform'd that the King was gone from London, but he march'd in all haste to that City, where he was agreeably received by the Inhabitants: after which he sent a Summons to the Legate to deliver up the Tower to him, of which the King when he went away, had made him Keeper. The Legate pretended at first, that he wou'd stand a Siege, but in a few days he surrender'd. This done, the Earl publish'd a Manifesto, in which he said that he had taken Arms to oblige the King and the Prince to the better Performance of their Engagements.

E. of Gloceſter takes measures against the King.

AS the King knew not what course to take to get out of the Broil, occasion'd by this fresh Rebellion, he saw no other way than to recall the Prince his Son who was employ'd in some other Expedition. Edward having join'd the King's Army with the Body under his Command, and having sent for more Troops thither from other parts, the Earl of Gloceſter, whose Force was very inferior, and durst not venture out of London, was at length reduc'd to desire a Peace; which was very easily granted him, and the City of London was actually included in the Treaty. The Rebels of Ely having now no Remedy left, were at last forced to surrender, without being able to obtain any other Terms than the sparing of Life and Limb. Thus ended the War of the Barons, which was really fatal to those that lived in that Age; but was however the means of procuring to their Posterity, and to all the People of England, the Enjoyment of the Privileges contain'd in the Great Charter. The Successors of Henry III. chose to submit to this Yoke, rather than expose themselves to the same Risk as he did, when he endeavour'd to free himself from it.

Anno 1267. IT was during this Blockade, and in the very Town of Kenelworth ſituate below the Caſtle, that the King aſſembled a Parliament, which offered very advantagious Terms to the Rebels of Ely: but they did not think fit to accept them, for Reaſons which we ſhall ſee preſently. In fine, the Gariſon of Kenelworth capitulating, after having ſuſtain'd a long Blockade, the King immediately thought of Methods to humble the Rebels of Ely. But new Troubles aroſe, which he did not foreſee. After the Battle of Eveſham, he ſteer'd his old courſe; and thinking that he had nothing more to fear, he carried his Authority as far as ever he had done, without being much concern'd for either the Laws or Privileges of the People. Even Edward, tho' engaged by Oath with the Earl of Gloceſter, took not one Step to perform his Promiſe. The Earl of Gloceſter, provok'd at this Conduct, was reſolved to make both the King and the Prince ſenſible that he was not to be deſpiſed with impunity. Beſides, he found by their Conduct, that if the Rebels of Ely were once oppreſs'd, it wou'd be too difficult to confine the Royal Authority to the Bounds which he deſired. Therefore he ſent early notice to the Rebels of Ely, that he was coming to their Aſſiſtance; and indeed he made Preparations which gave the King Umbrage: and as he cou'd not tell what to think of it, he ſent to him to know what was the Motive of his arming. The Earl anſwer'd, that 'twas only to defend himſelf againſt Mortimer his Neighbour and Enemy; and gave a Writing ſigned with his own Hand, whereby he promis'd never to bear Arms againſt the King. This Promiſe laid the King aſleep; who fearing nothing more on that ſide, went to Cambridge with his Army, in order to go and beſiege Ely. The Earl of Gloceſter was no ſooner inform'd that the King was gone from London, but he march'd in all haſte to that City, where he was agreeably received by the Inhabitants: after which he ſent a Summons to the Legate to deliver up the Tower to him, of which the King when he went away, had made him Keeper. The Legate pretended at firſt, that he wou'd ſtand a Siege, but in a few days he ſurrender'd. This done, the Earl publiſh'd a Manifeſto, in which he ſaid that he had taken Arms to oblige the King and the Prince to the better Performance of their Engagements.

As the King knew not what courſe to take to get out of the Broil, occaſion'd by this freſh Rebellion, he ſaw no other way than to recall the Prince his Son who was employ'd in ſome other Expedition. Edward having join'd the King's Army with the Body under his Command, and having ſent for more Troops thither from other parts, the Earl of Gloceſter, whoſe Force was very inferior, and durſt not venture out of London, was at length reduc'd to deſire a Peace; which was very eaſily granted him, and the City of London was actually included in the Treaty. The Rebels of Ely having now no Remedy left, were at laſt forced to ſurrender, without being able to obtain any other Terms than the ſparing of Life and Limb. Thus ended the War of the Barons, which was really fatal to thoſe that lived in that Age; but was however the means of procuring to their Poſterity, and to all the People of England, the Enjoyment of the Privileges contain'd in the Great Charter. The Succeſſors of Henry III. choſe to ſubmit to this Yoke, rather than expoſe themſelves to the ſame Risk as he did, when he endeavour'd to free himſelf from it.

the King was to name one half, and the Barons the other; and that they both engag'd themſelves by Oath to follow what the whole Body or the Majority ſhould agree to. Nevertheleſs, according to this Letter from the Engliſh Lords, the King's (a) Brothers, who were come from France, had hindered the King from performing his Promiſe. Ademare was as great an Obſtacle as any, who being elected Biſhop of Wincheſter, tho' he had not yet taken Orders, fed the King with thoſe Notions, promiſed him whatever Money he ſhould want in the Controverſy, tho' it ſhould exhauſt his Biſhoprick; and in ſhort, he made Confuſion every where, and ſhook the Kingdom. The Barons did all they could to get the Laws re-eſtabliſhed according to the Agreement; but the King's Brothers aim'd at breaking all their Meaſures, and cauſed very great Diſorders in the Kingdom: ſo that, ſay the Barons, neither their Inferiors, nor their Equals, nor their Superiors, could live or converſe with them. They were therefore ſummoned before a Court of Juſtice, to give an account of their Conduct, ſo that two of them were permitted to retire to France, on condition that two ſhould ſtay in England to appear at the Bar of Juſtice; but they all withdrew to France with a Paſſport from the King, which comes after this Act.

The Barons, after having told their Story to the Pope, deſire he would ſo order it, that the King's Brother might ſtay in France, and eſpecially Ademare, who being elected to the See of Wincheſter, and the chief Cauſe of all the Miſchiefs, they even deſired the Pope to deprive him altogether of his Biſhopric, the very People of England hating the Thoughts of his coming back again; which was the more eaſy for the Pope to do, becauſe he had only the Adminiſtration of the Biſhopric, and had never yet been conſecrated.

† Inſtead of exhorting the King to the Obſervance of the old Laws of the Kingdom, he ſent an Order to certain Prelates, to abſolve all thoſe who had engaged themſelves by Oath to execute what the Majority of the 24 Barons had reſolved on, and to excommunicate thoſe who would not break their Engagements.

‖ She was his Siſter-in-Law. This Arbitration came to nothing; and the People of England were ſtill the more incens'd.

* In this manner the Pope made a Jeſt of the Oaths of the King and People, as if neither the one nor the other had any Right to take or keep them without their leave.

† In 1263, Urban wrote word to the King and Prince Edmund, that he was reſolved to give the Kingdom of Sicily to another, becauſe they were not able to perform the Conditions upon which it had been granted to Prince Edmund; and afterwards he inveſted in it Charles of Anjou, Brother to St. Louis King of France. Thus after the See of Rome had ſqueez'd great Sums of Money out of England upon this very ſcore, they deprived her of all hopes of the Iſland. The worſt on't was, that either the King of England would have been oblig'd to refuſe that Crown, or at leaſt to have renounced it ſoon after. For to give a Kingdom in which the Donor has no right in reality, on condition that the Perſon to whom it is granted, ſhall go and conquer it at his own Hazard and Expence, is making a Preſent as unjuſt as it is miſchievous, and as injurious to him who accepts it, as diſhonourable to him who gives it.

‡ After the example of the Pope, with whoſe Authority he had clothed himſelf, he annulled all that the Barons had obtained of the King, and decided perfectly in his favour, tho' he left things in the ſame State they were in before the Treaty which the Barons had made with the King.

The Barons were not to be commended for referring the Laws and Privileges of their Country to the Arbitration and Award of a Prince, who was not only their King's Brother-in-Law, but moreover a King himſelf; a Title which thoſe beyond Sea generally hold to be incompatible with the Liberties and Privileges of the People. Beſides, Lewis was a blind Bigot in religious Affairs; and the Pope's declaring for Henry, was Warrant enough for him to be of the ſame ſide of the Queſtion. Nor was it good Policy in a King, who had a great many powerful Vaſſals of his own, to give Judgment in favour of Vaſſals againſt their Sovereign, for fear, leſt that in a like Caſe, the Vaſſals of the Kings of France ſhou'd one time or other try the ſame Expedient.

However the Barons of England refuſed to ſtand to Lewis's Award: They took no more notice of it than the King did of the Oath in 1258. from which the Pope abſolv'd him, as has been already ſaid.

ARTICLE III.

Affairs which relate to the reſt of Henry IIId's Reign, after the end of the Civil War.

FROM the end of the Barons War, to the Death of Henry III. we don't meet with any Affair of Conſequence in the Hiſtory of that Prince, which requires much Explanation; therefore in this Article I ſhall only briefly relate the moſt conſiderable Tranſactions during that Interval, in the Order of Annals.

Anno 1267. AFTER Henry had reduc'd the Earl of Gloceſter, and the Rebels of Ely, he was reſolv'd, before he disbanded his Army, to chaſtize the Prince of Wales; who during all the late Troubles, had aſſiſted the Barons, and diſcover'd an extraordinary Zeal upon all Occaſions to foment Diviſion among the Engliſh. With this Deſign he advanc'd as far as Montgomery, whither Llewellin ſent Ambaſſadors to him, to deſire a Peace, offering him at the ſame time to do him Homage for his Dominions, and to pay him 25000 Marks of Silver. But Henry was reſolv'd to have ſome Caſtles into the bargain, which might facilitate his Entrance into Wales, in caſe that Llewellin ſhou'd ever revolt. And upon that foot a Peace was concluded, by the Mediation of Cardinal Ottoboni, who was Legate in England.

HENRY III.

Henry's Convention with the Prince of Wales.

Pope deſigns a Cruſado.

IN 1268, the Parliament being aſſembled, the Legate ſignified to them, that the Pope had a Deſign to publiſh a Cruſado againſt the Infidels; and at the ſame time he exhorted the Engliſh not to ſlip this Opportunity of meriting Paradiſe, by ſerving God and the Church. Prince Edward, Henry, Son to the King of the Romans, many Earls and Barons, and above ſixſcore Knights, beſides a great number of the common People, receiv'd the Croſs from the hands of the Legate, who ſoon after return'd to Rome.

Vacancy of the Papal See three Years.

CLEMENT IV. dying that very Year, the Papal See remain'd vacant for three Years.

French King's Negotiation for the Cruſado.

THO' St. Lewis had ill Succeſs in a former Expedition which he undertook againſt the Infidels, yet he engag'd in this new Cruſado, of which he was to be the Commander in Chief; and as he knew that Edward had alſo taken up the Croſs, he deſired him to come and ſee him at Paris, in hopes of inclining him to join with him. Edward deſir'd nothing better than to go and ſerve under ſo great a Prince; but he gave him to underſtand that the want of Money hinder'd him from ſetting out ſo ſoon as he wiſh'd. To remove this Obſtacle, Lewis lent him 30000 Marks of Silver; for the Payment of which Sum, Edward mortgag'd his Revenues of Bourdeaux to him for ſeven Years. Beſides this, the Parliament granted the King a conſiderable Sum, part of which was deſign'd for the Prince to ſupport the Charges of his Voyage.

He lends the Prince Money for it.

Subſidy granted for it.

Proceſſion with the Shrine of St. Edward.

THE Year 1269 offers nothing remarkable, but the Tranſlation of the Corps of Edward the Confeſſor, to the new Church of Weſtminſter, which was juſt finiſhed. The King himſelf, the King of the Romans, and ſome of the moſt diſtinguiſh'd Lords, carry'd the Shrine of that Saint upon their Shoulders.

St. Lewis lands in Africa before he proceeds to the Holy Land.

Anno 1270, St. Lewis, after he left France, inſtead of going directly to Syria, was

* It was directed alſo to Peter of Savoy and John Manſel Treaſurer of York, and the Earl of Leiceſter did not fail to make this Renunciation in favour of Charles of Anjou.

FOEDERA Tom. I. was perſuaded by the new King of Sicily, his Brother, to make a Deſcent with his Army in Africa, in order to oblige the King of Tunis to pay him a certain Tribute which he had uſually paid to the Emperor of Conſtantinople, at the time that the Greeks were Maſters of Sicily. Edward, who was not able to ſet out ſo ſoon, went to take up his Princeſs at Bourdeaux, and proceeding from thence to Aigues Mortes, he there embark'd, and went to join the King of France, who was encamp'd near Tunis, where he ſtay'd for the execution of a Treaty he had made with the Mooriſh King. Notwithſtanding all that Edward could urge to engage Lewis to proceed on his Voyage to Paleſtine, he could not poſſibly prevail on him to ſail before the Treaty was executed. For this reaſon, ſince he had no Quarrel with the King of Tunis, he retir'd to Sicily, there to ſpend the Winter, till Lewis was ready. But not long after, he heard that this Prince died of the Plague in his Camp. The Apprehenſion he was under that his Son Philip III. who ſucceeded him, and was return'd from the Camp to France, might make ſome attempt upon Guyenne, made him take the Precaution to ſend Henry his Couſin, Son to the King of the Romans, into that Province. But this Prince as he paſs'd thro' Viterbo, was murder'd in a Church by Guy de Montfort, Son to the late Earl of Leiceſter.

Is join'd by Prince Edward.

King of the Romans' Son murder'd in a Church.

Anno 1271, EDWARD arriving at Acre, was not able, with the few Troops he had, to make any conſiderable Progreſs againſt the Infidels. Nevertheleſs, whether his Fame was already fled into that Country, or whether perhaps the Memory of Richard I. his great Uncle was not yet extinct, he was ſo formidable to them, that they choſe to free themſelves from their Fears by an Act of Treachery. A Ruffian who was hired to aſſaſſinate him, having found means to be introduced into his Chamber, on pretence of communicating a Secret to him, offered to run a Dagger into his Breaſt. But Edward parry'd the Blow with his Arm, in which he was dangerouſly wounded. The Aſſaſſin was going to redouble his Blow, when Edward prevented him by giving a kick in the Breaſt, upon which he fell to the ground, and ruſhing upon him at the ſame time, he wreſted the Dagger from him, and kill'd him. The Wound which he had received in the Arm was very dangerous, becauſe the Dagger was poiſon'd: But a skilful Surgeon put him out of danger. Some have aſcribed his cure to the Princeſs his Spouſe, who undertook to ſuck all the Venom out of the Wound. This Princeſs was brought to bed at Acre of a Daughter, who was chriſten'd Joanna, and ſurnamed d'Acre, from the Place of her Birth.

This ſhews to what hazards Princes expoſe their Dominions and Families by going to the Holy-Land; and the Popes took care to ſend them thither as often as they cou'd, becauſe the Abſence of the Princes gave the Clergy at home the more room to increaſe their Power and Wealth.

† Mr. Rapin, when he concludes his Account of the firſt Volume, makes this very pertinent Remark; That Mr. Rymer has not inſerted any of the Acts relating to the Re-eſtabliſhment of the Laws, and in particular of Magna Charta; which, according to our Hiſtorians, Henry made in the Fifty-firſt Year of his Reign. This is confeſs'd to be at leaſt as material an Omiſſion as any that could have happen'd of the Acts in his Time; becauſe the Non-obſervance of thoſe Laws was one of the principal Cauſes of the Civil-War therein mention'd. Perhaps, ſays Rapin, in ſome Reigns, when the bare mention of Privileges and Laws was Treaſon, and where arbitrary Power happen'd to be the only View of the Princes, there was a Deſign to remove thoſe Acts out of ſight, which ought to have been preſerv'd in the Records, preferably to all others. On the other hand, it is not to be doubted, but that length of time, and the Negligence of thoſe who had the Care of the Records, may have innocently robb'd us of the Sight of a great many conſiderable Pieces which the State-Hiſtoriographer might have ſearch'd for to Eternity.

FOEDERA Tom. II.

THE * SECOND TOME of Mr. RYMER'S Fœdera begins with the public Acts paſs'd before King Edward was return'd from the Holy-Land, and takes in all the Acts of that King's Reign from 1273, to 1307, which was the 35th Year of his Reign, and the laſt of his Life; for he died the 7th of July, that very Year,

P. 1059. as appears by a particular Account thereof at the end of this Tome.

To make an abridgment of all the Acts of this Tome, and at the ſame time to take in all the Events to which thoſe Acts have a Reference, wou'd be a work of great labour and length of time. What I propoſe therefore, is only to give you an Idea of the principal Occurrences, that you may be able to point your Readers to the Acts which they refer to, and to draw ſuch Inferences from them, as may be to the ſatisfaction of thoſe who have a Curioſity for ſuch Inquiries. I confeſs that ſome perhaps might look into this Collection with another View than I have done; and for example, might be induced to take particular notice of the Forms of the Acts, and of the Latin or French Terms which are therein uſed: And others perhaps, according as their different Studies lead them, might have a particular Inclination to take notice of ſome important Facts with reſpect to certain Affairs which I have paſs'd over in ſilence. But 'tis not poſſible to ſatisfy the Curioſity of all ſorts of Readers, unleſs one was to write a Hiſtory, as I have already ſaid, of all the Events to which the numerous Acts have a reference, which would ſwell the Work in hand beyond meaſure. Therefore I have confined myſelf to what I thought moſt curious; and to do it with Accuracy, inſtead of following the Order of Time in which thoſe Acts are rang'd, I ſhall conſider them according to the different Subjects of them, reſerving to myſelf the liberty of giving an Account of ſome things afterwards, which have no dependance upon one another.

EDWARD I.

THE principal Matters treated of in this Volume are,

I. THE War in Wales, which ended in the Conqueſt of that Country by Edward I.

II. THE Differences between the two Families of Arragon and Anjou, of which Edward I. was choſe Mediator.

III. THE War in Scotland, with the Origin and Cauſes of that War, which was attended with ſuch fatal Conſequences.

IV. THE Diſputes which Edward had with France.

V. THE Affairs which concern England in particular.

VI. THE Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, or rather the Controverſies which Edward had with the Popes.

VII. SOME Acts relating to Edward in particular.

VIII. AND laſtly, ſome diſtinct Acts which contain divers things Important and Curious.

I.

* When Mr. Le Clerc publiſh'd Mr. Rapin's Extract of this ſecond Tome in his Bibliotheque Choiſie, which was in the Year 1710, he introduced it thus:

"I lent the ſecond Tome of the Fœdera to a Gentleman of Merit, who is writing the Hiſtory of England, "and if he lives to finiſh it, will produce ſomething more accurate than has yet been exhibited on that Sub-"ject. He return'd me the Book with the following Extract of it. I wou'd name him, if I thought he wou'd "take it well; but as I am not ſure of it, 'tis ſufficient for me to ſay, that the Publick is oblig'd to him, and "not to me for this Extract."

FOEDERA Tom. II.

I. The Affairs of Wales.

IN this Tome we find ſeveral Acts relating to Wales, and the War which Edward carry'd into that Country; but there are few of them very important. It wou'd appear very ſtrange at this time of day, if a Prince ſhou'd take it into his head to put the Chief of his Clergy upon excommunicating the Princes with whom he happens to be at War. Nevertheleſs, at that time, ſuch a Proceeding cou'd not be for nothing, for we find here that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, after having excommunicated Leolyn Prince of Wales, requires the Archbiſhop of York to do the like.

King Edward's Archbiſhops excommunicate the Prince of Wales. p. 79.

THIS War in Wales was not began till after a ſolemn Judgment paſs'd againſt Leolyn, by the great Men of England, in the Year 1276. They condemn'd him for refuſing to come and do Homage to Edward, and the Excuſes he alledg'd for not coming were not admitted. They are only mention'd here in general, tho' the Exactneſs requir'd in Hiſtory made it abſolutely neceſſary to give the particulars *.

Engliſh Nobility paſs Judgment againſt him. p. 68.

AT length this War was determin'd by the death of Leolyn, who was kill'd in Battle in 1282†. There's a Letter from the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to King Edward, dated in this Year, which Mr Rymer copy'd from the Records at Lambeth; wherein he tells the King, that ſome Letters were found in Cypher in Leolyn's Pocket, by which it appear'd that he held a Correſpondence in England.

His Death. p. 224.

AFTER the Death of this Prince, his Brother David was taken and ſent to Edward, who caus'd him to be try'd by the Parliament of Shrewsbury, where he was condemn'd, and ſuffer'd Death as a Traytor, which never us'd to be inflicted before upon perſons of Diſtinction ‡. It cannot be deny'd but there was a vaſt deal of Barbarity in King Edward's Treatment of this Prince, the laſt of the Race of the antient Britiſh or Welſh Princes. Thus you have all that is of any importance in the Acts relating to this Affair.

Death of his Brother David.

II. Acts relating to the Differences between the Kings of Arragon and Sicily.

THERE'S a great number of Acts in this Tome which relate to theſe Differences, and to Edward's Negotiation for accommodating thoſe two Families; but to be enabled to underſtand theſe Acts at the firſt View, one muſt look back to the Hiſtory of the Quarrel on which they were founded; which is in ſubſtance this.

When Conradin, whom Charles of Anjou had order'd to be beheaded, was mounted on the Scaffold, the young Prince threw his Glove into the Square, deſiring the Perſon that took it up, to carry it to a Relation of his, as a Mark of the Inveſtiture he gave him of the Inheritance of the Family of Swabia, of which he was the laſt Heir Male. They ſay that this Glove was carry'd to Peter King of Arragon, who marry'd Conſtantia, Daughter of Mainfroy, the laſt King of Sicily, and who was natural Son to the Emperor Frederick II. Peter was not in haſte to improve what Pretenſions he might have to Sicily in Right of his Wife, till a Reſolution was form'd by John de Procida, a diſcontented Sicilian Nobleman, in concert with Pope Nicolas III. who was alſo incens'd againſt Charles of Anjou, to ſtir up the Sicilians to a Rebellion. After they had conſulted the neceſſary Meaſures, John de Procida went and communicated the Conſpiracy to the King of Arragon, and told him of his Deſign to deliver Sicily from its Tyrant. Peter was at firſt afraid of entring into a War, becauſe he did not foreſee how he cou'd get out of it with honour; but Procida remov'd all his difficulties. 1. By furniſhing him with the Money he had receiv'd from the Emperor of Conſtantinople, who in order to divert Charles from a Deſign to make War upon him, had depoſited great Sums of Money in Procida's hands to carry on the Conſpiracy. 2. By ſecretly giving him the Inveſtiture of Sicily in the Name of Pope Nicholas III. And thirdly and laſtly, by giving him to underſtand, that there was no manner of neceſſity for his engaging in this Undertaking, till the Sicilian Conſpiracy had taken effect. For this end it was agreed between them, that the King of Arragon ſhou'd equip a conſiderable Fleet, on pretence of making War againſt the Saracens, and that he ſhou'd lie upon the African ſhore, ready to ſail for Sicily if the Conſpiracy took effect; and that if it miſcarry'd, he might then without ſeeming to have had any manner of concern in it, go on to make War againſt the Saracens. Theſe Meaſures being concerted, Peter carry'd his Fleet to Africa, and there beſieg'd a Town which the Hiſtorians of Sicily call Andacalle. Mean time Procida's Plot ſucceeded, and the Sicilians cut the Throats of all the Frenchmen upon the Iſland; which was what they call to this Day, the Sicilian Veſpers ‖.

* They are mention'd in Powel's Chronicle of Wales, p. 336. and if true, ſeem very ſubſtantial: but Edward having reſolv'd on the Conqueſt of that Country, only wanted a Pretence for it. — Dr. Kennet in his Note upon Mr. Daniel's Account of this Affair, taxes him with not ſpeaking ſo much in favour of the Welſh as he might have done; and the Doctor quotes the aforeſaid Chronicle, to ſhew that they had other more ſubſtantial Reaſons for the War, that Leolyn and his Brother gave the Archbiſhop of Canterbury above a dozen Articles of Grievances, moſt of them very weighty, which provok'd them to take Arms; and that King Edward refus'd to treat with them.

† This rectifies another miſtake in our Hiſtorians, who place his Death in December 1283.

‡ Mr. Daniel ſays, he was firſt drawn at a Horſe's Tail about Shrewsbury, and then beheaded, his Body quarter'd, and his Heart and Bowels burnt; his Head was ſent to be ſet on the Tower, with his Brother's, and his four Quarters to theſe four Cities, viz. Briſtol, Northampton, York, and Wincheſter.

‖ It had that Name, becauſe the Bell which rung to Evening-Prayers was their Signal. The Maſſacre was on Eaſter-Eve.

FOEDERA Tom. II. Sicilian Vespers.

Charles of Anjou, who had a Fleet ready equipp'd to fall upon the Emperor of Greece, ſail'd immediately towards Sicily, and beſieg'd Meſſina; the Inhabitants whereof offer'd to ſurrender to him on this only Condition, that he would ſpare their Lives: but he was ſo enrag'd beyond meaſure, that he refus'd them that Condition, which made them reſolve to defend themſelves to the laſt Extremity. During this Siege, Procida went over to the King of Arragon, then in Africa, and inform'd him how much the Inhabitants of Meſſina were preſs'd for want of his Aſſiſtance. Before Peter quitted the Coaſts of Africa, he wrote a Letter to King Edward, dated in the Year 1282. from Altoyl (I know not whether it may not be the ſame place with Andacalle) in which he tells the King, that while he was employ'd in the War againſt the Saracens, the Sicilians had ſent Deputies to him, to deſire him to go and take Poſſeſſion of Sicily, which he was reſolv'd to do, ſince that Kingdom belong'd to his Wife Conſtantia. He ſail'd therefore for Sicily, and arriving at Palermo, was receiv'd and crown'd there as King. From thence he ſent a Note to Charles, wherein he acquainted him of his Arrival on the Iſland of Sicily, which was adjudg'd to him by Authority of the Church, Pope and Cardinals; and he commanded him to quit the Iſland immediately after the Receipt of his Letter, on pain of being compell'd to it by force. Charles anſwer'd this by another Letter of the ſame Strain, wherein he calls him a Miſcreant and Traitor to God, and the Holy Roman Church *. Mean time Charles, who while he beſieg'd Meſſina, did not expect the Town cou'd have any Relief, was afraid of being block'd up and ſtarv'd by the King of Arragon's Fleet, and therefore he abandon'd the Siege, and retir'd to Calabria; from whence he went to Rome to complain to the Pope againſt his Enemy, whom he call'd perfidious Traitor, and dared him to ſingle Combat. While Charles loſt time in complaining, Peter made good uſe of it in Sicily, by cauſing himſelf to be acknowledg'd in Meſſina, and all over the Iſland; after which he ſent his Ambaſſadors to Rome, where there was a new Pope that ſucceeded Nicholas III. viz. Martin IV. a Creature of Charles of Anjou, by whoſe Intrigues, or rather by a Force put upon the Cardinals, he was elected. Peter's Ambaſſadors made the beſt Anſwer they cou'd for their Maſter, and according to their Inſtructions, accepted for him the Duel propos'd by Charles of Anjou. This procur'd a Truce, during which the two Kings agreed to chuſe twelve Perſons each, in order to regulate the Time, Place, and Conditions of the Combat. Theſe twenty-four met accordingly, and drew up ſome Articles, which the two Kings ratify'd. It was therein agreed, that they ſhou'd fight at Bourdeaux upon the firſt of June 1283. each accompanied by a hundred Horſe. The very Articles are to be ſeen in this Tome. Their being never made publick before, has led ſome of the beſt Hiſtorians into Miſtakes, and has been very prejudicial to the Reputation of the King of Arragon. The chief of thoſe Articles were in ſubſtance as follow.

EDWARD I.

Articles of the Duel. P. 226, &c.

1. THAT the Duel ſhall be at Bourdeaux, in ſuch place as the King of England ſhall judge beſt, which ſhall be rail'd in.

2. THAT the two Kings ſhall make their perſonal Appearance before the King of England, in order to fight this Duel on the firſt of June 1283.

3. THAT if the King of England cannot be at Bourdeaux in Perſon, the two Kings ſhall then appear before ſome Perſon whom that King ſhall depute to record their Appearance in his room,

4. THAT if the King of England be not there either in Perſon, or Proxy, the two Kings ſhall then be oblig'd to appear before the Perſon who commands at Bourdeaux for him.

5. IT was alſo agreed †, that the ſaid Duel ſhall not be fought before any Perſons whatſoever in the King of England's Service, unleſs the ſaid King is actually preſent in Perſon. Saving to the two Kings the liberty of agreeing between themſelves, by mutual Conſent, to fight the ſaid Duel in that manner; that is to ſay, in the abſence of Edward.

6. THAT if the King of England is not perſonally preſent at the Place and Time appointed, the two Kings ſhall be oblig'd to ſtay for him thirty Days.

7. AND in order to procure the King of England's Preſence by all means, the two Kings promiſe and ſwear to do their utmoſt, bona fide, and without Fraud, to obtain of the ſaid King, that he would appear at the time and place aforeſaid, and to take due care that their Letters be actually put into his hand.

AFTER ſome other Articles relating to the Truce, and the Securities which the two Kings give reciprocally; it is further agreed,

8. THAT which ſoever of the two Kings fails to appear at the time and place aforeſaid, he ſhall be deem'd a vanquiſh'd, perjur'd, falſe, faithleſs Traitor; that he ſhall never aſſume to himſelf either the Name or Honours of a King; that he remain for ever depriv'd and ſtripp'd of the Royal Title and Honours, and be incapable of any manner of Office and Dignity, as a Perſon vanquiſh'd, perjur'd, falſe, faithleſs, traitorous, and eternally infamous.

‖ ALL the French, Spaniſh and Italian Hiſtorians have unanimouſly affirm'd that Edward actually ſettled and took care of the Place of Combat; perhaps they were led into this Error by the Appearance of Charles Another great Miſtake of Hiſtorians rectify'd.

* Both theſe Letters are in Italian, but in a Stile not much above the Advertiſements of our Heroes at Figg's Amphitheatre, the one challenging, the other defying.

† This is a remarkable Article.

‖ What follows is that ample Diſcuſſion of this Affair, and that Juſtification of the King of Arragon's Conduct, to which the Reader is referr'd in p. 25. and Vol. IV. of the 8vo Edition of Mr. Rapin's Hiſtory.

FOEDERA Tom. II. EDWARD I.

Charles of Anjou at Bourdeaux with his hundred Horſe, for they cou'd not imagine that this Prince wou'd come with his Troop in a poſture to fight, and that he wou'd ſtay at Bourdeaux from Sun-riſe to Sun-ſet, if he had not thought of fighting: but we have a Letter here from King Edward to that ſame Prince, whereby he acquaints him, That were he to gain both the Kingdoms of Arragon and Sicily, he wou'd not appoint the Field of Battle, nor ſuffer the two Kings to fight a Duel in any place of his Dominions, or in any other whatſoever, if it were in his power to hinder it. In the Letter which he wrote to the Prince of Salerno, he tells him, that inſtead of having granted his Father's Demand touching this Duel, he had deny'd him tout-outre (or point-blank) that's the Term he makes uſe of; for both Letters are in French. There is no reaſon therefore to ſuppoſe that Edward gave any Sanction to this intended Duel, either by his Preſence, or by ſending any one to repreſent him, or by giving the two Kings any Letters of Safe-Conduct, or finally by cauſing the Place to be prepar'd: and yet the Hiſtorians ſuppoſe it as a thing certain, when they ſay that Charles came to Bourdeaux, and that he made his Appearance on the Field of Battle, and ſtay'd there from Sun-riſe to Sun-ſet, without ſeeing his Enemy. The truth of the Fact is, that Charles of Anjou actually came to Bourdeaux on the Day fix'd, that he ſtay'd there 'till towards the Evening; and that hearing the King of Arragon was yet a great way off, he retir'd that ſame Day. But he was ſcarce gone, when Peter, who was all the while in the Town diſguis'd under the Name of one of the Noblemen of his Court, went before the Seneſchal of Guyenne, took a Record of his Appearance, and left his Arms as a Teſtimony; after which he made the beſt of his way out of Town, and poſted towards his own Dominions. This Conduct of his gave a handle to the French Hiſtorians to accuſe him of Cowardice, and want of Courage to meaſure Swords with his Enemy. But if we conſider the Tenor of the Articles agreed on between the two Kings, 'tis manifeſt that the Appearance of theſe two Princes before the Seneſchal of Guyenne, was only to comply with the 4th Article, and with no manner of deſign to fight; becauſe it appears by the 5th, that there was to be no Duel there, if the King of England was not preſent; and by King Edward's Letters abovemention'd, that nothing was farther from that Prince's Intention, than to be preſent at ſuch Duel. Therefore let them accuſe the King of Arragon of Faint-heartedneſs as much as they will, I admit that he was afraid; but then his was not a Fear to engage in a Duel with his Enemy, becauſe by their Conventions he was not oblig'd to it: and yet this is the Ground of their Charge againſt him, this the Reaſon of all the Jokes that have been put upon his Conduct. What was he then afraid of? The French Hiſtorians, who were very glad of an Opportunity to vilify this Prince, who was an Enemy to the Royal Family of France, have been far from explaining to us the Ground of his Fear; but the Sicilians and Neapolitans have done him that Juſtice, by telling us, that he had Intelligence, not only that Charles had brought his hundred Horſe with him into Bourdeaux, but that he had, as ſome ſay 3000, and according to others 5000 Horſe but a Day's Journey from the Town; and ſome add moreover, that the King of France's Nephew was at the head of them: which is a Circumſtance that Mezeray left room to conjecture, when he ſaid, That Peter retir'd, pretending that he was afraid of ſome Surprize on the part of France. Now if the King of France had not had Troops near Bourdeaux, how cou'd Peter, when he was in the Dominions of the King of England, pretend the Fear of any Surprize from the King of France? There are two things therefore to be conſider'd for the Juſtification of the King of Arragon, firſt whether he perform'd the Terms of Agreement; and of this there can be no doubt with any one that has read the above-mention'd Articles; and ſecondly, whether he had any Reaſon to be jealous of Charles, and of the King of France. As to the former of theſe Princes, the Hiſtorians of Naples and Sicily ſay, he publickly boaſted that he wou'd be the Death of the King of Arragon; which was ſufficient to give the latter juſt Reaſon to be afraid of him, when he found himſelf in a Country remote from his own Dominions, not far from thoſe of the King of France, and without any Safe-Conduct from the King of England, or any other Security than the bare Word of an Enemy, upon whoſe Sincerity he cou'd by no means depend, after he had openly threaten'd he would have his Life. As for the King of France, the Italians ſay that he had a Body of 5000, or at leaſt of 3000 Horſe, no more than a Day's Journey from the Spot. Mezeray, and the other French Hiſtorians, who cou'd not be ignorant of what the Italians ſaid, do not deny it, and are content to ſay nothing of it; ſo that there is at leaſt as much Probability of the thing's being true, as there is of its being falſe. But after all, ſuppoſing that Peter had been ſtruck with a groundleſs Panic, for fear of ſome Surprize on the part of the King of France, I don't ſee what great harm it could have done to his Reputation. Garibay, a Spaniſh Hiſtorian, who no doubt was not ignorant of the Conventions between the two Kings, has taken the freedom to ſay that the King of Arragon came to Bourdeaux, but went away again, becauſe Charles was not there. *Des puez que el Rey D. de Burdeos, que por ser en este tiempo de Ingleses era el lugar de la batalha a la qual por no acudir el Rey Carlos tornò el Rey D. Pedro en Arragon y Cataluna: i. e. After Peter, King of Arragon, had taken possession of the Kingdom of Sicily, and manag'd the Affairs of his new Government about five Years, he returned to Spain, where he accepted a Challenge from King Charles to fight him at single Combat, and went disguised through the Province of Guipuscoa to the City of Bourdeaux; which being then in the hands of the English, was to be the Place of Battle; but King Charles not coming thither, King Peter return'd to Arragon and Catalonia.

I have been the longer upon this Subject, because it seems to me that the Acts in this Collection, relating to it, give us such an Idea of this Affair as is perfectly new.

THE other important Acts here, relating to the Quarrels between those two Families, of which King Edward was Mediator, are Happy Deliverance of the Prince of Salerno.

HERE we likewise see what pains our King took to procure the Liberty of Charles the Prince of Salerno, who being taken Prisoner in a Sea-fight by Roger Lauria, Admiral of Arragon, would certainly have suffered the same Death as Conradin, by way of Reprisal, had it not been for Queen Constantia, Peter of Arragon's Wife, who commanding at that time in Sicily, took him by force out of the hands of Revenge, and sent him into Arragon to the King her Husband. The Liberty of this Prince was the present Subject of King Edward's Negotiations, and of a great number of Acts

III. The Affairs of Scotland.

Settlement of the Succession of the Crown of Scotland.

FOR the better understanding of the Acts of this Tome which relate to Scotland, it must be noted, That it was stipulated by the Marriage-Contract between Margaret, the Daughter of Alexander II. King of Scotland, and Erick King of Norway, that if Alexander should happen to die without Male-Issue, his Daughter Margaret, and her Descendants, should succeed to the Crown of Scotland. This Contract is to be seen amongst the Acta Omissa, and is P. 1079. dated on St. James's Day 1281. It happened that the two Sons of Alexander died in their Father's Life-time, and that their Sister Margaret, Queen of Norway, died also, leaving a Princess of the same Name behind her, who was just born. Now as Alexander II. died in the same Year, viz. 1282, young Margaret of Norway ought to have been recogniz'd as Heiress of the Kingdom of Scotland, immediately after the Death of her Grandfather; but the Nobility of Scotland did not oblige themselves to own her for their Queen till 1284, which P. 266. was about two Years after, as appears by the Act itself. In the mean time Margaret continued in Norway, undoubtedly because of her Minority; and Scotland was governed by Regents till the Year 1289, that her Father Erick sent Ambassadors to Edward, to treat with him about certain P. 416. Affairs relating to his Daughter, who was the said Edward's Grand-Niece. Edward being returned home from France that same Year, the Regents of Scotland sent Ambassadors to England to treat in the King's P. 431; presence with the Ambassadors of Norway. These Ambassadors met at Salisbury, and drew up certain Articles, wherein it was stipulated that Margaret should be sent to Edward, free from any Engagement of Marriage, and that this Prince should deliver her in the same Condition to the Scots, provided the latter would engage on their part not to match her without the Consent of the King of Norway her Father, and of the King of England her Great-Uncle. These P. 446. Conventions are recorded here both in Latin and French. Mean time, King Edward ha- P. 448. ving a mind to marry his Son of his own Name to Margaret, sollicited and obtained P. 450. a Dispensation from Rome for the Marriage, which he afterwards proposed to the Regents of Scotland, by whom it was approved. Then Articles were drawn up P. 471, &c. to be inserted in the Contract; by which it appears, that the Scots took all the pre- P. 482. caution possible that the Liberty of Scotland might receive no manner of prejudice by means of this Marriage, which was to unite the two Kingdoms under the Dominion of young Edward. They stipulated, that the Kingdom of Scotland should always remain entirely separate from, and independent upon England, to which Edward made no opposition. But all these Projects vanished into Smoke by the Death of young Margaret, who died before she left Norway; or rather, as some say, on a little Island where she was obliged to put in for Refreshment. Amongst the Acts omitted, there's a Letter to Edward from the Biſhop of St. Andrew's, wherein he lets him know the Report of the young Queen's Death, and expreſſes his Apprehenſion of the Troubles which the Loſs of her was like to occaſion in Scotland.

EDWARD I.

Diſputes about the Succeſſion betwixt Baliol and Bruce.

UPON the Death of Margaret, the main thing in diſpute was to ſettle the Succeſſion; to which ſome great Men, who were deſcended from the Royal Family by the Mother's ſide, laid claim. The two moſt conſiderable Competitors were John Baliol and Robert Bruce, both very powerful and highly eſteemed in Scotland; ſo that in a ſhort time the whole Nation was divided into two Parties, which rendered the Determination of this Conteſt exceeding difficult: and had they been able to have aſcertain'd which of the two Claimants had the beſt Right, it would have been very difficult to execute the Sentence without involving the Kingdom in a Civil War. The Scots Hiſtorians ſay, that their Countrymen pray'd Edward to be the Arbitrator of the Difference, while the Engliſh affirm, on the other hand, that Edward was the natural Judge or proper Umpire of it, by virtue of the direct Right of Lordſhip which he had over Scotland. 'Tis difficult to know whether Edward made uſe of this Pretenſion at firſt, or whether he declared it before he accepted of the Scots Propoſition; and there is nothing in this Collection which ſeems to juſtify what Buchanan ſays upon this Subject: on the contrary, we find that Edward neglected nothing for eſtabliſhing his Sovereignty over Scotland; but all the while this is no Proof that he diſcover'd his Pretenſions before he was acknowledged as Arbitrator of the Difference. Be this as it was, he ſummoned the States of Scotland to Norham, a Town upon the Tweed; which, whether he did as an Act of mere Authority, or at the Deſire of the Scots, is a Point which I think cannot eaſily be ſettled; but however 'tis certain, that King Edward look'd upon this as a very favourable opportunity to eſtabliſh his Authority over Scotland, ſo as not to be diſputed for the future.

King Edward convenes the States of Scotland at a Town on the Engliſh Borders.

THE States of Scotland being conven'd at Norham, Edward went thither attended by a great many of the Engliſh Nobility, and a ſmall number of Troops, as appears by the Summons he ſent to ſeveral Lords to repair to Norham by ſuch a day, with the Arms and Horſes with which they were obliged to furniſh the King. The firſt Aſſembly was held on the 10th of May Anno 1291, from which Day, to the very end of the Seſſion, Mr. Rymer has given a Journal of what paſſed, of which I ſhall here give an Abridgment. Mean time, I think myſelf obliged to advertiſe, that the ſaid Journal ought to be read with precaution, becauſe it was wrote by Mr. John de Cadam, Clerk to King Edward, and probably by order of this Prince; who being accuſed by the Scots of having nothing in view from firſt to laſt but his own Intereſts, and ſacrificing thoſe of Scotland to his Ambition, it may be preſumed he took ſpecial care that nothing ſhould be inſerted in the ſaid Journal to his own prejudice, or that might diſcover a Deſign of which he had been ſuſpected, of making uſe of this Conjuncture to aggrandiſe himſelf, under the ſpecious Pretext of rendring exact and impartial Juſtice. The Remarks I ſhall add at the end of the Journal, which is a ſort of verbal Proceſs, will ſhew that this Caution is not unneceſſary.

P. 525.

P. 542, to 589.

I have already ſaid, that Edward's Project was to make uſe of this Opportunity to extort a Recognition from the Scots that Scotland was a Fief of the Crown of England; an Acknowledgment which the laſt King of Scotland had abſolutely refuſed: and this was the Buſineſs he intended to bring firſt upon the Stage, poſtponing the grand Point of all, which was the Affair of the Succeſſion, till this was determined. For this end, in the firſt Aſſembly at Norham, on May 10. 1291, he tells the Scots, by his Spokeſman Roger Brabanzon, Chief Juſtice of England, that the Conſideration of the State of the Realm of Scotland, which was then without a King, had engag'd him to require them, by his Letters Patent, to repair to that Place; and that he was come thither to meet them in order, as direct Sovereign Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, to do juſtice to the Claimants of the Crown, and to eſtabliſh a ſolid Tranquillity in the Realm: That it was not his Intention to retard Juſtice, nor to uſurp the Right of any body, or to infringe the Liberties of the Kingdom of Scotland, but to render to every one their due. And to the end this might be done with the more eaſe, he required the Aſſent of the States of Scotland ex abundanti, and that they ſhould own him as direct Sovereign of the Kingdom, offering upon that condition to make uſe of their Counſels to do what Juſtice demanded. Upon this Propoſal, the States deſired time to conſult their abſent Members, and to conſider of a proper Anſwer. Edward cauſed it to be ſignify'd to them, that tho' he had reaſon to be perſuaded that they were come ready prepared to anſwer that Article, becauſe they could not be ignorant of his Intention, he would give them time till next day. The ſame Propoſal being accordingly made to the Scots on the day following, they inſiſted again upon more time; whereupon Edward, by the Advice of his Council, granted three Weeks, reckoning from the 10th of May, to prepare what they had to alledge againſt his Pretenſion.

King Edward's Pretenſion to the Sovereignty of Scotland.

ON the ſecond of June another Aſſembly was held, which, according to the Time given by King Edward, ought to have met the Day before: The Reaſon of this Remark will appear by and by. In this Aſſembly the Biſhop of Bath and Wells, then Chancellor of England, was Spokeſman for the the King, and told the States that in the preceding Aſſembly the King had granted them three Weeks to prepare what they had to object againſt his Pretenſion; but that ſince they had not given any abſolute Anſwer, nor ſet forth any thing to invalidate his Right, it was his Majeſty's Intention to act in the Affair in queſtion, by virtue of his acknowledged Right of Sovereignty, and to examine and determine the Difference, in quality of direct Sovereign of Scotland. Then the Chancellor, addreſſing himſelf to Robert Bruce, one of the Claimants of the Crown of Scotland, demanded of him whether he was willing to receive Judgment, as to his Pretenſions to that Crown, from the King of England, as Sovereign and direct Lord of the Kingdom? to which the latter anſwered in clear and expreſs Terms, that he recognized him for ſuch, and that in that Quality he was ready to ſubmit to his Deciſion.

Competitors for the Crown of Scotland. P. 546.

THE ſame Queſtion was afterwards put to the other Claimants, viz. Florence Count of Holland, John Haſtings *, Patrick Dunbar Earl of March, William Roſs, Walter de Huntercumbe, William Veſey, Robert de Pynkeny, and Nicholas de Soules, who all returned the ſame Anſwer as Robert Bruce. After this, a Knight ſtood up, who made an excuſe for the Abſence of John Baliol, and deſired he might have time granted him for his Appearance till the next day; and Baliol appearing accordingly in the next Aſſembly, the ſame Queſtion was put to him, and he returned the ſame Anſwers as the others.

P. 549.

IN the fifth Aſſembly, the Biſhop of Bath and Wells, after having recapitulated all that had paſſed to that time, proteſted on the behalf of King Edward, That altho' in the Diſpute which was ariſen between the ſeveral Claimants, touching the Succeſſion of the Kingdom of Scotland, that Prince acted in quality of Sovereign, in order to render Juſtice to whomſoever it was due; yet he did not mean thereby to exclude himſelf from the hereditary Right which he himſelf might have to that Kingdom, which Right he intended to aſſert and improve when he ſhould think fit: and the King himſelf repeated this Proteſtation with his own Mouth in French. This made John Comyn, Lord of Badenoch, deſire leave to exhibit his Pretenſions to the Crown; which was accordingly granted him, after he had owned Edward for direct Lord and Sovereign of Scotland, as the others had done.

Their Recognition of Edward's Sovereignty over Scotland. P. 555.

P. 529.

BEFORE they proceeded further, the Recognition which the Claimants had made of Edward for Sovereign of Scotland, was committed to writing, and formed into an authentic Act, which was ſigned by all the Claimants; which Act we find at length in the Journal, in the French Tongue. Next day the Claimants made and ſign'd another Act, whereby they conſented that King Edward ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Scotland, in order that he might deliver it up afterwards to the Candidate to whom it ſhould be awarded.

EDWARD I.

THE Sovereignty of Scotland being thus eſtabliſhed, they came at laſt to the grand Affair; I mean, to the Examination of the Claims of the ſeveral Competitors to the Crown; and that the ſame might be conducted impartially, it was agreed, that John Baliol and John Comyn on the one part, for themſelves and all the Claimants who ſhould approve of their Nomination, ſhould chuſe forty Commiſſioners of Inquiry; and that Robert Bruce on the other part, for himſelf, and the reſt of the Claimants, ſhould in like manner chuſe forty others; and that King Edward ſhould add twenty-four on his part, to be as Mediators between the eighty Commiſſioners, who were all to meet in a Body, and make a Report of their Opinions to the King, that he might judge of the Merits of each reſpectively.

P. 555.

IN the Aſſembly of the 5th of June they did nothing but read and regiſter the Names of the Perſons choſe Commiſſioners, whom King Edward appointed next day to agree among themſelves about the Time and Place of meeting, to hear the ſeveral Pretenſions; and they pitched upon the Town of Berwick, about four Miles from Norham, on the other ſide of the Tweed, and in the Kingdom of Scotland; for it muſt be obſerved, that the Scots had obtained of King Edward that the Affair might be tried in their own Kingdom, tho' the Letters Patent which he granted them for this end are not dated till the 12th of June, which was ſix Days after the Nomination of Berwick; but 'tis not unlikely that he gave them a verbal Promiſe. The Commiſſioners not being able to agree about the time, King Edward himſelf fix'd it on the ſecond of Auguſt enſuing.

KING Edward removing afterwards to Berwick, together with all the Commiſſioners, made a Proteſtation there; in which he declared, that tho' he had granted that the Affair of the Succeſſion ſhould be tried in Scotland, yet he did not thereby intend to prejudice the Right which he had in the like, or any other caſe, to exerciſe Juſtice in England hereafter, touching Affairs which might relate to Scotland.

FOEDERA Tom. II.

ON the third of Auguſt, the Commiſſioners being met at Berwick, every one of the Claimants preſented his Petition, ſetting forth his Pretenſions to the Crown of Scotland; which, as they were all founded on their Deſcent from ſome Perſon of the Royal Family of Scotland, would appear plainer to the Reader in a Genealogical Table than in a long Diſſertation. But the Nature of this Work will not admit of Trees of Genealogy; ſo that we can but juſt touch upon the Deſcents by which they claim'd.

Claimants Pleas of Deſcent. P. 575, to 580.

Florence, Count of Holland, deſcended from Ada Siſter to King William.

Patrick Dunbar, Earl of March, deſcended from Ilda Daughter of King William.

William de Veſci, deſcended from Margaret Daughter to King William.

William de Roſs deſcended from Iſabel Daughter to King William.

Robert de Pynkeny, deſcended from Margery Siſter to King William, by a Daughter of King William, named Alice.

Nicholas de Soules, deſcended from Margaret Daughter of Alexander II.

Patrick Galythly, deſcended from Henry the Son of William.

Roger de Mandeville, deſcended from Aufrica, ſecond Daughter of King William.

John Comyn, Lord of Badenoch, deſcended from Donald formerly King of Scotland.

John Haſtings, deſcended from the third Daughter of David Earl of Huntingdon, Brother to King William.

John Baliol, deſcended from Margaret, eldeſt Daughter to David Earl of Huntingdon.

Robert Bruce, deſcended from Iſabel, the 2d Daughter of David Earl of Huntingdon.

IN order to form a right Notion of all theſe Pretenſions, 'tis neceſſary to obſerve that Florence Count of Holland, Robert de Pynkeny, and John Comyn, being deſcended, the two firſt from the two Siſters of David Earl of Huntingdon, and the laſt from Donald, younger Brother to Malcolm III. 'tis manifeſt they could not in Law claim Preference before the Deſcendants from David. As to Nicholas de Soules, William Roſs, Patrick Dunbar, William Veſci, Patrick Galythly, and Roger de Mandeville, if their Genealogy was well ſet forth, 'tis certain, that in the Succeſſion of a Fief which was not Male, they ought to have been preferr'd before the Deſcendants of the Earl of Huntingdon, becauſe they were deſcended from William King of Scotland his elder Brother; but 'tis probable either that they had not well ſet forth their Genealogy, or that they from whom they derived their Deſcent, were Baſtards, and by conſequence incapable of tranſmitting any Right to their Deſcendants. What confirms this Conjecture, is, that in the Petition preſented by Baliol, wherein he gave a particular Account how the Crown ſhould have devolved from one to another, till it came to him, after having mentioned the Death of Margaret of Norway, he ſaid, That after the Death of that Princeſs the Crown ſhould have devolved to Margaret her great Aunt, Daughter of Alexander II. and from the ſaid Margaret to one Magoth her Daughter; but that this Magoth dying without Iſſue, the Succeſſion came to Margery her Siſter, who died alſo, as he ſays, without Iſſue: and yet Nicholas de Soules called himſelf the Son of this Margery, and conſequently by Baliol's own Acknowledgment, this ſame Nicholas ought to have been preferred before him, if he had been really Margery's Son, as he had aſſerted he was. It is not to be ſuppoſed, that Baliol would have been contented with combating the Right of Nicholas de Soules with a bare Negative, if it had not been manifeſt and notorious to the whole World, that this Margery, the pretended Mother of Nicholas de Soules, died without Iſſue. EDWARD I.

IN like manner Baliol, in his Petition, after having ſaid that Iſabella, the third Daughter of Alexander II. died without Children, aſſerts, that the Crown ought to have returned to the Deſcendants of David Earl of Huntingdon; and at once leaps over all the Heads of Henry de Galythly, Iſabella, Ilda, Margaret, and Aufrica, Daughters of King William, from whom Patrick de Galythly, William Roſs, Patrick Dunbar, William Veſci, and Roger de Mandeville claimed their Deſcent. What gives room to conjecture that the above Henry and his three Siſters, admitting they were William's Children, were no more than Baſtards, is, that afterwards the Competitors who derived their Origin from them, very readily gave up their Pretenſions, even before they came to be examined; a certain proof that Baliol was in the right to paſs them over in ſilence, as what could be no great advantage to him.

WHAT remained therefore to be done, was only to regulate the Succeſſion between the Deſcendants of David Earl of Huntingdon, Brother to King William, whoſe lawful Branch was juſt extinct by the death of young Margaret of Norway. This David had ſeveral Children, four of whom died before him; and he left three Daughters, Margaret, who married Alan of Galway; Iſabella, Wife of Robert Bruce; and Ada, who was married to Henry Haſtings, an Engliſhman. From Margaret, the eldeſt of the three, came Devergulde and Marione; the latter of whom was married to John Comyn, and in all probability died without Children: but be this as it was, neither ſhe nor her Children, if ſhe had any, appeared in this Proceſs. Devergulde her eldeſt Siſter, who was married to John Baliol, had by him this John Baliol, who demanded the Crown by virtue of his Mother's Right, who was ſtill living. Iſabella the ſecond Daughter of David, Wife of Robert Bruce, had a Son named Robert after his Father, which Son was one of the Claimants. Laſtly, Ada had by FOEDERA Tom. II. by Henry Haſtings her Husband, John Haſtings, who had alſo formed Pretenſions; but foreſeeing that the Deſcendants of his two Aunts, who were his Mother's eldeſt Siſters, would carry it from him, he contented himſelf with the Plea that Scotland was a diviſible Fief, and that by conſequence it ought to be ſhared between the three Daughters of David Earl of Huntingdon his Grandfather. The main Point in diſpute lay therefore between John Baliol and Robert Bruce: The firſt alledged for himſelf, that he was Grandſon to Margaret the eldeſt Daughter of David; and the latter pleaded, that he was Grandſon to David himſelf, and that by conſequence he was nearer by one Degree: and it being objected to him, that Devergulde, who was ſtill alive, was in as near a degree of Conſanguinity as he, and that ſhe had the advantage of being the Daughter of David's eldeſt Daughter; he anſwered, that where the Degrees of Proximity were equal, the Men ought to be preferred to the Women. That was the Sum and Subſtance of the Reaſons on both ſides, and the Subject-Matter of the enſuing Inquiry. Let's go back now to what paſſed in the following Aſſemblies.

ALL the Petitions of the Claimants being read, Edward fixed the ſecond Day of June in the following Year 1292, for hearing the Report of the Commiſſioners of Inquiry, who had by this means nine or ten Months to inform themſelves.

P. 580. WHEN the Day appointed was come, the Ambaſſadors of Erick King of Norway appeared, and demanded, in the name of their Maſter, that he might be admitted into the number of Claimants, as the Father and lawful Heir of Margaret his Daughter; which was granted him after his Ambaſſadors had firſt of all recogniz'd the Sovereignty of the Kings of England over Scotland.

THIS done, the Commiſſioners proceeded to the Examination of the Petitions of each of the Parties; but Edward thinking that this way of proceeding would ſpin out the Affair to a great length, he was for examining the Rights of Baliol and Bruce before all others, without prejudice to thoſe of the other Claimants. This being ſettled accordingly, he ordered the Commiſſioners to examine by what Laws they ought to proceed to Judgment; upon which the Opinions were ſo various, that in order to give them time to agree, or to inform themſelves better, he prorogued the Aſſembly to the 12th of October, with a deſign, as he ſaid, for his own part, to conſult the Lawyers of foreign Countries.

P. 581, &c. IN the next Aſſembly, which was held on the 14th of October, Edward put two Queſtions to the Commiſſioners of Inquiry, and wiſhed to have their Opinion. 1. By what Laws and Cuſtoms they ought to proceed to Judgment; and ſuppoſing there could be no Law or Precedent found in the two Kingdoms, how then? 2. Whether the Kingdom of Scotland ought to be taken in the ſame View as all other Fiefs, and to be awarded in the ſame manner as Earldoms and Baronies? To the firſt of theſe two Queſtions it was unanimouſly anſwered by the Commiſſioners, That the King ought to give Judgment in this Affair conformable to the Cuſtoms eſtabliſhed in the two Kingdoms, if any certain Laws or Precedents could be found for that purpoſe; but that if there were none to be had, then the King might, by the Advice of the great Men of his Kingdom, eſtabliſh a new Law. As to the ſecond, Anſwer was made, that the Succeſſion of the Kingdom might be awarded in the ſame manner as that of Baronies and Earldoms. Theſe two Articles being done with, King Edward addreſſed himſelf to Baliol and Bruce, demanding to know if they had any thing more to alledge in maintenance of their Right: and each of the two having ſpoke for himſelf, and inſiſted on the Pleas already mentioned, which they always laid down as the Baſis of their Right, King Edward declared, that on the 6th of November he would pronounce Sentence; and when that Day came, Robert Bruce's Pretenſions to the Crown of Scotland were entirely ſet aſide; whereupon he proteſted, that he had a Deſign to proſecute his Right under another Form. EDWARD I.

THEN John Haſtings ſtood up, and after aſſerting that the Kingdom of Scotland was a diviſible Fief, he demanded that it might be divided between the Deſcendants of the three Daughters of David Earl of Huntingdon, whoſe third Daughter was his Mother. Robert Bruce ſtood up at the ſame time, and made the ſame Demand; whereupon King Edward ordered the Commiſſioners to examine whether Scotland was a diviſible Fief; and gave them time to conſider of it till the 17th of that Month.

WHEN that Day came, King Edward demanding to know the Opinion of the Commiſſioners of Inquiry, they anſwered, that the Kingdom of Scotland was not diviſible; whereupon the King pronounced, that neither John Haſtings nor Robert Bruce had any Claim to the Succeſſion of the Crown. This Sentence was as yet of no advantage to Baliol's Cauſe, becauſe there were ſo many other Claimants beſides; but theſe at length ſpared King Edward and the Commiſſioners the trouble of further Inquiry, by intirely dropping their Pretenſions. There being nothing now remaining which could ſtand in the way of Baliol's Right, King Edward pronounced Sentence in his favour, and declared him King of Scotland; after which he exhorted him to govern his People with Equity, and in ſuch a manner, as to give them no reaſon to complain of him, and to bring their Complaints to the direct Lord and Sovereign of Scotland. He then appointed a Day for him to take the Oath of Allegiance, and another for him to perform Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland: which things were done accordingly; the firſt at Norham upon the 20th of November, and the ſecond at Newcaſtle upon St. Stephen's Day, the 26th of December. Here it may not be improper to remark, that that King Edward's Chamberlain, demanding perhaps too much of Baliol for his Fee, when that Prince performed his Homage, or not knowing what to demand, Edward fixed his Fee himſelf at twenty Pound; which was double to what was paid by an Earl, as appears by the King's Order eſtabliſhing the ſaid Fee.

Mr. Rapin's Remarks on the whole Proceſs, as well as on the Merits of the Cauſe.

Now, to look no further than this Journal, one would think nothing could be more exact nor more impartial than Edward's Proceeding in the Determination of this famous Proceſs. In the firſt place he demands of the Scots, that they own ex abundanti that Scotland is a Fief depending on England; and the Scots Convention making no oppoſition to his Pretenſions, he ſets himſelf up for Judge of this Difference, by virtue of his recogniz'd Sovereignty; and that he may be able to judge of the matter impartially, he cauſes eighty Commiſſioners of Inquiry to be choſe by the two principal Claimants, and does not pronounce Sentence till he has had the Opinion of the ſaid Commiſſioners. This ſeems ſo fair, ſo exact, that what in the World could have a better Face? Yet for all this, the Scots do not fail to complain of him, and affirm that he had regard only to his own Intereſts. Therefore to have a clear and diſtinct Idea of this Affair, 'tis worth while to look into the Complaints of the Scots, and to ſee on what they are founded, tho' this is what Mr. Rymer's Collection takes no notice of.

The Scots ſay therefore, that King Edward's only view was not to make Scotland eaſy, but to improve this Conjuncture, that he might be recogniz'd Sovereign Lord of the Kingdom, and that the Crown might be plac'd on the Head of that Perſon who was leaſt able to diſpute this Right with him; that is to ſay Baliol, who had a Genius far inferior to his Rival, and fewer Friends and leſs Credit in Scotland. They charge King Edward with obſtructing the Freedom of voting; and that while he profeſs'd the ſtricteſt Impartiality in publick, he acted underhand by Threats and Promiſes to incline the Commiſſioners to vote as he would have them. They ſay, that at firſt he offer'd the Crown to Robert Bruce, if he had been diſpos'd to engage to do him Homage for it; and that the latter refuſing it upon thoſe Terms, the King propos'd it to Baliol on the ſame Terms, which he accepted, and was therefore promiſs'd the Crown. They obſerve in excuſe for Robert Bruce's recognizing King Edward as Sovereign of Scotland afterwards, That he did it becauſe he was very ſenſible of what prejudice his Refuſal was to him. They add as a Proof, That the Meeting of the States at Norham was not a free Aſſembly; that in the firſt place King Edward brought Troops thither; and ſecondly, that they made no Anſwer to the Propoſal which King Edward made to them, of owning him for Sovereign Lord; but if they had thought this Right was indiſputable, why did they deſire time to conſider of it? And if they thought the contrary, how came it to paſs that the Aſſembly of States could not find ſo much as one ſingle Reaſon to diſpute the Right pretended to? which 'tis certain the late Kings of Scotland always oppoſed. The Scots add moreover, that for all this it does not appear that the States recogniz'd this Sovereigny; and that 'tis plain, what Recognition was made, only came from the Regents corrupted by King Edward, or from the Claimants, whoſe Intereſt it was to court his favour, and who were, for moſt part, his Vaſſals or his Subjects; and who, when all's done, had no power to bind the whole Nation of Scotland by their particular Submiſſion. They ſay alſo, that it was King Edward, who by his intrigues ſummon'd all the Competitors to meet together, excluſive of Baliol, Bruce, and Haſtings, on purpoſe to embaraſs the Affair, to ſhew the two principal Candidates that they had need of his Favour, and that he might have the Majority of Voices among the Candidates to favour his own Ends; which, ſay they, manifeſtly appears from this Circumſtance, viz. That as ſoon as ever Robert loſt his Cauſe, all the other Competitors (except Baliol and Haſtings) dropped their Pretenſions; an evident Proof that what they had done, was but mere Grimace, in compliance with the King, by whom they were acted. For how can it be imagined, ſay they, that the Sentence paſſed againſt Bruce ſhould be prejudicial to the other Claimants, and oblige them to quit their Pretenſions? It appears ſtill more evident, that the Intervention of the King of Norway was ſollicited, becauſe 'tis very unlikely that his Ambaſſadors would have dared to betray the Intereſt of their Maſter, if they had not had ſecret Orders to act according to the Directions of King Edward, who had no longer need of him after Robert Bruce was ſet aſide. It ſeems likewiſe as if there had been ſomething myſterious in the Conduct of Baliol, who abſented himſelf from the firſt Aſſembly at Norham, on purpoſe to let others make the firſt ſtep in acknowledging the King of England for Sovereign, as if he was the fartheſt of any from ſuch an Intention; which, ſay they, could only proceed from the Aſſurance he had of obtaining the Crown: but, notwithſtanding this Precaution, he could not hinder publick Fame from accuſing him, as the firſt of the Candidates for the Crown who had engag'd himſelf to King Edward. This was alſo what they ſtill continu'd to upbraid him with; and tho he afterwards loſt the ſaid Crown for offering to retract, yet he could never regain the Eſteem of his Subjects, who afterwards tack'd about to his Rival's Son.

EDWARD I.

HERE I cannot avoid making a Remark, which, by the way, I only give as my own private Conjecture; namely, That in the ſecond Aſſembly, which was held at Norham on the 2d of June 1291, Edward granted a Delay of three Weeks, reckoning from the 10th of May, in order to give time to the Scots to prepare what they had to anſwer to his Pretenſions to the Sovereignty of Scotland. According to this Delay, the Aſſembly ought to have been held on the firſt of June, and yet we don't find that they met held till the ſecond Day; on which, tho' it does no where appear that the Scots had been asked what they had to offer by way of Anſwer, the Chancellor opened the Conference by ſaying, that ſince they had not given in any anſwer, the King of England was reſolved to make uſe of his Prerogative. This gives me cauſe to conjecture, that probably another Aſſembly was held the Day before, in which the States of Scotland produced their Reaſons, but did not think fit to inſert them in the great Roll of Scotland, from whence this Journal was taken; for how could the Chancellor be ſuppoſed to open the Aſſembly by ſaying, that the Scots had not returned any Anſwer, before he had ſummoned them for that purpoſe? And if they were ſummoned, and did return any Anſwer, it was perhaps either that the Homage demanded was not due, or that they owned Scotland to be a Fief of England. In the former caſe, there was an abſolute neceſſity of inſerting at leaſt a part of their Anſwer in a Journal ſo exact as this, where the very Words are reported, and often repeated verbatim; and in the latter caſe, nothing ſurely could have been of more advantage to the King's Intereſts than ſuch a Confeſſion. And if, in ſhort, no Anſwer was returned, tho' demanded, the Summons given them for that purpoſe ought at leaſt to have been inſerted, with the Addition that they remained mute; for it muſt be obſerved, that this is a ſort of verbal Proceſs, in which the very Words made uſe of are ſet down; and not a Narrative, the Expreſſions of which depend on the Caprice of him that gives it.

FOEDERA Tom. II.

Proofs fetch'd from Antiquity, of the King of England's Sovereignty over Scotland. P. 559, to 573.

THIS Conjecture, and what the Scots oppoſe, ſeems to have a Foundation the more ſolid, becauſe the Reaſons which King Edward made uſe of, to ſhew that Scotland had been always heretofore a Fief dependent on the Crown of England, ſeem not to be concluſive. 'Tis this Act which I am now to examine, having not done it hitherto, tho' it is inſerted in the middle of the Journal, becauſe I was not willing to interrupt the Proceſs.

IN the Speech which the Chancellor made at the ſecond Aſſembly at Norham, he ſays, that the King his Maſter would prove his Right to the Sovereignty of Scotland by indiſputable Documents; and it was with this Deſign therefore that King Edward cauſed the Proofs of it to be drawn up in writing. The Act being by much too long to tranſcribe here, I ſhall only take notice in a word, that all the Proofs are founded upon Paſſages extracted from certain Hiſtorians, ſuch as Marianus Scotus an Iriſhman, William of Malmsbury, Roger of Hoveden, Henry of Huntingdon, Raoul de Dicet, and other Engliſhmen; that the main Point for which thoſe Hiſtorians are quoted, is to ſhew that the Kings of England have often vanquiſh'd the Scots; that they have ſometimes placed Kings upon the Throne of Scotland by force of Arms, and that the Kings of Scotland have often rendered them Homage. The Engliſh Hiſtorians, who boaſt of the Sovereignty of their Kings over Scotland, lay mighty Streſs upon this Memorial or Manifeſto of King Edward; out of which, by the way, they give us but few Particulars. Tho' this is a Diſpute which not many are concerned in at preſent, yet I perſuade myſelf that there are curious Perſons who would be glad to ſee ſome Remarks upon the Proofs here produced by King Edward.

EDWARD I.

Mr. Rapin's Remarks on them.

1. THE Authors from whom the Paſſages are extracted are all Engliſh. To go about to prove by Engliſh Writers, that Scotland is a Fief of England, ſeems pretty extraordinary; and is no leſs than making the Parties Judges in an Affair which was then the Subject of the Proceſs between the two Nations. It would be a very good Jeſt if ſuch Paſſages ſhould be brought only to confirm more authentick Proofs.

2. THE Diſcovery that the Kings of Scotland have paid Homage to the Kings of England, is far from amounting to a Proof that Scotland was long ſince a Fief depending on the Crown of England, becauſe it ought to be proved beyond diſpute, that they paid the Homage for Scotland. For, by example, if the King of France ſhould go about to prove that the Kings of England ever paid Homage to his Predeceſſors, he could eaſily do this by a Cloud of Hiſtorians; but if he ſhould offer to conclude from thence, that England is a Fief of the Crown of France, ſuch Conſequence would be perfectly ridiculous, becauſe the Homage which the Kings of England have formerly paid to the Kings of France, was not for England itſelf, but for the Provinces which they poſſeſſed in the Kingdom of France. The ſame thing may be pleaded with reſpect to the Kings of Scotland, who poſſeſſed Huntingdonſhire, and ſome Lands upon the Frontiers of both Kingdoms, for which they did Homage to the King of England.

3. BUT if they had not enjoy'd a Foot of Land in England, it would not follow from their having done Homage to the Kings of England, that Scotland was a Fief of that Crown, becauſe 'tis certain that Homage was often performed for mere annual Penſions, without expreſſing the Cauſe of the Homage; of which there are more Inſtances than one, in the firſt Volume of the Fœdera, P. 1. with reſpect to the Earls of Flanders, who did Homage to the Kings of England for a Penſion of 500 Marks. So that there's no Concluſion to be drawn in ſupport of this Claim of Sovereignty, from the Homages performed by the Kings of Scotland, unleſs it had been expreſſed that they were performed for the Kingdom.

4. EVERY body knows how punctually thoſe to whom Homage was due, had it paid to them upon every Change, either of Sovereign or Vaſſal, in preſence of many Witneſſes; that authentick Acts were drawn up for that end, and that he who had performed it, gave an Inſtrument of it under his Hand and Seal. How comes it to paſs then that King Edward did not produce any of theſe Homages in due Form, but was fain to prove his Right from Hiſtorical Paſſages? Was it not plainly confeſſing that he had no better Proofs?

5. IT may be objected perhaps, That in King Edward's Memorial, there is a long Account of the Homage which William King of Scotland paid for Scotland itſelf to King Henry II. and his Son, and that moreover this Homage is not conteſted. But it may be anſwered, that this Homage having been extorted from the ſaid King William, as one of the Conditions of his Liberty, after he had been taken Priſoner by Henry II. ſo Richard the Son and Succeſſor of the ſaid Henry, voluntarily departed from it, as is affirmed by the Engliſh Hiſtorians themſelves, and may be proved by an Act in the firſt Volume of the Fœdera, among thoſe of King Richard: ſo that this Article makes no Proof at all.

P. 64.

6. IT is true indeed that the Kings of England have often demanded Homage of the Kings of Scotland, for Scotland itſelf: but this is a Proof of their Pretenſions only, not of their Right; for if ſuch a bare Demand be ſufficient to prove their Right, 'tis as certain that the bare Refuſal of the Kings of Scotland may prove the contrary: and 'tis notorious beyond all diſpute, that the Kings of Scotland have ſometimes refuſed to do Homage for their Kingdom. Alexander II. having performed Homage to King Henry III. his Father-in-Law, for the County of Huntingdon, Henry demanded the ſame Homage of him for Scotland: but this Prince, tho' very young at that time, excuſed himſelf, by ſaying that he could not do it without the Conſent of the States of his Kingdom: and 'tis particularly remarkable, that Edward in his Memorial quotes that Inſtance of the Homage paid by Alexander to Henry, to prove his Right, artfully confounding the Homage which Alexander paid for the County of Huntingdon, with that which he refuſed for the Kingdom of Scotland. For when Alexander came to perform Homage to King Edward himſelf, he proteſted that it was not for the Kingdom of Scotland; and his Homage was received with the ſaid Proteſtation, and with the following Reſtriction, as plainly appears by an Act in this Tome: Et idem Rex Angliæ homagium ejuſdem Regis Scotiæ recepit, ſalvo jure & clamio ejuſdem Regis Angliæ, & hæredum ſuorum, de homagio prædicti Regis Scotiæ, & hæredum ſuorum, de Regno Scotiæ, cum inde loqui voluerint.

EDWARD I.

P. 126.

7. WHEN one reads the Paſſages quoted by King Edward from Hiſtorians, one cannot help perceiving how weak are the Conſequences which he would infer from ſome general Expreſſions.

8. IN the laſt place, as to the Paſſages produced to ſhew that the Kings of England have ſometimes placed the Kings of Scotland upon the Throne, this does not infer that Scotland was dependent on England. For example, if Lewis XIV. had been ſo lucky as to reſtore King James II. to the Throne, it would not follow from thence that England muſt have been obliged to recognize the King of France, and his Succeſſors, for its Sovereigns.

I might add ſeveral other Remarks upon the Proofs brought by King Edward: but this is ſufficient, I believe, to ſhew how aſtoniſhing it is that the States of Scotland ſhould return no Anſwer to King Edward's Pretenſions; which makes me think either that the Journal is not exact, according to my former Conjecture, or that if they did not anſwer, they were intimidated by King Edward, from whom they had every thing to fear, as matters then ſtood.

I have been a little the longer upon this Journal, becauſe the Subject of it was the Foundation of all the Wars which afflicted the two Nations for 300 Years; and as to the Remarks which I have added, my View was to hinder every body from being prejudic'd in favour of a Writing which has ſuch an authentic Appearance, as if it ought to be the ſole Foundation of Truth, tho' it was drawn up by Order of one of the Parties concerned *.

THE other Acts of greateſt Importance in this Tome, relating to Scotland, are the Demand which Baliol made that the Cauſes of Scotſmen ſhould be tried in Scotland, together with King Edward's Denial, and Baliol's Declaration, whereby he gives up the Conceſſion which King Edward granted on the ſame account to the Regents and Claimants of the Crown, which we find in p. 532.

NOT long after we come to an Act, whereby Macduff Earl of Fife was condemn'd to Impriſonment by the Parliament of Scotland. This is a remarkable Piece, becauſe that Complaint or Appeal which Macduff made to King Edward, was one of the principal Reaſons of the Macduff's Impriſonment.

P. 604.

* To juſtify what has been ſaid by Mr. Rapin, a great deal more might be added from ſeveral eminent Hiſtorians, both Engliſh and Scots: but there being not room here for Quotations, the Curious who have a mind to be more fully ſatisfy'd of the Independency and Sovereignty of the Kingdom of Scotland, will not take it amiſs to be referr'd to thoſe Pieces wherein this Subject is treated more at large; particularly Sir George Mackenzie's Obſervations upon the Laws and Cuſtoms of Nations as to Precedency, Cap. 3. Sir Thomas Craig's Diſpute concerning Homage, entitled, Scotland's Sovereignty aſſerted; Mr. Tyrrel's General Hiſtory of England; Sir James Dalrymple's Collections concerning the Scottiſh Hiſtory; Mr. Anderſon's Eſſay, ſhewing that the Kingdom of Scotland is Imperial and Independent; and to cloſe all, the late Treaty of Union concluded betwixt England and Scotland as two Independent Nations.

Foedera Tom. II. the Quarrel that happened betwixt him and the King of Scotland. The Fact was as follows:

Edward I.

While King Edward was in poſſeſſion of Scotland, by the Conceſſion of the Regents, and of the Competitors for the Crown, he order'd that Macduff Earl of Fife ſhou'd be put in poſſeſſion of certain Lands, to which he laid Claim. The Affair of the Succeſſion being ſettled, and Baliol acknowledg'd for King, Macduff was ſummon'd to Parliament, for having put himſelf in poſſeſſion of thoſe Lands which ought to be left to the King of Scotland, and he was therefore condemn'd to ſuffer Impriſonment. When he was ſet at liberty, he went and complain'd to King Edward of the Injuſtice that had been done him, and upon his Complaint Edward ſummon'd the King of Scotland to appear before him; which the latter obeying, he was treated like a private Man, ſays Buchanan, and oblig'd to go and ſtand at the Bar to plead his Cauſe; which exaſperated him to the laſt degree.

P. 606.

King Edward's Summons to Baliol.

But this was not the only occaſion which Edward took to aſſert his Sovereignty over Scotland. Here are no leſs than eight ſeveral Summons ſent to Baliol upon very trifling occaſions, to appear in Perſon before King Edward. It was this Treatment that made Baliol think of ways and means to ſhake off ſuch a cruel Yoke. The War which then broke out between France and England, ſeem'd to give him a favourable opportunity. He made an offenſive and defenſive Alliance with France, and marry'd his Son Edward to a Daughter of Charles de Valois, Brother to Philip the Fair; and at laſt by an Act for the purpoſe, renounc'd the Homage he had paid to King Edward. Baliol imagin'd that France wou'd cut out ſo much work for King Edward, that he wou'd not have time to think of him: but the contrary happen'd; for Edward did not ſo much mind his Affairs in France, becauſe he had ſet his Heart upon the Puniſhment of the King of Scotland, who was vanquiſh'd and oblig'd to go to King Edward and reſign his Kingdom to him: after which Act of Reſignation he was committed to the Tower.

Here is a Letter from King Edward, wherein he deſires the Biſhop of Agen, to whom according to Cuſtom he ought to have taken the Oath in Perſon, that he wou'd pleaſe to receive it by his Seneſchal of Guienne. 'Tis dated at Abbeville, June 4, 1279.

The next is a Letter from King Edward to Philip, wherein he intreats him to make no Alteration in the Cuſtoms of the Province of Gaſcoigne without his Conſent. 'Tis dated March 4, 1281. Gaſcoigne and Guyenne were at that time ſynonymous.

P. 167.

Here we have a Letter to King Edward from the Nobility of Gaſcoigne, deſiring him not to ſubject their Lands to Arnold de Seuil. This Letter begins, Domino præ cunctis mortalibus diligendo, Edwardo; i. e, To our Sovereign Lord Edward, belov'd above all Mortals: Yet they don't ſpare to tell him their Minds, Dominationem veſtram volumus pro conſtanti, quod nullatenus nobis placet, ut altam juſtitiam terrarum noſtrarum in Arnaldum Raimundi de Solio, vel aliquem alium, maxime ignobilem, conferatis; i. e. We wou'd have your Majeſty to take it always for granted, that we ſhall by no means be pleas'd with your Subjecting of our Lands to Arnold Raymond de Seuil, or any other Perſon of mean Rank. And a little lower they ſay, Nunquam enim præmiſſa proponimus ſuſtinere, niſi id faceremus, quod abſit, coacti a vobis; i. e. For we never propoſe to bear the Premiſes, unleſs, which God forbid, we ſhou'd be compell'd by you. 'Tis dated the firſt of May, 1281.

Letter from the Nobility of Gaſcoigne, to King Edward. P. 168.

Here we have the Reſtrictions contain'd in the Homage which King Edward paid to King Philip, A. D. 1286. the Biſhop of Bath and Wells being his Spokeſman; where it muſt be obſerv'd, that under the Reigns of John and Henry III. King Edward's Grandfather and Father, France had taken ſeveral Provinces from the Kings of England; and that after frequent Wars upon this very ſcore, there were ſome Treaties of Peace, which King Edward complain'd were not obſerv'd. Therefore after having proteſted againſt thoſe Infractions, he only made his Homage in general Terms, for fear of excluding himſelf from the Claim which he intended to make to thoſe Provinces, if he only perform'd Homage for the Lands then in his poſſeſſion, and mentioned them particularly by name. The Homage therefore was couch'd in theſe Terms: I become your Man for the Lands which I hold of you on this ſide of the Sea, according to the Form of the Treaty which was made betwixt our Anceſtors. And after this manner was the Homage received.

FOR the better underſtanding of the Acts that follow, and the Grounds of the Controverſy between Philip the Fair and Edward, the Reader muſt be acquainted that Edward being engag'd in the Scots War, ſent Edmund his Brother to Paris to appear for him, with Orders to do whatever he cou'd to prevent a War with France. The French Hiſtorians ſay, that Philip being angry with Edward for not appearing in his own Perſon, confiſcated Guyenne, and ſent into this Dutchy his Conſtable Raoul de Nelle, who made himſelf Maſter of it. To hear how eaſily this General took Guyenne, is at firſt ſurprizing, till one turns to the Page in the Margin, where we find the whole Affair unriddled, together with the Stratagem which Philip made uſe of. He gave Edmund to underſtand, that all he had a view to upon this occaſion, was his Honour and his Right of Sovereignty; and that provided Edward wou'd but make ſome Advances to ſatisfy him, he wou'd be content with Externals. For this end he demanded that Edward ſhou'd deliver up to him certain Towns in Guyenne, together with ſome Perſons in that Province, of whom he had reaſon to complain. Edward, who was for avoiding a War, did not only give the King of France this external Satisfaction, but delivered up all Guyenne to him, believing that Philip, content with ſuch Submiſſion, wou'd reſtore it back to him out of hand, according to his Promiſe. But he was trick'd by the King of France, who ſent the Conſtable into Guyenne to take poſſeſſion of the Province, which was done without Oppoſition, and Philip afterwards refus'd to part with it.

IN the next Page we have the Pope's Sentence of Arbitration, for putting an end to the Diſpute betwixt the two Kings. This is the Sentence which, Mezeray ſays, ſo nettled the Court of France, that when it was deliver'd to Philip by an Ambaſſador from Edward, Robert of Artois ſnatch'd it from him, and threw it into the Fire. Other means were therefore to be conſulted, for putting an end to this Quarrel. For this purpoſe, the Ambaſſadors of the two Kings met at Montreuil upon the Sea-coaſt, and concluded a Truce, by agreeing to a Marriage between King Edward the Father, and Margaret Siſter to King Philip, and to another between Edward the Son and Iſabella Philip's Daughter *. Several Hiſtorians have ſpoke of this Truce as of a final Treaty of Peace, in which they are miſtaken; for it appears by the very Terms of the Treaty, that that which was made in 1299, was no more than a Truce. The Peace was not made till the Year 1303, by the Articles whereof printed in this Volume, it may be obſerv'd, that the two Kings entirely abandon'd thoſe of their Allies who were moſt attach'd to their Intereſts; Philip having left the Scots in the Curch, and Edward the Earl of Flanders, of whom there's not one word ſaid in the Treaty.

THERE's a remarkable Letter upon this occaſion from ſome Scotſmen at the Court of France to their Friends in Scotland, wherein they tell them, that they ought not to be ſurpriz'd if they are not included in the Treaty, becauſe Philip had promis'd not to abandon them; and that he wou'd do them more Service in an Interview which he was to have with King Edward at Amiens, than if he had cauſed them to be compriz'd in the Treaty: but what the King of France told them, was only to amuſe them, for he had no Interview with Edward, and did nothing for them. On the other hand, the Flemiſh Hiſtorians tax King Edward with the blackeſt of Treachery, for having thus abandon'd their Earl, and ſolely contributed to his Ruin, in deſpite of the moſt ſolemn Oaths which he had taken, never to conſent to any Peace with France without including him in it.

AMONGST

* By conſulting the Fœdera, it appears that Mr. Rapin was miſtaken when he calls this Iſabella, Philip's Siſter. We have alſo rectify'd ſome of his Pages, which are miſprinted from the Original.

FOEDERA Tom. II. P. 1083.

AMONGST the Acts omitted in this Tome, we find that the King of France was offended with the Clause Regnante Edwardo Rege Angliæ, in the Charters of Guyenne, which he insisted shou'd be Regnante Philippo Rege Franciæ. After a great many Debates upon this Clause, it was agreed between John de Grailly the Seneschal of Guyenne, and the Court of France, that it shou'd be alter'd thus, Regnante Philippo Rege Franciæ, Edwardo Rege Angliæ tenente Ducatum Aquitaniæ: i. e. Philip being King of France; and Edward King of England, holding the Dutchy of Aquitain. But it does not appear in this place, that King Edward approv'd of this Expedient.

V. The Acts which relate to England in particular,

IT may be observed in the first Acts of this Tome, that by their being passed in England, during the absence of King Edward who was in Palestine, he was own'd for King, tho' he had not been crown'd, the bare Proclamation of him being thought sufficient to vest him with all the Authority of a King: Consequently all those Acts were pass'd in his Name, and by his Authority, only with this difference; that whereas when the King was present, the Words Teste Rege, or Teste me-ipso, i. e. Witness the King or myself, were under-written; while he was absent, the Subscription was Teste W. Eborum Archiepiscopo, Ed. Cornubiæ, & Gilb. Gloucestriæ Comitibus, i. e. Witness W. Archbishop of York, Edward Earl of Cornwall, and Gilbert Earl of Glouceſter, who were the three Regents of the Kingdom; or else they put, per manum W. de Merton Cancellarii nostri, i. e. by the Hand of W. de Merton our Chancellor.

Provision for King Edward's Coronation. P. 21.

AMONG the first Acts, after the King's Return from the Holy Land, we find one that ascertains the necessary Provisions to be made for the King's Coronation, every County being taxed to furnish a certain Quantity therein specify'd. For example, Glouceſterſhire was oblig'd to furnish 60 Beeves, 60 Hogs, 2 fat Boars, 60 Sheep, all alive; 3000 Capons and Hens, and 40 Gammons of Bacon; and other Counties in proportion, which were all to be brought to Windsor, and delivered to the Constable of the Castle, on pain of incurring the King's Displeasure.

P. 34. HERE we have a Memorandum of the Day, when King Edward arriv'd at Dover, and of that also on which he was crown'd.

P. 49. THERE's an Act in 1275, the third Year of this Reign, by which Sir John Bohun and his Lady resign to King Edward the Serjeantship of his Chapel, and the Office call'd Officium Spigornellorum, of which I know not what to make. Du Cange speaks of it, but he does not explain it to my liking; for he only quotes a Passage which seems to import that it was an Office belonging to the King's Chapel. Sir Henry Spelman mentions also in his Glossary, the word Spigurnelli, and quotes a Passage or two where 'tis us'd, but he does not say what it was *.

ANNO 1277, King Edward writes to his Chief Justice in Ireland, that 8000 Marks were offer'd him to establish the English Laws in that Country; and that he consents to it, because, says he, those which the Irish make use of, are abominable in the sight of God, and by consequence ought not to be deem'd Laws. Mean time he orders him to get in the Money with all the dispatch possible.

Irish offer a great Sum to K. Edward to establish the English Laws among 'em. P. 78.

IN 1278, Alexander King of Scotland being upon a Journey to England, King Edward orders all the Bailiffs to take care that Provisions be sold to him at the Market price. Such a Precaution is often wanted elsewhere, especially in Holland. P. 124.

IT appears that the Kings of England formerly permitted Duels between private Persons.

'TIS recorded that Guildhall, now the Town-house of London, belong'd in the Year 1280 to German Merchants.

Guildhall to whom it belong'd formerly.

WE find, that formerly Wolves came down from the Mountains of Wales, which infested the neighbouring Counties of England; for in the Year 1281, King Edward gave a Commission to one Peter Corbet, to destroy all the Wolves he could find in the Counties bordering upon Wales. P 161.

HERE we have another Memorandum of the Day on which King Edward landed at Dover, when he return'd from France in 1289, after 3 Years stay in that Kingdom. P. 417.

IN 1297, there's an Act wherein King Edward excuses himself to his Subjects, for loading them with heavy Taxes; and tells them the reason why he took away the Offices of Constable and Grand Marshal from Humphry Bohun, and Hugh Bigot, in order to obviate the Reports which were spread abroad; that he did it because those Lords had made some Remonstrances to the King for the publick benefit of the Nation. P. 783.

IN 1298, we find a Commission from King Edward, to enquire into his Subjects Grievances, with a design to redress them. P. 813.

IN 1307, King Edward made Gaveston a Favourite of his Son Edward take an Oath never to set foot again in England; and compell'd his Son Edward to take another Oath never to recall him. This Act may be of some use to refer to in the following Reign.

THIS King Edward died the 7th of July 1307, of which here is a Memorandum.

by the King. In this Reign the Jews were all drove out of England *.

EDWARD I.

VI. Affairs betwixt King Edward and the Popes.

IN this Tome there's a great number of Letters from Edward to the Popes, and likewise of Bulls from the Popes to the King. The Subject of most of those Bulls and Letters, was an Expedition which Edward pretended he would make into the Holy-Land, that he might obtain leave to raise the Tenths upon the Clergy of his Kingdom, as well as on those of Scotland and Ireland: He endeavoured to amuse the Popes with this pretence, during the whole Course of his Reign. The Popes, who were afraid of being bubbled, were willing enough to grant an Order for levying the Tenths; but they insisted that the King should first of all take the Cross upon him for the Holy War, and then they would consent that he should receive a part of the Tenths so rais'd, on condition that the rest should remain in the hands of their Commissioners, to be disposed of according to their discretion, and always under the specious Pretext of the Holy War; but this was what King Edward would by no means consent to. If the Clergy of England were to be ruined, he was resolved that no body should be the better for it but himself; and this sort of Game was carry'd on to the very end of his Reign. Sometimes the King and the Pope were good Friends upon this Subject, and at other times as much at variance: However it was, 'tis plain, by the History of this Prince, that after he came back from Palestine, he never intended, in good earnest, to go thither again.

Bulls and Letters betwixt King Edward and the Popes.

THE Bulls and Letters betwixt the Popes and King Edward, upon this Subject, are to be found in these Pages, 119, 122, 202, 235, 259, 273, 316, 321, 323, 341, 413, 432, 459, 460, 475, 495, 499, 501, 509 to 523, 872, 876, 915, 968, 1006, 1036, 1039.

Pope's Receipts for the Tribute from England. P. 107, 267, 280.

IT appears by several Acquittances of the Popes, inserted in this Collection, that King Edward punctually paid them that annual Tribute, for which King John engaged himself to the See of Rome †. Indeed he once made an Attempt to alter the Nature of this Tribute, by proposing to the Pope to assign the Revenues of certain Abbeys in his Kingdom for the Payment of it; but the latter would not consent to it. P. 121.

AMONG others, here is a Bull of Pope Gregory, exhorting King Edward not to meddle with the Revenues of the Churches vacant in Gascoigne, in the Year 1274. P. 36.

AND in 1279, Edward on his part intreats Pope Nicholas not to usurp the Privileges of England. P. 130.

IN 1282, King Edward forbids his Subjects to export the Money, rais'd for the Service of the Holy-Land, out of the Kingdom. 'Tis not improbable that the Pope had a design to lay hands on it. P. 201.

IN 1284, Pope Martin IV. issued a Bull for absolving King Edward of all Crimes which he had committed, as well during the Barons War in the Reign of his Father, as in the War against Wales. P. 272.

IN 1289, Pope Nicholas IV. issued a Bull for abrogating the Custom in Scotland of refusing to admit Foreigners into their Monasteries; and denying them, if not the Habits, at least the Honours of their Orders. P. 417.

NEXT Year King Edward complained to the Pope, of the Abuses committed by the Court of Rome in England, in Collations to Churches: and there's a Letter of the like nature from the Nobility. P. 493.

THE Pope's Answer, inserted in the next Page, is perfectly shuffling; and several Acts testify that the Popes continued their old Pranks. P. 494.

IN 1296, Pope Boniface VIII. issued a Bull, forbidding the Clergy to pay any Tax to their Princes without his leave ‖. The Clergy of England, thinking this Bull a sufficient Warrant for them to refuse the King the Money which he demanded, were outlaw'd: which made them comply. P. 706.

NEXT Year, King Edward having caus'd some private Persons Corn to be seiz'd, forbad P. 787.

* Dr. Kennet, in his Notes upon Mr. Daniel's History of this Reign, after having observed that their High-Priest was confirmed in his Office by the King, says, the Jews came in with William the Conqueror, and were settled in certain Streets by themselves in London, of which Old-Jewry was the chief; and that being always hated by the People for their Extortion and Usury, they were rather tolerated than loved by our Kings, because they now and then fleeced them: but now they were grown so intolerable by their Witchcraft, Poisoning, clipping of Money, counterfeiting Hands and Seals, crucifying of Children privately, and cruel Usury, that nothing would satisfy the People but the utter extirpating them out of the Kingdom; to which King Edward did not very unwillingly consent, because they were allowed to carry nothing away with them, except some small matter to bear their Charges, and so left him a vast Treasure. They went most of them into Italy and Germany. Dr. Howel says, 297 Jews were executed at London at one time, for defacing this King's Coin.

† Here Mr. Rapin seems to question the Truth of a Quotation from Coke's Institute, Fol. 13. inserted in the Memorial presented by the English Protestants to the Prince and Princess of Orange; which asserts, That King Edward I. refused this Tribute to Pope Gregory X. This Memorial was published in Holland, and suppos'd to be written by Dr. Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Sarum. Vide Collection of State-Tracts in King William's Reign, Vol. I.

‖ This Bull is inserted likewise in Fox's Martyrology, fol. 320. And the same Author tells us, That not long after, at a Parliament at St. Edmondsbury, an Eighth being granted to King Edward of all Cities and Boroughs, the Clergy, by reason of this Bull, stood out stoutly, and refused to pay a Farthing; and that insisting still upon the same, in the next Parliament at London, the King was so offended, that he declared them out of his Protection, and that they should have no Benefit of his Laws: and justly too, says our Author; for why should they that will contribute nothing to the Support of the Government, expect any advantage by it? As for Pecham the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was the Ringleader of the Nonsolvents, the King caused all his Goods to be seized; which so terrify'd the rest of the Clergy, that they freely contributed a Fifth of their Goods to his Majesty's Use, and so were received into favour.

bad the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to excommunicate his Officers that made the Seizure. And as 'tis probable that Prelate threatned them, notwithſtanding the King's Prohibition, we find in the very next page an Order from his Majeſty, to commit to Priſon all Perſons that ſhou'd dare to publiſh the Excommunication.

P. 989, 1002, 1020, 1021.

We find afterwards, that King Edward complain'd againſt that Archbiſhop to the Pope, and that at laſt he caus'd him to be ſuſpended.

P. 844.

In 1299, Pope Boniface iſſu'd a very haughty Bull, wherein he ſets himſelf up for Judge of the Controverſy betwixt the King of England and the Scots: and not content with ordering Edward to ſend his Ambaſſadors to Rome, there to ſee the Determination of the Affair, he begins with a flat Lye; for he ſays, That 'tis publickly notorious that Scotland has at all times been a Fief of the Church. 'Tis from this Bull that I took ſome of the Arguments which I have brought elſewhere againſt Edward's Sovereignty over Scotland, in which point 'tis probable Boniface had been inſtructed by the Scots.

P. 873, 883.

To this there's a ſmart Anſwer from the Engliſh Nobility *, and the King return'd another every whit as ſharp, with a Writing inclos'd, in which he aſſerted his Sovereignty over Scotlond, from the Proofs contain'd in the Paper preſented to the Scots, as abovementioned: all the difference is, that in this he traces the Sovereignty of England over Scotland farther back, viz. from Brutus the firſt fabulous King of Britain; whereas in the former, he goes no higher than Athelſtan, one of the Saxon Kings. He knew very well that the Pope would not trouble himſelf to examine all thoſe Facts. In 1306, the King ſent a Letter to the ſaid Pope, wherein he prays him not to uſurp the Rights of the Crown of England.

In the Year 1284, Philip Count of Savoy granted Letters Patent, by which he conferr'd a Right on King Edward to nominate his Succeſſor to the ſaid County.

Ganday, in the Life of Alphonſo II. King of Arragon, ſays, That he might well be call'd the Chaſte, becauſe he was never marry'd: Y dignamente ſe puede cognominar el Caſto, porque toda ſua vida vivio en caſtidad, ſin caſarſe jamas. 'Tis true indeed, that he was never marry'd, or rather, that he did not conſummate his Marriage; but it was not his fault. We find in this Tome, that his Father Peter had agreed to a Match propos'd for him with the Princeſs Eleanor, the eldeſt Daughter of King Edward, Anno 1273. And his Agreement was confirm'd in 1281, by a Letter from King Edward to his Ambaſſadors, by the full Powers he gave them the Year following, and by Conventions that were paſs'd that ſame Year betwixt the two Kings. In 1287, King Edward promis'd by his Letters Patent to have the Marriage conſummat ed; but ſome Obſtacles retarded the Princeſs's being ſent into Arragon, and Alphonſo died before ſhe arriv'd †.

P. 14. P. 173. P. 187. P. 210. P. 349.

In 1273, we find alſo King Edward's agreement to a Treaty of Marriage (during his firſt Voyage to Guyenne) betwixt his eldeſt Son Henry, and Joan the ſole Daughter and Heireſs of Henry King of Navarre; but the young Prince died before he came of Age to be marry'd.

P. 18.

Again in 1276, we find a Marriage concluded between Hartman Son of the Emperor Rodolph, and Edward's ſecond Daughter Joan, but the Conſummation of it was prevented by Hartman's Death. There's a great number of Pieces relating to this Marriage, in this ſecond Tome of the Fœdera.

P. 70.

Here are alſo ſeveral Acts relating to a Marriage propos'd A. D. 1281, between Alphonſo Son of King Edward, and Margaret the Daughter of Florence, Count of Holland; but the young Prince died at the Age of twelve.

P. 175.

It would be needleſs to make mention here of all the numerous Acts which relate to the Marriages, or Propoſals of Marriages of the other Daughters of King Edward, or of his own with Margaret of France, and that of Edward his Son with Iſabella Daughter of Philip de Valois, in purſuance of the Treaty of Monſtreuil.

King Edward challeng'd to a Tournament

The Engliſh Hiſtorians ſay, that King Edward paſſing into Burgundy, in his Return from the Holy-Land, was challeng'd by John de Chalon ‡ to a Tournament in that Province; that he accepted the Challenge, and that the Burgundians having play'd him an ill-natur'd Trick, the Tournament was chang'd into a real Combate, which was call'd the Skirmiſh of Chalon, in which King Edward had the advantage. Here are two Bulls of Pope Gregory X. ‖ who was then at Lyons, in which he exhorts King Edward not to be preſent at a Tournament, which was to be in France; which Bulls ſeem to have a regard to this Tournament of Chalon, only a Perplexity ariſes from the Difference of Dates, the Bull being dated in the middle of the Year 1274, whereas Edward in his Return from Paleſtine muſt have enter'd Burgundy in 1273; ſo that 'tis very probable the Hiſtorians have miſtaken the Time.

P. 29, 30. Pope endeavours to diſſuade him from accepting it.

* Dr. Howel, in his Medulla Hiſtoriæ Anglicanæ, has given the Names of all the Subſcribers, to the number of a hundred Peers, which he calls a Liſt of thoſe worthy Patriots who withſtood Papal Uſurpation.

† This was Alphonſo III. who, ſay the Spaniſh Hiſtorians, drove the Moors out of Majorca and Minorca, but was deſpiſed by his Subjects, becauſe of a ſcandalous Treaty he made with the Pope and the King of Naples: he died of the Plague.

‡ Dr. Kennet calls him the Count de Chalons.

‖ This Pope was choſe while he was in Syria with King Edward, after the Chair had been vacant almoſt three Years; wherefore to prevent the Inconveniences of ſuch tedious Elections for the future, in a Council held at Lyons in 1273, they contrived and ſettled the Form of the Conclaves.

VIII. Acts relating to different Affairs.

EDWARD I.

IT is agreed both by French and Engliſh Hiſtorians, that when Edward return'd from the Holy-Land, he went firſt to Guyenne in order to be recogniz'd by the Gaſcons; and that Gaſton Viſcount de Bearn refuſing to pay him Homage, he was ſent for to Bourdeaux, where he was arreſted, and at laſt compelled to pay the Homage demanded. 'Tis ſurprizing, that of ſuch a number of Acts in this Collection relating to Gaſton de Bearn, there is not one touching this Homage, but only about ſome Diſputes betwixt him and King Edward, in which the Vaſſalage of Gaſton is evidently ſuppos'd. For example, in 1273 Gaſton engages himſelf not to leave the King of England's Court without his Conſent, on pain of loſing the Lands which he holds of him. This Dependance is farther ſuppoſed in one other Act of that Year, and in ſhort in all the reſt relating to Edward's Differences with this Nobleman. 'Tis true, that in pag. 16. we find King Edward complaining that Gaſton had not obey'd a Summons that was ſent to him; but it does not follow from thence that he diſputed the Homage which he owed to King Edward. Yet this is what Mezeray aſſerts poſitively, and probably he had his Authorities for it; but however it was, 'tis ſtrange that in none of the Acts of this Tome relating to this Gaſton, (ſpecify'd in the Margin) there is any mention of the Homage which 'tis pretended he refuſed.

IN the Year above-mentioned, we have the Proceſs of Pope Gregory X. againſt Guy de Montfort, Son to Simon the late Earl of Leiceſter, for having murdered in the Church of Viterbo, Henry Son to Richard, King of the Romans, and Earl of Cornwal. This was done at the Sollicitation of this King Edward, Couſin to the ſaid Henry, who, during his Stay at Rome, in his Return from the Holy-Land, obtain'd the Condemnation of the Murderers. As for the Conſequences of this Affair, which is in itſelf of ſmall importance, ſee the Pages in the Margin.

AS in the firſt Tome of the Fœdera, we find that the Earls of Flanders paid Homage to the Kings of England merely for Penſions; ſo we ſee the ſame thing in this with reſpect to the Courts of Savoy, Burgundy, and Kaſenellebogen in Germany. All the difference is, that the latter mortgaged ſome of their Lands, which they owned they held in Fief of the King of England, on the Payment of a Penſion agreed on betwixt them.

He likewiſe ſent him to the Court of France to ſupport his Intereſts in the general Aſſembly of the States of that Kingdom, and gave him an annual Penſion.

P. 4, 25, 28, 37, 50, 52, 125, 180, 496.

THIS Extract is ſufficient to ſhew of what great uſe the Acts contained in the ſecond Tome of the Fœdera may be to all that have a mind to write the Hiſtory of England, or of the Countries with which it has had any diſpute. Tho' ſome of the Acts may appear of leſs Importance than the others, nevertheleſs the Collector was certainly in the right not to omit them, becauſe 'tis difficult to foreſee all the Occaſions for which any one of the Acts may be wanted *.

* It may not be improper to conclude this Reign with the general Character Mr. Rymer has given of it, in the Dedication of this ſecond Tome to the late Queen Anne.

" This ſecond Tome, ſays he, gives a View of what paſs'd worthy of Memory during the Reign of your " moſt noble Progenitor King Edward the Firſt, a Prince the moſt Renowned for Arms in that Age.

" And that this was an Age of much War and Action, and of many famous Captains; among others Albert " the Great, Duke of Brunſwick; William the Great, Marquis of Montferrat; Amadeus the Great, Count of " Savoy; three of King Edward's neareſt Kindred, and his Familiars: each of whom by their ſignal Conduct " and Bravery had the Title Great added for their Surname." Thus far Mr. Rymer.

As to the firſt of theſe Heroes, he was the ſecond Son and Succeſſor to that Otho, who according to Mr. Diſney's Genealogy of this Family was created Duke of Brunſwick and Lunenburg in 1235. by the Emperor Frederick II. whoſe Diploma is ſtill in the Archives of Zell. This Albert marry'd Adelheid, Daughter to Henry the Magnanimous, Duke of Brabant, whoſe Portion was to be paid by Henry III. King of England, who adviſ'd him to the Match; as appears by a Letter at the end of this Tome, p. 1063. amongſt the Acts omitted, from the Dutcheſs herſelf to King Edward, wherein after congratulating him upon his Succeſs in the Holy-Land, and upon his Return from thence, and his Coronation, ſhe puts him in mind of the Portion which his Father had promis'd her with his Conſent; and A. D. 1280, after the Death of her Husband the Duke, ſhe wrote to him again, p. 1076. deſiring he wou'd take her Sons into his Protection. 'Tis obſervable, that in theſe Letters ſhe calls herſelf Adelheid, ſo that there muſt be a Miſtake both in Mr. Diſney, and the Atlas Hiſtorique, who make Adelheid Daughter to the Marquis of Montferrat, Albert's ſecond Wife, and the Mother of his Sons: And the Author of the Hiſtory of the Houſe of Brunſwick-Lunenburg, printed at London in 1715, muſt alſo be miſtaken in calling her Elizabeth, ſince the contrary appears by her Letters in the Appendix to his Book; and p. 40. of the Book itſelf, where he calls her Adelhaiza, and ſays ſhe was Queen Leonora's Couſin, and marry'd in England. 'Tis farther obſervable, that this Albert her Husband muſt have had Bremen, for there's a Letter of his p. 1065. in 1276. to King Edward I. in behalf of the Townſmen whom he calls his Subjects, there being then a Controverſy betwixt them and the Londoners about Trade. The Atlas Hiſtorique adds, that Albert made War upon Gerrard Archbiſhop of Mentz, and Conrad Count of Eberſtein, that he took them both Priſoners, and ordered the latter to be hung up by the Feet. He died afterwards of a Wound he receiv'd in Battle againſt the Marquis of Miſnia in 1279, having had Iſſue ſix Sons and a Daughter.

The ſame Author gives the following Account of the laſt of theſe Heroes, viz. Amadeus V. He defeated the Count of Geneva and Dauphin of Vienne, who made War upon him. He join'd with Albert of Auſtria againſt Adolph, who diſputed the Empire, and went afterward to aſſiſt King Edward I. againſt the Scots. He was ſucceſsful againſt the Marquiſſes of Montferrat and Saluſſes. Having made Peace betwixt the King of France and the Count of Flanders, he went with a powerful Fleet to aſſiſt the Knights of St. John of Jeruſalem, againſt the Turks, whom he defeated, took their Admiral, kill'd their Commander, ſunk moſt of their Brigantines and Galleys; and FOEDERA Tom. III. We come now to give an Account of the Third Volume of the Fœdera, which Mr. Rapin, in order to communicate a more perfect Idea of the general Uſefulneſs of that noble Collection of Records than yet he had done, introduces after this manner. EDWARD II.

AS every one of the numerous Letters, Treaties, Proclamations, Memorials, Patents, and other Pieces of that kind, relating to the Engliſh Hiſtory, which are inſerted in the Fœdera, bear the Dates not only of the Year, but of the Month and Day, there's no room to doubt but thoſe Dates muſt be of very great Uſe to illuſtrate Facts, and explain Paſſages even the moſt obſcure and perplexing. As we find that the Diſcovery of one ſingle Letter in a Cypher, leads us to find out a ſecond, and theſe to a third; juſt ſo the Date of an Act, be it of ever ſo little Importance, helps us very often to range a Fact of more Conſequence, in its due Place and Order. But what renders this Collection ſtill more valuable, is, that it mentions the Dates of Place as well as Time, which is of no little Service to the Reader, becauſe he is thereby enabled as it were to trace the Prince from one Place to another, from the beginning to the very end of his Reign.

BEFORE I had duly conſider'd this Advantage, I thought with myſelf that Mr. Rymer was a little to blame, and wonder'd that he ſhou'd ſwell his Collection with a very great Number of Pieces, which at firſt View ſeem'd to be of little conſequence, if not altogether unneceſſary; but after maturer Reflection, I am convinc'd that there is not one Piece in the Fœdera but may be of Uſe, eſpecially to ſuch as would write the Hiſtory of England.

THE Hiſtory of France is capable likewiſe of receiving great Lights from it, by reaſon of the Connection it has with the Hiſtory of England, on account of the Affairs that have been frequently tranſacted between theſe two Kingdoms in particular. For my own part I have diſcovered that the beſt Hiſtorians of France may be often improv'd by the help of this Collection.

I ſay the ſame thing of the Hiſtory of Scotland, the Hiſtorians of that Country having err'd many times in Dates, and even in Facts, as I could eaſily inſtance more than once in Buchanan.

THE Affairs which England had from time to time with the Princes of the Netherlands, occaſion'd the inſerting of ſome Pieces in this Collection, which probably never came from the Archives of thoſe Princes; ſuch as Letters, Treaties, and other Things which may be uſeful for the Hiſtory of thoſe Provinces.

WE need only look back to the firſt and ſecond Tomes of this Collection, to be convinced how the Hiſtory of Sicily may be illuſtrated with a great number of Particulars there mention'd, of which one does not ſee the leaſt Trace in the Hiſtorians either of Sicily or Naples *.

THE Hiſtories of Caſtile, Arragon, and Portugal, may alſo be furniſhed from this Collection with certain Facts that were not known to their beſt Hiſtorians, or elſe were never well explain'd; of this we had an Inſtance in the ſecond Tome, with reſpect to the Duel intended betwixt the Kings of Arragon and Sicily †.

Thoſe who undertake to write the Lives of the Popes, may alſo find in it the Popes Briefs or Bulls, and the Letters to them from the Kings of England; which, beſides the particular Facts they contain, may be of vaſt help to them, were it only for the exactneſs of the Dates.

IN ſhort, private Perſons may here find Circumſtances they knew nothing of before, relating to their Families, or the Perſons of their Anceſtors, which is no little Satisfaction; tho' indeed 'tis what ſcarce any will be the better for, but the Engliſh and the Gaſcons: I ſay, Gaſcons, becauſe Guyenne having been for a long time under the Dominion of the Kings of England, there's a multitude of Pieces in the Fœdera which relate to that Province.

'TIS plain therefore that this Collection is of vaſt uſe to thoſe who apply to the ſtudy of Hiſtory, and particularly that of England; for which reaſon ſuch can never enough extol the Bounty of thoſe Monarchs who made them ſo valuable a Preſent, or the Worth of thoſe Noblemen who procured it. If all other Nations wou'd follow this Example, one might have a Hiſtory of the ſeveral States of Europe, at leaſt as to what relates to the ſeven laſt Centuries, as perfect as cou'd be wiſh'd ‖.

FOEDERA Tom. III.

AFTER these Remarks on the Fœdera, in general, 'tis time now to proceed to the 3d Tome, in particular, which takes in the first sixteen Years of the Reign of Edward II. The Method observed by the Collector in ranging all the Acts according to their Dates, tho' upon different Subjects, is somewhat confounding to such as have not the Events to which those Acts relate, fresh in their Memory. To remedy this Inconvenience in some measure, and to give a more distinct Idea of the most important Articles in the third Tome, I will range the whole under four Heads, which take in the chief Contents of this Tome.

I. THE domestic Troubles of England upon the account of Gaveston, and the Spensers, who were King Edward II*d's* Favourites.

II. THE Transactions betwixt this Prince and Scotland, which are a Continuation of the Account taken from the second Tome.

III. THE Disputes with the Court of Rome, and other Ecclesiastical Affairs.

IV. THE Affair of the Knights Templars, whose Order was abolish'd in this Reign.

ARTICLE I.

The Domestic Troubles of England.

King Edward II's Character.

EDWARD II. was a weak Prince, of a mean Genius, who engag'd rashly in Affairs, without considering the Consequences, and without the necessary Abilities to extricate himself out of the Difficulties into which he plung'd. His excessive Attachment to Gaveston, a Gentleman of Gascoigne, to whom he entirely abandon'd himself, and upon whom he heap'd his Favours without measure, embroil'd him with the most considerable Lords of the Kingdom, who united together to ruin the Favourite. In short, they demanded his Removal, and the King promis'd it, but afterwards did all that was in his power to be excus'd from his Engagement: and when he cou'd not come off any other way, he found means to turn his Favourite's Banishment to his Advantage, by making him Governor of Ireland; an Expedient with which the Nobility wou'd however have been well satisfy'd, if his extreme Fondness for Gaveston had not induc'd him to recall him almost as soon as he had sent him over; and not only so, but to bring him to a Tournament, where that imprudent Favourite eclips'd all the other Lords by the Splendor of his Equipage, and the numerous Train of Gentlemen who attended him, both as his Companions and Guards. The Nobility finding themselves deceiv'd by the King, took new measures. Being assembled in Parliament, they presented a Petition to him, setting forth in plain Terms that the State and his Household were both so ill govern'd, that there was a necessity of a proper Regulation; and therefore they pray'd him to let them chuse a certain number of Persons who might be impower'd to make Rules for better governing the State and the King's Household, and to cause the same to be duly observ'd. Edward being in no condition to resist them, granted what he did not dare to refuse: whereupon the said Commissioners, of whom Thomas Earl of Lancaster was Chief, were chose, and went by the Name of Ordainers. They made a Regulation, and had the necessary Powers from the King and Parliament, to cause it to be observ'd. There was no mention in it of Gaveston; but the Ordainers seeing that the King continu'd to heap his Favours upon him, made a new Regulation containing 41 Articles, by one of which Gaveston was condemn'd to perpetual Banishment, and the King was oblig'd to conform to it.

EDWARD II.

History of his Favourite Gaveston.

Insurrection of the Barons.

This Prince had scarce given Consent to the Exile of his Favourite, but he repented of it, and re-call'd him without saying any thing to the Ordainers; which made the Barons rise. They took Arms ‖, and march'd with the Earl of Lancaster at their head towards York, where the King then was, in order to force him to deliver up Gaveston. Upon the Report of their coming, Edward retired to Newcastle; but when he heard that the Barons Army was advancing that way, he thought it unsafe to stay there any longer; and being more in pain for his Favourite than for himself, he quitted that Town and carried him to Scarborough Castle, then the strongest Place in all the North, where he left him and went himself for Warwick, intending to assemble an Army there to oppose the Barons. The latter arrived at Newcastle the very day that the

"Amongst the Negotiations in this Book publish'd, may be noted, that during the most unprosperous and disastrous Administration, amidst the greatest Confusion, and dismal Jumble of Affairs (so it pleased Almighty Providence) an Alliance was contracted with William the Third, surnam'd the Good *, Count of Holland, whereby those Measures were concerted, which in the next succeeding Reign carried the English Arms into France to Cressy and to Poictiers; and thence brought the French King from the Field of Battle into this your Kingdom captive."

‖ Dr. Kennet in his Notes upon Mr. Daniel's History of this Reign says, that the BISHOPS were such zealous Confederates in this Action, that the Archbishop of Canterbury excommunicated Walter Bishop of Coventry, because out of a loyal Principle he refused to join with them.

* He was the second Earl of Hainault, that was stiled Earl of Holland, Zealand and Friesland; which Provinces, according to Guicciardine's History of the Netherlands, fell to his Father by Marriage. This was a gallant Prince, and for his Piety, Justice, and Mildness, had the Surname of Good; as his Brother John, who was kill'd by the Flemings, was for his contrary Temper surnamed the Merciless. In his Reign Holland was afflicted with a Plague and Famine, which destroy'd many of their People. In 1328, Philip of France, by the assistance of this Earl, obtain'd a great Victory over the Flemings at Mount-Cassel, where they lost 10000 Men. There's a memorable Story of an Act of Justice done by this good Earl not long before his Death upon the Bailiff of South-Holland, who had taken away a poor Man's Cow (he refusing to sell her because she gave Milk enough to subsist his Family) and sent him another in exchange, that was not to compare with her. The Earl commanded the Bailiff in the first place for the wrong done to the Countryman, to pay him 100 Crowns, and afterwards for the Injury done to himself and his Government, to be beheaded. He reigned 33 Years, and had by his Wife Jane of Valois, 3 Sons, William, Lewis and John, with 4 Daughters, Margaret Dutchess of Bavaria and Empress, Joan Countess of Juliers, Philippa Queen of England, and Elizabeth. He advis'd his Son William upon his Death-bed to maintain Peace with his Neighbours, and lay no grievous Impositions on his Subjects.——See the Atlas Historique.

FOEDERA Tom. III.

the King left it; and after pillaging his Moveables and Baggage, sent a Detachment to besiege Scarborough. The Earl of Pembroke, who had the Care of this Siege, carried it on with so much Vigour, that Gaveston was obliged to capitulate *, on condition he might have leave to speak with the King, and be tried according to the Laws and Customs of the Realm. The Confederate Lords were not very well satisfy'd with this Capitulation; but the Earl of Pembroke having engaged upon his Honour to carry Gaveston to the King, and afterward to bring him back to the Lords, they at length consented, notwithstanding the opposition made by the Earl of Warwick, and some others. As the Earl of Pembroke was upon the Road with his Prisoner, the Earl of Warwick hearing that Gaveston was in a Castle where there was not Accommodation for Pembroke, went thither in the Night, forc'd the Guard, took and carried the Prisoner to his own Castle of Warwick, and there cut off his Head †.

Gaveston's tragical Exit.

Peace betwixt the King and the Barons.

How nettled soever Edward was by the Affront which he had received, he was again obliged to sue to the Barons for a Peace, by the Mediation of two of the Pope's Legates, who happen'd to be in England. By the Agreement which was concluded not long after, the Lords engag'd to make the King publick satisfaction, and to restore all the Plunder carried off from Newcastle, together with the Jewels taken from Gaveston. And the King, on his part, promised to grant an ample Amnesty to the Barons, and all their Adherents. The Barons executed their part speedily, and bonâ fide; but the King delay'd almost a Year before he publish'd the promis'd Pardon; which made the Lords so diffident of him, that the Troubles would have broke out afresh, if Edward's Father-in-Law, the King of France, had not sent his Brother, the Count d'Evreux, into England, along with Enguerrand de Marigny, who obtained of the King, that the Amnesty should be publish'd.

So much for the First Part of the domestic Troubles, which ended in October 1313: They were indeed attended with some Consequence in the following Years, to 1318; but 'tis not worth while to insist upon it.

The History of the Spensers.

In the Year 1314, fresh Troubles arose between the King and his Nobles, upon account of a new Favourite, viz. Hugh Spenser, who made the same ill use of his Favour, as Gaveston had done before: He got his Father Hugh to be made Earl of Winchester; and they two governed the whole Kingdom, Edward blindly approving every thing they did. The Earl of Lancaster, who after his Reconciliation with the King, received a terrible Affront from that Prince, made the great favour of the Spensers, a Pretext to renew the Confederacy of the Barons: He rais'd Troops, and caused the Lands of the said Favourites to be wasted by Roger Mortimer, jun. who committed as much Spoil on them as amounted to 60000 l. Sterling. This done, the Lords publickly demanded the Banishment of the Spensers, which the King did not dare to refuse, when he saw that the Commons of England took their part. Spenser jun. was carried to Dover, and there put on board a Ship ‡, the Father being at that time absent from the Realm about the King's Affairs. This Prince now found himself in a very miserable plight, being forced to receive Law from his own Subjects, and not knowing which way to extricate himself from such a State of Slavery; but at last a new Affront which the King received from one of the Confederate Lords, drove his Patience to its Extremity, and made him resolve to shake off a Yoke so disagreeable.

Another Revolt of the Barons.

King Edward's Queen grossly affronted. P. 897.

His Queen intending a Progress to Canterbury, order'd her Officers to provide a Night's Lodging for her upon the Road, at a Place call'd Leeds-Castle, belonging to Bartholomew Badlesmere, one of the Confederate Lords; but ‖ the Governor of the Castle deny'd Entrance to the Queen's Servants, some of whom were kill'd: Upon which her Majesty complain'd of it to Badlesmere; but he had the Insolence to approve of the Governor's Action, and to say, That he had done nothing but by his Orders. Edward cou'd not stomach such a gross Affront as this was; but rais'd Troops, went and besieg'd Leeds-Castle, and hung up the Governor. And having this Power in his hands, he laid hold of the Opportunity, and crush'd the Confederate Lords, without giving them time to look about; so that after having got most of their Castles in his own hands, they were glad to submit to his Will and Pleasure; and then he made no scruple to recall the Spensers to Court.

The Submission of the Barons.

Earl of Lancaster's Rebellion and Death.

The Earl of Lancaster, who was afraid to trust the King, rais'd Troops in his own defence; but being abandon'd by most of his Friends, he was not in a condition to make head against him, which made him resolve to withdraw to the North, and join the Scots, who had promis'd him Assistance. The King pursued him; and as the Earl, to avoid a Battle with him, endeavour'd to force the passage of a Bridge which was kept by Harclay , he was taken Prisoner and carried to Pontefract, where the King took off his Head. This Lord, who was King Henry the † Dr. Kennet says, this was done on the 19th of June, 1312.

THIS is the Sum and Subſtance of the Acts of this Tome, which relate to the domeſtick Troubles of England, as far as comes within the firſt ſixteen Years of the Reign of Edward II. the four others being referred to the fourth Tome of the Fœdera.

AMONG all theſe Pieces, which are very numerous, I ſhall but barely point out the chief that have a relation to the Events above-mentioned.

Edward's Gifts to Gaveſton. P. 1, and 87, 136, 164.

IN this third Tome of the Fœdera, we have the great Gifts which Edward made to Gaveſton, particularly the Earldom of Cornwall, the City of Exeter, and fifteen other Territories or Caſtles; which made him in an inſtant the greateſt Lord in the Kingdom.

THE firſt of thoſe Acts is dated from Dumfrize in Scotland, the 5th of Auguſt 1307, viz. a Month after the Death of Edward I. who had baniſhed Gaveſton but a little while before, and made his Son take an Oath that he would never recall him.

He makes him Guardian of the Kingdom. P. 47.

HERE is alſo a Patent conſtituting Gaveſton, Cuſtos Regni; that is to ſay, Guardian of the Kingdom during the King's Abſence in France, whither he went to conſummate his Marriage with Iſabel, Daughter of Philip the Fair *.

I have taken particular notice of this Act, to ſhew the Error of moſt Hiſtorians †, who affirm, that Gaveſton accompanied the King into France; and, in particular, of Father Orleans, who ſays, that the firſt time the King ſaw Gaveſton after his Baniſhment, was at Bologne: Which cannot be, for he was then Cuſtos, or Guardian of the Kingdom; and, in the Fœdera, there are ſeveral Orders ſign'd by him in that quality during the King's Abſence, with this Subſcription, Teſte Gaveſton.

IN a Memorandum relating to the Coronation of Edward II. we find that Gaveſton carried St. Edward's Crown at that Solemnity ‡.

THE firſt Regulation made by the Ordainers, is dated at Weſtminſter, March 16. 1310 *‡. P. 204.

THE ſecond Regulation they made conſiſting of forty-one Articles, one of which ſentenced Gaveſton to perpetual Baniſhment, is not to be met with here: but there are ſome Acts afterwards, which ſeem to confirm that there was ſuch a Regulation; and probably it was made in the Year 1311.

WE find afterwards a Protection for Gaveſton's coming to Court, by the King's Order, dated Oct. 8. 1311, at London. P. 278.

THE Lords complaining of his being recalled, he lurk'd about incog. and the King was forced to grant a Warrant for diſcovering and apprehending him; 'tis dated at Weſtminſter, Nov. 30. 1311. P. 294.

THE King recall'd him again, and ſent an Order to all the Sheriffs, to make Proclamation in their reſpective Counties, that he look'd upon Gaveſton as a Loyal Subject: 'Tis dated Jan. 18. 1312, at York. P. 298.

AFTER this Favourite was beheaded, the King iſſued an Order for apprehending of thoſe who were guilty of his Death: 'Tis dated July 31. 1312, at London. P. 334.

AFTER this, we meet with two Amneſties, the one for thoſe who had favour'd Gaveſton's Return, and the other for the Confederate Lords, to the Number of 468; each of which had a particular Pardon P. 442, 443.

Article II.

Of the Affairs of Scotland.

The Death of King Edward I. was the Preservation of Scotland; for after he had already conquer'd that Kingdom three times, he return'd thither with an absolute Intention to put it out of the Power of that Nation to revolt a fourth time; but Death prevented the Execution of his Designs. That was the Affair he had most at Heart during his whole Reign, and what he most vigorously recommended to his Successor: But Edward II. was otherwise dispos'd; for about a Month after the Death of his Father, he quitted Scotland, into which he was advanc'd as far as Dumfriez, and leaving his Army in the hands of Cumin, a Scotsman, he return'd into England, to consummate his Marriage, and be crown'd. In 1308, Robert Bruce, the new King of Scotland, being dangerously ill, Cumin took that Opportunity, and advanc'd to attack him. Robert, sick as he was, stood his Ground, beat him, and drove him out of the Kingdom. Edward Bruce, his Brother, won another Victory likewise, in the County of Galway, which put the Affairs of the Scots in a very good Situation. Edward II.

Cumin defeated by Bruce.

The King of England return'd into Scotland next Year with a powerful Army, but for want of having concerted proper Measures to subsist it, he was oblig'd to return without striking a Blow.

Bruce enters England;

In the Years 1310 and 1311, Robert enter'd England several times, and carried off great Booty.

Returns and takes Towns in Scotland.

In 1312, he took Perth alias St. John's Town, Dumfriez, Lanerk, Roxburgh, and at last Edinburgh; while Edward was so harrass'd with domestick Broils, that he was not in a Condition to oppose his Progress.

In 1313, he caus'd the strong Town of Sterling to be besieg'd by Edward his Brother; the Governour of which, after a brave Defence, capitulated, and promis'd to surrender the Place if it was not reliev'd in a Year; that is to say, before the Feast of St. John Baptist in the Year following.

Defeats King Edward at Sterling.

In 1314, Edward put himself at the Head of an Army of 100,000 Men, in order to go and raise the Siege, but was beat by Robert, and lost 50,000 Men, if we may believe the Scots Historians; after which time the English generally acted defensively *.

His Brother's Success in Ireland.

In 1315, Robert sent his Brother to Ireland, to support the Natives who had rebell'd against Edward; and his Brother made such a Progress there, that he was at length crown'd: But after having liv'd in that Island almost three Years, he was kill'd there in Battle, at a time when Robert was hastening to his Assistance.

In 1317, Pope John XXII. sent Legates into England, to make a Peace betwixt the two Kings, and by his single Authority caus'd a Truce to be proclaim'd for two Years; but Robert, who was never once consulted about it, made a Jest of the Pope's Proclamation, and took Ber-

* Dr. Kennet, in his Remarks upon Mr. Daniel's History of this Reign, says, this was call'd the Battle of Bannockbourn (on the Banks of which River 'twas fought the 25th of June, 1314.) and is remark'd by our Historians as a Divine Punishment of the Lewdness and Excesses of the English Army, who spent the Night before the Battle in Drunkenness and Intemperance; but as a Reward of the Piety of the Scots, who enter'd upon it with solemn Confessions, and receiving the Sacrament; wherefore God gave them such a miraculous Victory, as so few Hands, without a special Assistance of God, could not have effected. —— Dr. Howel says also, that the English in this Expedition had adorn'd themselves as for a Triumph, with all sorts of Riches, Gold, Silver, and the like, in a kind of wanton manner, corresponding to the Prince they follow'd.

IN 1318, he was oblig'd to paſs over into Ireland, to relieve his Brother, whom he found there dead. The King of England took the Opportunity of his Abſence to beſiege Berwick; and while he was employ'd in that Siege, the Earl of Murray, General of Scotland, enter'd England at another Place, and defeated the Militia of Yorkſhire, conſiſting of Ten thouſand Men, which oblig'd the King of England to raiſe the Siege of Berwick.

Truces betwixt the two Nations.

AT the expiration of the ſaid Truce, in the beginning of the Year 1322, the Scots enter'd England, and carry'd off great Booty.

AT length, in May 1323, a Truce was concluded betwixt the two Nations for thirteen Years.

THESE Matters are the Subject of the Acts of this third Volume relating to Scotland.

THO' there's no expreſs mention in thoſe Acts of the Loſſes ſuſtain'd by the Engliſh, yet there are ſeveral which manifeſtly imply that they were very great; as for inſtance, Orders repeated every Year for raiſing Troops, and to prepare Armies againſt Scotland; which is a ſign that the Affairs of the Engliſh in that Country were not in the moſt flouriſhing ſtate; for 'tis ſaid in moſt of thoſe Orders, that it was to repel the Scots. One of the moſt expreſs Acts, which ſuppoſes the Loſs of the Battle at Sterling, is a Commiſſion to the Earl of Pembroke, to take upon him the Command of the Army; which Commiſſion, it muſt be obſerv'd, is dated at York, Aug. 10, 1314. The King's Words are theſe, Ad refrænandam Scotorum inimicorum & rebellium noſtrorum obſtinatam malitiam, qui flagitiis per ipſos in terra noſtra Scotiæ, ac in propinquis finibus Regni noſtri Angliæ, diverſimode perpetratis, non contenti, ipſum Regnum jam hoſtiliter, in noſtri, ac omnium Fidelium noſtrorum dedecus, opprobrium & diſpendium, ſunt ingreſſi, ibidem homicidia, deprædationes, incendia, ſacrilegia, & mala innumerabilia committendo: i. e. To reſtrain the obſtinate Malice of our rebellious Enemies the Scots, who not content with the flagrant Acts of various kinds by them committed in our Kingdom of Scotland, and on the Borders of our Kingdom of England, have now, to the Diſhonour, Reproach, and Damage of us and our good Subjects, enter'd this very Kingdom in a hoſtile manner, committing Murders, Depredations, Burnings, Sacrileges, and other Evils without number. By the Capitulation of Sterling, that Place was to be either relievd or ſurrender'd before the 24th of June, 1314. Edward enter'd Scotland with a powerful Army to relieve it; nevertheleſs we find the Scots ravaging the Engliſh Borders upon the 10th of Auguſt following; an evident Proof that they had defeated and drove the Engliſh back.

EDWARD II.

I paſs over a great many Acts of leſs importance, to come to what is moſt curious upon this Article, and that is, to ſhew the Partiality with which Pope John XXII. acted againſt Robert Bruce. The Particulars which this Collection contains upon this Subject, are ſuch as perhaps are not eaſily to be met with elſewhere; and therefore I ſhall give a ſhort Hiſtory of it.

The Pope's Partiality againſt Robert Bruce.

KING Edward, who long'd mightily to put an end to the War with Scotland by a Truce, or by a Peace, as the Acts of this Collection abundantly manifeſt, had engag'd Pope John XXII. in his Intereſts, who for his ſake undertook to compel Robert to make a Peace with England. For this purpoſe he ſent over two Legates furniſh'd with ſeveral Bulls, the firſt of which being dated at Avignon in Jan. 1317, order'd a Truce of two Years between both Nations, by vertue of the Authority conferr'd on the Prince of the Apoſtles and his Succeſſors, as Vicegerents of the King of Peace, to procure a Peace throughout Chriſtendom, and to cauſe it to be punctually obſerv'd. The ſecond Bull, dated the 16th of April, impower'd the two Cardinals, Gaucelin and Luke, who had the Titles of St. Marcellin and St. Mary, to make a Peace between Edward King of England, and Robert Bruce, who aſſum'd the Title of King of Scotland. This Commiſſion was as ample as it could well be, for it not only gave them a Power to regulate the Conditions of the Peace as they thought fit, but it alſo authoriz'd them to force the two Parties into it, with their Subjects and Adherents, whether Clergy or Laity, of what Quality ſoever, by Suſpenſions, Excommunications, Deprivation of their Privileges, and of the Right of making Wills, or of ſucceeding to Eſtates, even tho' Edward or Robert ſhould obtain of the Holy See the Privilege of being exempted from all Excommunication.

p. 594. p. 613.

THE Pope knew very well that Edward would make no ſcruple to ſubmit to an Authority ſo extraordinary, and that he would be glad of a Peace, or a Truce upon any Terms whatſoever; therefore by a third Bull of the ſame Date with the ſecond, he gave a Power to the Legates to excommunicate Robert Bruce.

p. 614.

IN a few days after, he diſpatch'd three other Bulls, the firſt of which excommunicated all the Enemies of the King of England; the ſecond being directed to the Archbiſhops of Dublin and Caſſels, permitted them to excommunicate Robert and Edward Bruce, who had invaded Ireland; and the third was againſt the Friars Mendicant of Ireland, who by their Intrigues and Preachments favour'd the Invaſion of Edward Bruce.

THESE were the Meaſures by which the Pope endeavour'd to procure a Peace between England and Scotland, not in quality of Mediator, for Robert had never own'd him for ſuch, but by the Fulneſs of his Apoſtolical Power; as if he had been born the Judge and Sovereign Magiſtrate of Chriſtian Princes.

THE other Acts relating to this Affair, ſhew that Robert refus'd to ſubmit to the Authority of the Legates, that he deny'd them admiſſion into his Dominions, and that he would not ſo much as return an Anſwer to the Pope's Letters, on pretence that the Pope did not own his Title of King; and that, in ſhort, he laugh'd at the pretended Truce which the Legates had proclaim'd in England, by making no ſcruple to beſiege and take Berwick that very Year. Robert's Diſobedience provok'd the Pope to order his Legates to make uſe of the Authority they had received from him to excommunicate the ſaid Prince, of whom he ſpeaks in theſe Words, [a] Ipſe vero intelligere nolens ut bene ageret, ſed aures ſuas, more aſpidis ſurdæ, ne audiret vocem Patris ſapienter exhortantis, obturans; quaſi de impenſa à nobis ſuper hiis benignitate, ſuperbiæ concepiſſe videatur audaciam, iniquitatem, de exhibita ſibi per Apoſtolicam ſedem manſuetudine, non abſque ingratitudinis vitio parturivit, contemnens ipſas noſtras recipere Literas, per Nuncios ipſos eidem oblatas.——Ne non fore poſſet ambiguum, quicquid malignitatis in hac parte conceperit, licet Treugæ prædictæ per vos, vel alium, ſeu alios de Mandato noſtro per Angliam ſolemniter publicatæ fuiſſent, ita quod veriſimiliter potuerat ad ejus notitiam hujuſmodi publicatio perveniſſet, ne lateret eum cominùs poſitum quod aliis eminùs conſtitutis non credebatur occultum: Ipſe tamen Treugas iſtas, non abſque multa inſolentiæ temeritate & plectibili noſtro & ſedis prædictæ contemptu, ſpretâque ſententiâ antedictâ obſervare contempſit, villam Berewici nequiter invadens. i. e. But he refuſing good Inſtruction, like the deaf Adder, ſtopp'd his Ears, that he might not hear the Voice of his Father wiſely exhorting him; and as if our Good-Will towards him had made him proud and inſolent, he wickedly and ungratefully abus'd the Favour offer'd him from the Apoſtolical See, diſdaining to receive our Letters when brought to him by the Nuncios themſelves. And as a plain Indication of his malign Diſpoſition, altho' the aforeſaid Truces were by our Command publiſh'd in a ſolemn manner by you and others throughout England, ſo that the Publication thereof could hardly fail of coming to his Ears, unleſs it could be imagin'd that he who was nigh at hand was ignorant of what could not be ſuppos'd to be a Secret to thoſe afar off, nevertheleſs the ſaid Robert with daring Inſolence, in contempt of us and the See aforeſaid, and alſo of the Sentence aforeſaid, hath ſcorn'd to obſerve the ſaid Truces, and wickedly invaded the Town of Berwick, &c.

EDWARD II.

Pope's Excommunication of Robert Bruce. p. 707. p. 711.

MEAN time the Pope ſeeing that Robert deſpis'd all his Thunder-bolts, was not willing to expoſe his Authority to any further Contempt, and therefore recall'd his Legates.

IT appears from ſeveral Paſſages, that during the two Years Truce, which was at length agreed to about the end of the Year 1319, Robert ſollicited his Abſolution, of which the Pope gave Advice to Edward, by a Letter dated in September 1320 from Avignon, to this Effect. p. 848. "That he had appointed a certain time "for Robert to appear before him in Per"ſon, or by Proxy; and that not having "done either, the Pope had renew'd the "Sentence of Excommunication againſt "him, and put Scotland under an Inter"dict; but that at the Prayer of the Scots "Ambaſſadors, he had ſuſpended the Ef"fects of it."

'TIS very probable, as Buchanan poſitively aſſerts, that Robert had obtain'd the Pope's Promiſe, that the Excommunication and Interdict ſhould both be taken off; for we find by the reſt of theſe Acts, that the Pope, inſtead of acting authoritatively and imperiouſly as before, offer'd to be a Mediator between the two Kings, and p. 846. that he exhorted the King of England to p. 860. Peace.

THE laſt Act we find in this Volume relating to Scotland, is the Truce of thirteen Years, which was made the 30th of May 1323. [b] In this Treaty, the Title of King is not given to Robert; but that Prince's Ratification of it, dated the 7th of June following at Berwick upon Tweed, begins with theſe Words, Robert Bruce, &c. and ends with theſe, We Robert King of Scotland aforeſaid.

Truce of 13 Years with Scotland. p. 1022. p. 1030.

IT is plain from diverſe Paſſages, that Elizabeth, Robert Bruce's Wife, was detain'd Priſoner in England, from the beginning of Edward's Reign, 'till July 1314 at leaſt, as appears from ſeveral Orders made for removing her from one Priſon to another, 'till at laſt, in July aforeſaid, Edward caus'd her to be brought before him at York. This was done in all likelihood to restore her to her Husband, for there is no mention of her afterwards. It seems that Edward allow'd her but twenty Shillings a Week for her Maintenance. [a]

THE Countess Isabella, Wife to John Earl of Boghan, whom Edward I. had confin'd in a Cage for assisting at the Coronation of Robert Bruce, was deliver'd out of it by Edward II. and committed to the Custody of Henry de Beaumont. [b]

ARTICLE III. Affairs Ecclesiastical.

KING Edward II. had not those notable Disputes with the Court of Rome, which were the occasion of so much Disturbance in England during the Reigns of King Henry II. and King John; but there was the same Cause for a Quarrel with that Court in this Reign, as in theirs. Tho' the two Kings I have now mention'd were brought under subjection to the Popes, one may venture to say that the Kingdom of England was not, but always preserv'd its Prerogatives without ever abandoning them; and the several Accommodations that were made between the Popes of Rome and the Kings of England, were never approv'd by the Kingdom, and in Consequence the English always kept up their Pretensions: Which will not seem strange to those who know the Constitution of the English Government. It is certain that the Parliament never fail'd to defend the Rights both of the Laity and Clergy, upon all occasions that offer'd; and if they did not act always with the same Vigour, it was because the English, when they lost their King John, had the misfortune to fall into a weak and impotent Reign, under a King who was a Minor at first in Age, and always in Understanding, and who ran headlong as one may say into the Pope's Clutches, instead of making any Efforts to stop what the English look'd upon as Usurpations of the Court of Rome. The King I mean was Henry III. His Successor Edward I. having been both an Eye-Witness, and an Agent in the Troubles which had disturb'd the Reign of his Father, was afraid of renewing them, by giving a handle to the Popes to meddle with the Affairs of his Kingdom, and to support the Malecontents. It may be said therefore that the Controversies between the English and the Court of Rome, were rather hush'd than determin'd by that scandalous Accommodation which King John made with Pope Innocent; and that neither the Lords nor Commons did in the least imagine that their Rights were forfeited by the superior Force which oblig'd John to take that step, or by the Complaisance of Henry III. for the Pope, or by the Moderation of Edward I. Nor did they fail upon proper occasions to make the Court of Rome sensible that they were not in a Humour to suffer themselves to be robb'd of their Privileges, tho' in good truth the Opposition which they made to the Enterprizes of that Court from time to time, seem'd to be rather a precaution to avoid Prescription, than a formal Resistance: Which made the Popes always gain ground. EDWARD II.

THIS was the state of Affairs when Edward II. came to the Crown. The Popes undertook from time to time to confer Benefices, and even Bishopricks, contrary to the Right of Patrons and Chapters, and very seldom troubled themselves to ask the Consent of the King, who insisted nevertheless that his Approbation was necessary, before a Bishop could be put in possession of the Temporalities. The Popes cited Clergymen to their Court, in spite of the King's Prohibition, and would not suffer them to be tried by the Laity, notwithstanding all the Protestations that both the King and Parliament could make upon that Head. They frequently sent over Nuncios and Legates vested with such a prodigious share of Power, as swallow'd up all the Authority of the two Archbishops. This is not a place to examine which of the two had Right on their side, whether the Pope or the English; it being sufficient to observe here, that it was a perpetual subject of Disputes and Quarrels between England and the Court of Rome. But the Court of Rome had a great Advantage over the other, in that it acted always uniformly and consistently; whereas England being govern'd by Rulers whose Interests were sometimes different from those of the State, was always a Loser by the Cowardice, by the Complaisance, and sometimes by the private Interests of its King. This is a general View of the Subject of the Acts of this Volume, that relate to the Affairs of the Church, out of which I shall only select three Articles, upon which this Volume furnishes some Particulars. 1. The Disposal of Benefices. 2. Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction. 3. Personal Citations to the Court of Rome, or before the Pope's Delegates. Incroachments of the Court of Rome.

As to the Disposal of Benefices, this Collection abounds with Complaints made by the Kings of England upon this Article, setting forth that the Popes very often injur'd the Rights, not only of private Patrons, but of the King himſelf. The Popes on their part were no leſs perſuaded that they had an extraordinary Right to the diſpoſal of Benefices, when the Good of the Church requir'd it, of which they pretended to be the ſole Judges. And as if this had not been a Reaſon ſufficient, they did not fail to back their Pretenſion with other Pleas, which ſeem'd rather to hurt their Cauſe than ſtrengthen it.

Popes Preſentations to Benefices, in violation of the Rights of Patronage, &c.

FOR Example, They had made a Decree, that when a Biſhop happen'd to die at their Court, it was their Prerogative to diſpoſe of the vacant See. And it was upon this Foundation that Clement V. diſpos'd of the Archbiſhoprick of Armagh in Ireland. In like manner when a Biſhop reſign'd his Biſhoprick to the Pope, the latter never fail'd to fill the See vacant by ſuch Reſignation, as that very Pope did in the caſe of the Archbiſhoprick of Dublin. Sometimes the Pope reſerv'd to himſelf before-hand, the diſpoſal of a Biſhoprick when it ſhould come to be vacant. Thus Clement diſpos'd of the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury in favour of Walter Raynold Biſhop of Worceſter, tho' the Prior and Chapter had canonically elected Thomas Cobham, a Prebendary of York, whoſe Election was therefore made void. Non perſonæ dicti Thomæ vitio, ſaid the Pope, ſed utpote poſt Reformationem, & Decretum prædicta attemptatam, i. e. As to inferior Benefices, the Popes never wanted a Pretext to confer them, and often produc'd no other Reaſon for it, but their own Will and Pleaſure; which rais'd a great Clamour among the Patrons who had the Right of Preſentation. Beſides the Pretences juſt mentioned, that of the Vacancy of the See on which the vacant Benefices depended, was one of the chief; and foraſmuch as the See was look'd upon to be vacant 'till the Pope had confirm'd the Perſon elected, there was often a great Interval of Time between the Death of a Biſhop, and the Confirmation of his Succeſſor, which gave the Pope an opportunity to confer the Benefices that happen'd to become vacant in ſuch Biſhoprick, on whom he thought fit.

Benefices given by the Popes to Aliens.

BUT what moſt of all provok'd the Engliſh was, to ſee that very often the Pope gratify'd Foreigners * with thoſe Benefices, ſometimes Cardinals, or others who ſuck'd the Revenues thereof without exerciſing the Functions, and who moreover perpetually plagu'd thoſe who had a Dependance upon them, by the Credit which they had with the Pope, and by Citations and Appeals to his Court. For Example, the Deanery of St. Paul's in London, was conferr'd by the Pope upon the Cardinal de St. Marcel, Archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, tho' it is a Benefice which abſolutely requir'd Reſidence. a

* BY an Inquiſition taken of this matter in 1253, it appear'd that the Eccleſiaſtical Revenues in England, enjoy'd by Aliens, of whom many were Boys, and more Dunces, amounted to no leſs than 70,000 Marks a Year, which was then reckon'd a greater Revenue than that of the King; which occaſion'd the ſharp Letter of Robert Groſthead to the Pope, and the Pope's diſdainful Reception of it, related at large by Matt. Paris.

AT a Parliament held Anno 1379, (Rot. Parl. Ang. 3 Rich. II.) great Complaint was made of Foreigners holding Eccleſiaſtical Benefices; many Cardinals at Rome having the beſt Promotions and Livings conferred on them, or granted to hold in Commendam, of which there are Catalogues yet extant. (Acts and Monum. Tom. 1. f. 589.) And from hence many Miſchiefs aroſe; as little or no Divine Service, or Inſtruction of the People: No Hoſpitality kept for relief of the Poor: Decay of Houſes, and Increaſe of Barbariſm; ſo that between the Italian Hoſpitality, which none could ever ſee, and a little Latin Service, which few, or none could underſtand, the poor Engliſh were ill fed, but worſe taught: And laſtly, the exhauſting the Wealth of the Land, to the impoveriſhing of the People, and weakning of the King and Kingdom, in caſe of Invaſion or any Attempts againſt them.

'TIS memorable alſo, that in the Reigns of Henry VII. and VIII. the Biſhoprick of Worceſter had four Italians ſucceſſively that never liv'd there, whoſe Names we find in Godwin de Præſulibus Angliæ. And ſuch prevalence had the Popes and Cardinals in this matter, that once King Edward I. having promis'd the Cardinal Biſhop of Sabina, at his Inſtance, to preſent one Nivianus an Italian, his Chamberlain, to a Benefice in Lincolnſhire, then in his Gift by the Death of another Italian, the Pope's Chaplain, and forgetting his Promiſe, preſented his own Clerk to it; but being reminded of his Promiſe, he revok'd his firſt Preſentation in favour of Nivianus, as appears by his Patent for that Purpoſe, ſtill preſerv'd among our Records (Pat. 25. E. I. m. 16. De Præſentatione pro M. Antonio de Nivians.) Matt. Paris An. 1240, f. 540, ſays, that while Rubeus and Ruffinus, two of the Pope's Factors, were buſy in England, collecting Money for the Pope, one Mumelinus comes from Rome with 24 Italians, and Orders to admit them to ſo many of the beſt Benefices as ſhould next become void; and that in the ſame Year, the Pope made an agreement with the People of Rome, that if they would effectually aid him againſt the Emperor Frederick, their Children ſhould be put into all the vacant Benefices in England: And thereupon Orders were ſent to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhops of Lincoln and Salisbury, to make Proviſion for three hundred Romans Children, to be ſerv'd of the next Benefices that ſhould fall; which, ſays the Hiſtorian, ſo aſtoniſh'd all that heard it, that it was fear'd they would have been drown'd in the Abyſs of Deſpair. And this made ſuch an Impreſſion on the Archbiſhop, being a tender-hearted Man, to ſee the Church in that manner wounded, and ſo much Evil in his Days, that he diſpos'd of his Affairs, and retir'd into France, where bewailing the deplorable ſtate of his Country, he died not long after of Grief at Pontiniac. See Godwin in this Archbiſhop's Life.

p. 134. a As appears by ſeveral Reaſons mention'd in a Letter here from King Edward to the ſaid Cardinal, dated at Weſtminſter May 12, 1309. perſuading him to relinquiſh it.

FOEDERA Tom. III.

IT had been no great matter if the Pope had only diſpos'd of ſome Benefices from time to time contrary to the Right of the Patrons; but this was not enough, he ſometimes challeng'd the Diſpoſal of all; of which we have two Examples in this Volume. The firſt is of Clement V. who gave the vacant Benefices in the Province of York to Cardinal Ademar, who had the Title of St. Anaſtaſius, on pretence of enabling him to ſupport his Dignity: And not long after, he likewiſe gave him all thoſe that became vacant in the Province of Canterbury: And becauſe the King had conferr'd two Prebends out of the number of thoſe Benefices ſo given by the Pope, and becauſe the Cardinal had been ſummon'd to Parliament, Pope Clement * wrote a very ſharp Letter to the King in November 1311, from Avignon, wherein he
p. 284. calls the two Incumbents Sons of Perdition; and complains that it was a palpable Affront to GOD to hinder the ſaid Cardinal from enjoying their Revenues.

POPE John XXII. † went farther ſtill; it was not enough for him to diſpoſe of Benefices when vacant, but he aim'd at the diſpoſal of thoſe that were not vacant by revoking all the Diſpenſations granted by his Predeceſſors for holding a plurality of Benefices, and reſerving to the Holy See the Diſpoſal of ſuch as ſhould become vacant by ſuch Revocation. Upon this, King Edward a wrote ſo ſharply to the Pope, that 'tis very probable the Pope let the Affair drop; at leaſt we find no more of it in this Collection.

IT would be too tedious in ſuch an Extract to ſet down all the Examples which this Third Tome of the Fœdera is capable of furniſhing upon the preſent Head; yet I muſt not forget to obſerve that the Pope never conferr'd a Biſhoprick under any of thoſe Pretexts I have mention'd, but the King oppos'd him vigorouſly to outward appearance, tho' I don't know one ſingle Inſtance of his carrying his Point: So that after having made a great Outcry, and wrote Letters upon Letters to the Pope, or to the Biſhop nominated, he was forced at laſt to truckle to the Pope's Authority. The whole Collection ſwarms with Complaints of this nature. It was Edward II. if I am not miſtaken, who, when he could not longer refuſe admiſſion to a Biſhop preſented by the Pope, was the firſt that hit upon the Expedient of obliging the Pope's Nominee to ſign an Act before a Notary Public, by which he renounc'd the Clauſe in the Bull that aſſign'd the Biſhoprick to him, and own'd that he held the ſame meerly of the King's Favour. Of this we have many Inſtances in the preſent Tome, in the Caſe of the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, Dublin, Armagh, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter. But the Pope, who would not ſeem to know any thing of theſe Renunciations, ſtill continued to put the Clauſe in his Bulls.

EDWARD II.

p. 465, 273, 13, and 827.

THE ſecond Article which relates to Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, may be conſider'd with reſpect to the inferior Clergy, and with regard to Biſhops. As to the inferior Clergy, it does not appear that Rome acted with ſo much Vigour to maintain the Juriſdiction of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, as the Magiſtrates of England did to ſupport the Rights of the Kingdom. The reaſon of it was, becauſe that on thoſe Occaſions, the Pope had to do with the Officers of Juſtice, who could not excuſe themſelves from executing the Laws of the Realm made in Parliament, without running a riſque of being puniſh'd for their Negligence; whereas in the Caſe of Biſhops, the Pope had only to deal with the King, who was not under thoſe Reſtraints of Fear. And we find that the Court of Rome was never backward to hinder Biſhops from being proſecuted in the Temporal Courts. Of this we have ſome remarkable Inſtances in the preſent Reign, in the Caſe of the Scots Biſhops of Glaſgow and St. Andrews, who being taken in Arms by Edward I. were detain'd in Priſon till Edward II. after having ſtood out againſt the Pope's Remonſtrances a long time, was oblig'd to ſet them at liberty. The ſame thing happen'd in the Affair of the Biſhop of Litchfield, High Treaſurer in the Reign of Edward I. whom Edward II. had impriſon'd for Miſdemeanor; which tho' it was a Crime within the cogniſance of the Temporal Court, yet Clement V. pretended that the ſaid Biſhop could not be detain'd in the King's Priſons, by reaſon of his Character, and at laſt obliged Edward to releaſe him.

Views, chose to obey the Command of the Pope, rather than the Laws of the Realm. This prov'd to be a Bone of perpetual Contention betwixt the two Courts: And in this Tome we find a great many Letters from the King to the Pope upon this Subject, with Orders to the Archbishops not to admit of such Citations. Nos volentes, says Edward in a Letter [a] to the Archbishops, &c. hujusmodi dispendio & præjudicio, remedio quo poterimus obviare, & omnes jura coronæ nostræ impugnantium conatus illicitos refrænare, vobis omnibus & singulis mandamus, firmiter injugendo, ne prætextu alicujus Commissionis, aut Mandati vobis, aut alicui vestrum, per quemcumque facti, vel fiendi, quicquam in hac parte, per citationes, vel inductiones, aut alio quovis modo, nobis inconsultis, facere præsumatis: i. e. We find also that the Parliament which was held at Stamford in August 1309, order'd a vigorous Letter to be written to the Pope, to complain of these Grievances.

Parliament's Letter to the Pope. p. 159.

'Tis plain that the Court of Rome paid little or no Regard to all the King was able to say or write. This Prince, who thought he stood in need of the Pope, did not reckon it good Policy to push things too far; of which that Court was very sensible, and made an Advantage: But whenever the Parliament interfer'd, they were more upon the reserve, and paid greater Respect to that Body than to the King. Therefore Edward, who perceiv'd the Difference, often rely'd much upon the Credit of the Parliament, that his Instances might have the greater Weight and Effect; of which we have diverse Instances in this Collection of Records. Edward writing to a certain Cardinal [b], tells him, Quod si nos nollemus facere, illas defenderet Communitas Regni nostri, ut jus nostrum hæreditarium ac nostra Regiæ dignitatis: i. e. Which if we refus'd to do, the Commons of our Realm would defend them, as our Hereditary Right and Royal Dignity. And upon another Occasion, the King writing to the Pope himself [c], says, Advertentes, si placet, quod, etsi dicti Clerici nostri à Jure, sibi in hac parte quæsito, seu Prosecutione ejusdem desistere vellent, nihilominus jus nostrum prædictum, in personis aliorum (vinculo juramenti prædicti Nos artante, & Magnatum Regni nostri Consilio perurgente, qui, etiam nobis dissimulantibus, toto Nisu contradicerent) prosequi cogeremur: i. e. Considering, with submission, that altho' our said Clergy were inclin'd to depart from their Right in this Cause, or to desist from the Prosecution of it, yet should we be compell'd to prosecute our Right aforesaid in the Persons of others; not only inasmuch as we are bound by our Oath aforesaid, but as we are strenuously urg'd to it by the Advice of our Nobles; who, were we even to dissemble, would do their utmost to oppose it.

EDWARD II.

As the English on the one hand complain'd of the Court of Rome, the latter on the other hand complain'd no less of the English Magistrates. We have a Letter from the Pope in November 1309, to the Bishop of Worcester, which enumerates all the Complaints of the Holy See against the King's Officers, or rather against the Laws of England, which ran counter to their Pretensions; but forasmuch as the Articles they relate to are for the most part those which I have already glanc'd over, it is not material to insist upon them here; and therefore I dismiss them with this one Observation, that what the Pope was pleas'd to call the Privileges and Immunities of the Church, the English call'd the Enterprizes and Usurpations of the Court of Rome.

p. 187.

A MORE effectual Stand might have been made against the Pope, perhaps in this Reign, if the King had seconded his Parliament; but private Interests sometimes oblig'd this Prince not only to submit to the Pope's Pretensions, but also to corroborate them, by prompting him to exert his absolute Power. This he did in one particular Case, among many others, during the vacancy of the See of Hereford. The King had a mighty mind to place Thomas Charlton in that See, but being afraid that the Chapter would not elect him, he [d] desir'd the Pope to reserve to himself the Disposal of that Bishoprick by the Fulness of his Apostolical Power; and having obtain'd his Request without much Difficulty, he recommended Charlton to him. But hearing soon after that the Pope had a Design to gratify Adam Orleton with the said Bishoprick, he desired him [e] not to place his Thoughts upon a Person so disagreeable to him; and assur'd Orleton [f], that he would never suffer him to be placed in that See: But his Instances were of no Effect; for the Pope conferr'd the

THOSE who are ever ſo little acquainted with the Hiſtory of this Century, know that the Period of Time, during which the Popes kept their Court at Avignon, was not the moſt honourable for the Holy See. There is a Proof of the irregular Steps which the Court of Rome took at that time, in a Letter from Edward II. dated at Weſtminſter, November 22, 1317, and directed to the Cardinal St. Cyriacus, which ſets forth, that when Clement V. conferr'd the Abbey of Weſtminſter upon an Abbot nam'd Richard, he exacted a Promiſe from him of Six thouſand Florins for himſelf, and another of Two thouſand for the Cardinals.

Diſpute between the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, about carrying the Croſs.

THE Difference between the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, about carrying the Croſs, ſtill ſubſiſted. The former pretended to the Right of having the Croſs carried before him in the Province of York, but refuſed the ſame Privilege to the Archbiſhop of York, who had the ſame Pretenſion in the Province of Canterbury. This Quarrel was carried to ſuch a height, that when both thoſe Prelates happen'd to be in one and the ſame Province, which was always the Caſe as often as the Parliament met, they were each attended by Guards. The King deſires the Pope to make a Regulation for healing this Difference [h].

ARTICLE IV.

Of the Knights Templars.

Hiſtory of the Knights Templars.

THE Order of Templars was inſtituted in 1118, for Defence of the holy Places in Jeruſalem. Their firſt Houſe being ſituate near the Temple of our Lord, gave Occaſion to their Name; and all the Houſes which they liv'd in afterwards were call'd Temples. This Order was confirm'd in the Council of Troyes in 1127, according to Rules given by St. Bernard. The Friars, or Brethren of this Order, were divided into two Claſſes, one of Knights, and the other of Servitors.

AFTER Saladine had conquer'd the Kingdom of Jeruſalem from the Chriſtians, this Order diſpers'd it ſelf into moſt parts of Europe, where it became very potent, and acquir'd vaſt Riches *, thro' the Liberality of the People, and the Bounty of Sovereign Princes, who had a high Eſteem for the Virtues which were practis'd by theſe Friars; but Riches made them as proud as they were before humble, and alter'd that exemplary Life of Piety which they led at firſt, to one that was execrably vicious; which render'd them odious.

THE Author of their Ruin was Philip the Fair, King of France, to be reveng'd for a Tumult which ſome of them had rais'd in Paris. He had a Conference for this end with Pope Clement V. at Poictiers, where the entire Deſtruction of the whole Order was reſolv'd on. Some profligate Fellows, who were themſelves Members of that Body, whether they did it of their own accord, or whether they were brib'd to it by the French King, charg'd the whole Order with the groſſeſt Crimes: Whereupon Philip caus'd all of them who were in his Dominions to be apprehended, and Fifty-ſeven of them to be burnt; but thinking this Revenge not ſevere enough, he proceeded to aboliſh the Order; and the Pope, who had engag'd himſelf to favour the Deſign, call'd a General Council at Vienna, in which the ſaid Order was laid under an Interdict.

FORASMUCH as England was not a little affected by the Proceedings againſt the Knights Templars, becauſe of the great Eſtates they poſſeſs'd in that Kingdom, we find a great number of Acts upon the Subject in this Collection, the chief of which we will juſt run over.

THE firſt Piece is an Anſwer from Edward [k] to Philip the Fair, wherein he tells him, that he can ſcarce give credit to that part of his Letter relating to the abominable Hereſy ſpread in Guyenne; but that he has order'd the Seneſchal of Agen to inform himſelf of that Affair more particularly. Altho' the Templars are not ſo much as mention'd in this Letter, yet 'tis probable they were the Perſons intended.

p. 18.

Pope's Letter to Edward about the Knights Templars, p. 30.

AFTER this, we have a Brief from Pope Clement to King Edward [l], in which he ſet forth, That upon Information given to the King of France, that the Templars, at their Entrance into that Order, deny'd Jeſus Chriſt, ſpit at a Crucifix, worſhipp'd an Idol in their Chapters, and committed other enormous Crimes, as the Grand Maſter himſelf had confeſs'd; the ſaid Prince had in one Day caus'd all thoſe in his Dominions to be apprehended, and all their Eſtates to be confiſcated, in order to apply the ſame to the Service of the Holy War, if those Crimes were prov'd. He adds, that upon these Informations, of which Philip had given him an Account, he had himself examin'd one of the Knights magnæ generositatis & auctoritatis Virum, a Man of great Generosity and Authority, who confess'd that he himself had deny'd Christ, as aforesaid, and that he had seen it done by another in the Isle of Cyprus, at the Command of the Grand Master, in presence of above two hundred Brothers of the Order, of whom a hundred were Knights: And the Pope concludes with exhorting King Edward to follow the Example of the King of France.

King's Letters on the same Subject, p. 35.

There's a Letter from King Edward[m] to the Kings of Castille, Arragon, Portugal, and Sicily, importing that a certain Clergyman came to him, who accus'd the Knights Templars of the most horrid Crimes, but that he could not give Credit to it; and therefore he exhorts them to suspend their Judgment, if such an Accusation came before them. And he sent another Letter to the Pope on the same Subject[n], to vindicate the Templars, who, says he, bear a good Reputation in England. And there's an Order placed in the Fœdera, before those two Letters, enjoining all the Sheriffs to arrest all the Templars in the Kingdom upon the Feast of Epiphany, in 1308; which Order has no Date to it[o].

Their Persons and Estates seiz'd.

In pursuance of this Order, all the Templars in England were apprehended upon that Day, and their Possessions seiz'd by the King.

Pope's Bull about 'em, p. 101.

After this came a Bull from the Pope, dated at Poictiers in August 1308, and directed to the Archbishop of Canterbury and his Suffragans, to let them know what had been done with respect to the Templars: He there repeats almost the very same Facts which he had mention'd to the King, with this Addition only, that he had caus'd seventy-two Knights, and other Brethren of the Order, to be examin'd by the Cardinals; who, after very strict Interrogatories, had reported to him, that the Persons accus'd had own'd the Crimes with which they were charg'd, viz. the denying of Jesus Christ, and the spitting at the Crucifix; and that some of them had confess'd Crimes which he was asham'd to mention. Then he tells them, that he has appointed a Committee of three Cardinals, four English Bishops, and certain Clergymen of France, to draw up the Informations, and to manage the whole Process that was to be carried on in England against the Templars.

When these Commissioners were arriv'd, the King expresly order'd the English Bishops of the Committee to attend every Day at all the Proceedings, as appears by an Order he sent to the Bishop of Lincoln[p], for fear no doubt of some Knavery on the part of the Italians and French.

Edward II. p. 162.

'Tis moreover remarkable, that in all the Orders which this King granted to facilitate those Informations, we always meet with this Clause, ob reverentiam sedis Apostolicæ, out of respect to the Apostolic See. Perhaps, as this Process was managed in the name of the Pope, the King was afraid lest it might be brought into a Precedent.

When this Examination was finish'd, a National Council was assembled at London, wherein the Knights Templars were condemn'd; but they were not treated with the same Severity as in France, for they were only confin'd to Monasteries instead of the common Prisons, and had small Pensions paid 'em for their Subsistence.

And the Council at Vienne.

The General Council at Vienne, which was summon'd partly for the Condemnation of the Templars, met in the Year 1311; but their Sentence was not publish'd 'till the second Session, which was held in May 1312. It is the common Opinion, that it was the Council which condemn'd them; but I think it safer to follow the Opinion of those Historians, who seem to know more of the matter, and have asserted that the Council did not think it just to abolish a whole Order for the Crimes of some of its Members, especially considering the Templars had been neither convicted, nor so much as summon'd before the Council. These same Historians add, that the Fathers of the Council being intimidated by the Presence of the Pope, who presided in Person, and of the King of France, who came to the second Session, did not dare to oppose the Bull of Condemnation, when read in their Presence. It is true, that in a following Bull from the Pope, in this Collection, dated from Vienne in May 1312, Clement affirms that the Council approv'd of what had been done in that Affair: But it appears likewise in the very same Bull, that because the Proceedings against the Templars had not been altogether according to the Forms of the Law, he could not entirely abolish that Order, and that all he could do, was to interdict it for ever. These are his Words, Ejusdemque Ordinis statum, habitum atque nomen —— Sacro approbante Concilio, NON PER MODUM DIFFINITIVÆ SENTENTIÆ, cum eam super hoc secundum inquisitiones, & proceſſus, ſuper his habitos, NON POSSEMUS FERRE DE JURE; SED PER VIAM PROVISIONIS, SEU ORDINATIONIS APOSTOLICÆ, irrefragabili, & perpetuâ valiturâ juſtulimus ſanctione; ipſum prohibitioni perpetuæ ſupponentes. Univerſa etiam bona Ordinis prælibati, Apoſtolicæ ſedis ordinationi & diſpoſitioni, auctoritate Apoſtolicâ duximus reſervanda: i. e. We have by a Sanction irrefragable, which will for ever have Force, taken away the State, Habit, and Name of the ſaid Order, with the Approbation of the Sacred Council, not by means of a definitive Sentence, ſince according to the Examinations taken, and Proceſs made againſt them, we could not paſs ſuch Sentence in Law, but by way of Apoſtolical Precaution or Ordination; ſubjecting the ſame under a perpetual Interdict. Alſo we have thought it fitting that all the Eſtates of the ſaid Order be reſerv'd by Apoſtolical Authority, to the ordering and diſpoſal of the Apoſtolical See.

IT appears from hence, that tho' the Pope rely'd upon the Authority of the Council, yet he acted in his own Name, by virtue of his Apoſtolical Authority. And we may venture to ſay, that the Approbation of the Council mention'd by the Pope, ſeems very conſiſtent with the Explication we have of it from the Hiſtorians; for it is not at all likely that Perſons choſe for Judges, in an Affair of ſuch Conſequence, ſhould approve of a Sentence which they themſelves did not dare to pronounce. Beſides, it's very probable, that ſince the Pope had aſſembled that Council, principally for the Condemnation of the Templars, he would gladly have left that Work to the Council, if he had found that Diſpoſition in it which he wiſhed for.

IN the ſame Bull that I have juſt now quoted, the Pope declar'd, that after having reſerv'd the Diſpoſal of the Templars Eſtates to the Holy See, he had for a long time conſulted with the Cardinals, Patriarchs, Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Prelates, and others who were at the Council aforeſaid; and that at length he had thought fit to aſſign thoſe Eſtates to the Order of St. John of Jeruſalem, by the Fulneſs of his Apoſtolical Power. Nevertheleſs he excepted the Eſtates which were ſituate in Caſtille, Arragon, Portugal, and the Iſle of Majorca, ſtill reſerving the future diſpoſal thereof to himſelf. Obſerve by the way, that he does not ſay it was a Reſolution of the Council it ſelf, but only that he had taken the Advice of thoſe who were preſent at it. He added the Pains of Excommunication againſt all who detain'd the ſaid Eſtates, and refus'd to deliver them to the Order of St. John, within a Month after the firſt Call.

THIS Bull was follow'd in the next Month by a Letter to King Edward, exhorting him to ſubmit to the ſaid Diſpoſition, and enjoining all the Earls and Barons of the Kingdom to deliver up the Templars Eſtates, which were in their poſſeſſion, to the Knights of St. John. EDWARD II. P. 326.

WHEN Edward had contributed ſo readily to the Ruin of the Templars, he hoped to come in for his Share of their Spoil, and had already began to diſpoſe of it; ſo that he was not a little ſurpriz'd when he heard that he ſhould be compell'd to quit his Hold. The Pope's Letter ariv'd at a time when that Prince was more than ordinarily embarraſs'd by domeſtic Quarrels; that is to ſay, very ſoon after the Death of Gaveſton: yet he maintain'd himſelf in the poſſeſſion of thoſe Eſtates 'till the end of the Year 1313: But at laſt, the Prior of the Order of St. John in England, being furniſh'd with a Letter of Attorney from the Grand Maſter, having preſented a Petition to him upon this Subject, he did not dare to ſtand it out any longer, and granted him the Replevy of the Templars Eſtates that were in his Power. Mean time being perſuaded that great Injuſtice was done him, he made a Proteſtation before a Notary, in December 1313, in which he declar'd, that the only Reaſon of his diſpoſſeſſing himſelf of thoſe Eſtates, was the Fear of the Danger to which he ſhould expoſe himſelf if he refus'd it; conſidering the ſhort ſpace of Time which the Bull gave him, according to a Clauſe the Prior had taken care to inſert in his Petition. But he proteſted, that this ſhould not be any Prejudice either to his own Rights, or thoſe of his Subjects, which he reſerv'd to himſelf, to make the beſt of in due time. p 451.

THE Engliſh, who had receiv'd ſome part of thoſe Eſtates from the King's Bounty, or who perhaps had purchas'd them, were very loth to obey; and we find ſome of them ſo long poſſeſs'd of thoſe Eſtates, as 'till the Year 1322, which was the Occaſion of a very ſevere Complaint made to King Edward that very Year by Pope John XXII[q]. p. 956.

THOSE People thought themſelves upon ſure Ground, becauſe the Parliament had not given their Conſent to the King's Grant of the ſaid Eſtates, which according to the Laws of the Realm, ought to have been confiſcated to the Crown, and not to the Pope, or in favour of the Order of St. John. It ſeems alſo that the Knights of this Order were afraid, that ſooner or later the Parliament would bring this Queſtion upon the Stage; and therefore they preſs'd the Pope not to let the King reſt 'till he had obtain'd his Parliament's Conſent to what had been done. And we find in the next Tome, that in the Year 1324, Edward wrote a Letter to the Pope dated at Weſtminſter the firſt of April, ſignifying that the Affair had been mov'd in Parliament, and that he hop'd that the Order of St. John would remain in poſſeſſion of the Templars Eſtates *.

THUS you have what is moſt remarkable in this third Tome of the Fœdera, relating to the four general Articles, under which I endeavour'd to range the principal Affairs. There is a vaſt number of other Pieces upon Subjects that have no relation to theſe four Articles, to give an account of which would exceed our Bounds; and therefore I ſhall only mention two or three of them.

German Notaries put down.

IT is remarkable that German Notaries were made uſe of in England, 'till the time of Edward II. which ſeems very odd; becauſe after the Reign of Honorius, none of the Emperors ever had any Juriſdiction in this Kingdom. But this King made an Order in Council at Weſtminſter, April 26, 1320, for ſuppreſſing all thoſe German Notaries, and forbidding any Regard to be had to the Deeds or Inſtruments which they ſhould paſs for the future.

p. 829.

Marry'd Clergy turn Wine-Merchants.

WE find alſo that in 1317, there were marry'd Clergy in Guyenne; which is prov'd by an Order of Edward II. [a] to the Conſtable of Bourdeaux, to make them pay the Cuſtoms for Wine, notwithſtanding their Privileges, which they had abus'd by ſelling of other People's Wine in their own Names, to cheat the King of his Duty.

p. 666.

IT may perhaps be thought ſtrange that the Count of Savoy was once a Vaſſal to the King of England, and that he ſhould pay him Homage for ſome Lands in Chablais, as we find in an Act dated by this King at Woodſtock, June 24, 1318. But it muſt be obſerv'd, that it was a very common Cuſtom in that, and the preceding Centuries, for petty Princes to receive certain Penſions from the great ones, for which they bound themſelves to pay Homage; and that very often, in order that they might have a Foundation for thoſe Penſions, they mortgag'd ſome part of their Dominions, and paid Homage for them as long as the Penſions were continu'd. Which is evident from ſeveral Places in the three firſt Tomes of the Fœdera, and alſo in the fourth.

p. 715.

IT appears that Edward I. was not very punctual in paying the Pope the anntial Tribute of 1000 Marks, which was eſtabliſh'd by King John, becauſe Clement V. demanded of his Son fifteen Years Arrears [b]. We have the Pope's Acquittance for the ſaid Tribute for the Year 1317 [c], and another for the Year 1318: But the reſt remain'd in Arrears, for we find in the next Tome that the Pope demanded thirty Years Arrears of Edward III.

EDWARD II. p. 187, 632.

WE come now to the IVth Tome of the Fœdera, which begins with the four laſt Years of the Reign of Edward II.

Hiſtory of the Spenſers.

THE Death of the Earl of Lancaſter, and the Severities exercis'd towards all his Adherents, of whom ſome were executed, others baniſh'd, and a great many depriv'd of their Eſtates, ſeem'd to have put the Spenſers in a fair way of enjoying their Fortune peaceably, without fear of any body's preſuming hereafter to oppoſe their Power. They wanted nothing now to make themſelves perfectly eaſy, but to get ſome People out of the way, whom they look'd upon as private Enemies; and among theſe the Biſhop of Hereford, and young Mortimer, who was actually a Priſoner in the Tower. Theſe were nevertheleſs ſtill ſo formidable to the Spenſers, that when they had contriv'd to ruin them, tho' their Credit was ſo great, they met with ſuch oppoſition as they did not expect. The Biſhop, whom they had charg'd with High Treaſon, was wreſted from the King's Judges with a ſort of Violence, by the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and Dublin, on pretence that a Lay-Court had no Power to judge him. This Action ſtopp'd ſome Proſecutions that were actually begun, and ſome that were intended againſt other Biſhops who were in the ſame Circumſtances; and the Affair was brought before the Parliament.

Biſhop of Hereford and Mortimer.

MORTIMER indeed was more eaſy to be come at, becauſe he had no Character to ſcreen him; and therefore he was try'd, and condemn'd to Death, but the King chang'd that Sentence into perpetual Impriſonment. Not long after, this very Mortimer, tho' a cloſe Priſoner, laid a Plot to ſeize the Tower, and the Caſtles of Windſor and Wallingford: But his Conſpiracy being diſcovered, he had the ſame Sentence paſs'd upon him again, and the King was ſo gracious as to give him his Life once more. If it be conſider'd that this Man had for his Enemies the two Spenſers, to whom (as was before obſerv'd) he had done as much Damage as amounted to 60,000 l. Sterling, it will not be diſputed that he had a very powerful Pro-

* THE Curious who would know more of the original Rule and Nature of both theſe Orders, may conſult Dugdale of Warwickſhire, Henry de Knighton's Collection, Thomas Walſingham's Hiſtory, and Stow's Survey. As for the Hoſpitallers, or Knights of St. John of Jeruſalem, we ſhall find hereafter that King Henry VIII. diſſolv'd them and ſeiz'd their Lands; that Queen Mary replac'd them in their ſhatter'd Manſion at Clerkenwell; and that Sir Thomas Treſham, who was made Prior of the Order, was call'd up by Writ to the Houſe of Lords as a Baron; but that they were finally diſſolv'd by Queen Elizabeth. 'Tis ſaid that the Temple at London was anciently the chief Houſe of the Knights of this Order in England, and by them demiſed to ſome Students of the Law who came from Thavies Inn, for the yearly Rent of 10 l. about the middle of the Reign of Edward III. and that the Lawyers held as Tenants to the ſaid Hoſpitallers 'till their Diſſolution by Henry VIII.

tection, since it was able to counterbalance the Interest of two such Favourites. This gives room to conjecture, that it was the Queen (Isabella of France) who rescued him from the Revenge of those two potent Enemies. And what fortifies the Conjecture, is the Passion which the Queen discover'd for him afterwards; from whence it may be inferr'd, that their good Understanding commenc'd before Mortimer was committed to the Tower. To this it may be added, that it was much about the same time that the Spensers began to mortify the Queen, by abridging her of part of the Money that was assign'd her for her Maintenance; which made her complain to her Brother, Charles the Fair, that she was treated like a Servant-Maid. As it does not appear that the Spensers had any other Reason to complain of this Princess, it is very probable the Vexation they gave her was only to be reveng'd for the Protection which she had granted their Enemy: But it was a Revenge that cost them very dear, and involv'd the King himself in their Destruction. Mortimer had not only the good Luck to escape the Doom that was awarded for him, but he soon after found Means to convey himself out of the Tower, and fled for refuge to France, notwithstanding all the Diligence that was us'd to retake him. These few Particulars were necessary, just to shew the Man who afterwards acted so considerable a Part on the Theatre of England. It is Time now to give the Substance of the Events of the four last Years of the Reign of Edward II. which concluded with his being deposed. Some Differences that happen'd betwixt France and England, touching Guyenne, furnish'd a Pretence for the late Troubles in England; but the Queen's Hatred of the Spensers, I will be bold to say, her Passion for Mortimer, and the Thirst after Revenge in those whom the Spensers had persecuted, were the real Causes; which must be a little explain'd, for the better understanding of the Acts contain'd in the Beginning of this 4th Tome.

Breach betwixt the French and English in Guyenne.

After the Treaty of Montreuil, between Edward I. and Philip the Fair, France and England had a very good Understanding together, 'till about the Beginning of the Reign of Charles the Fair, when an Accident happen'd, which, tho' inconsiderable in itself, made a Breach in the Union of the two Crowns. At a Town in Agenois, call'd St. Sardos, some Outrage was committed (what it was the Fœdera does not explain) and King Edward's Officers neglecting to bring the Offenders to strict Justice, the Persons aggrieved appealed for it to the King of France, as sovereign Lord of Guyenne. Upon the said Appeal Charles issued an Arret, condemning some Gentlemen of Gascoigne, who were Edward's Subjects, to Banishment, and confiscating their Estates to the Crown of France, particularly the Castle of Montpezat, on which the Town of St. Sardos depended. To prevent the Execution of this Arret, those who commanded in Guyenne for King Edward, put a Garrison in that Castle; which oblig'd the King of France, who was resolv'd to go thorough stitch, to raise Troops in Perigord, and other neighbouring Places, in order to besiege Montpezat. At the same time he sent a Summons to Edward, to come and pay him Homage for Guyenne, and the County of Ponthieu. This was a very unlucky Business for the King of England, or rather for the Spensers, who could not endure to hear of a War, because the whole Kingdom was full of Malecontents. They resolv'd therefore to send Ambassadors into France, to endeavour to put an End to this Difference by way of Negotiation; but the Ambassadors were not heard. Charles being resolv'd to strike while the Iron was hot, sent his Uncle, the Count de Valois, to command his Army in Guyenne, where he made himself Master of the District of Agenois, and some other Counties. Charles not content with these Advantages, threaten'd England it self with an Invasion; which gave the Spensers a Pretext for depriving the Queen of the County of Cornwal, of which she was in possession: As if they had thought that County ran too great a Risque, by lying in her Hands. It would be too tedious here to give the Particulars of all the Negotiations upon this Subject; of the Projects that were contriv'd, but ill executed, to relieve Guyenne; and of the little Resistance that was made by the Earl of Kent, the King's Brother, who was sent into that Country, to oppose the Progress of the Count de Valois: It will be sufficient to observe, that Edward finding himself in no condition to carry on the War, was resolv'd, cost what it would, to put an End to the Difference by a Treaty. Therefore he dispatch'd the Bishop of Norwich, and the Earl of Richmond, into France, with the necessary full Powers, to make what Concessions soever they thought fit, with respect to the Difference in question. After King Charles had drill'd them on for some time, he signify'd to them by the Pope's Nuncios, That if the King of England would send his Queen to Paris, it was not to be doubted but she would obtain favourable Terms from the King her Brother. Edward accepted of the Proposal, and sent his Queen over to France, where she concluded a Treaty, importing in substance, That all Guyenne should be deliver'd up to the King of France; but that if Edward ward would come to Beauvais, and there do him Homage, then Charles, out of love to his Sister, would reſtore that Province to the King of England, except the Diſtrict of Agenois, and other late Conqueſts in that Country; as to which, Edward might form his Demands in the Court of Peers. Edward ratify'd this Treaty, and made Preparation to go and pay his Homage: But before the Time ſtipulated by the Treaty was come, an Expedient was agreed on to excuſe him from that ungrateful Drudgery; which was, that he ſhould give up Guyenne, and the County of Ponthieu, to Prince Edward his Son, who was then thirteen Years of Age; and that Charles ſhould receive the Son's Homage, and reſtore him thoſe two Provinces, on the payment of 60,000 Livres Tournois.

EDWARD, without any Heſitation, clos'd with an Expedient which ſuited well with his Inclination, and yielded thoſe Lands to his Son, who ſet out immediately to pay his Homage for them. That was the fatal Term or Period of that ſhort Calm which Edward enjoy'd, after he had ſubdued the Barons. As ſoon as the young Prince was got to Paris, the Queen his Mother, who, in all probability, had manag'd the whole Intrigue, that ſhe might have him under her own Wing, began almoſt openly to take Meaſures for putting the Deſigns ſhe had before concerted, in execution. She held ſecret Councils, to which ſhe admitted none but Mortimer, and the other Engliſh Exiles, who had conſtant Acceſs to her; while the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Exeter, who were Edward's Ambaſſadors, were excluded. At this time, ſo great were her Familiarities with Mortimer, and ſo little her Caution to conceal the Paſſion ſhe had for a Man whom ſhe ought to have baniſh'd from her Preſence, as an Enemy to the King her Husband, that ſhe gave the whole Court of France, and eſpecially Edward's Servants, Reaſon to ſuſpect that not only ſome dangerous Conſpiracy, but ſomething yet more criminal, was carry'd on under the Cloak of their ſecret Conferences. The Biſhop of Exeter could not but be ſcandaliz'd to ſee it. He thought it was his Duty to inform the King his Maſter of it, as well as of the Suſpicions he had that ſome Miſchief was hatching againſt him; which it was eaſy to conjecture from the ſecret Conferences which the Queen held with his Exiles: And for this purpoſe he ſtole away from Paris, without taking his leave, in order to inform the King of all Paſſages. Edward had already begun to think it ſtrange, that the Queen ſhould make ſo many frivolous Pretexts to delay her Return, after he had wrote to her ſeveral times to come back, and bring her Son with her. And the Information he receiv'd from the Biſhop of Exeter oblig'd him to repeat his Orders, which were no better obey'd. At length, when Iſabella could form no more Excuſes upon the ſcore of the Affairs that brought her to Paris, ſhe ſent Word to Edward, by the King her Brother, that ſhe was not willing to expoſe her ſelf any more to the ill Treatment of young Spenſer, who hated her. Mean time her Friends in England, eſpecially the Biſhop of Hereford, endeavour'd to debauch the King's Subjects, and to form a Party, which in a ſhort time became very conſiderable; and no wonder, conſidering how odious the Spenſers were to the People, and how contemptible the King. The Queen, on her part, was no leſs induſtrious to gain Friends: She had got a Promiſe of conſiderable Aſſiſtance from (William) the Earl of Hainault, by granting young Edward in Marriage to Philippa that Earl's Daughter. When ſhe had maturely concerted all her Meaſures, ſhe left her Brother's Court, from whence it was pretended that ſhe was expell'd, and took the Road of Hainault, where ſhe found Troops ready, the Command of which the Earl of Hainault gave to John his Brother, Lord of Beaumont, whom Iſabella was glad to own for her Knight. She embark'd with her Troops, and landed * in the County of Suffolk, where all her Friends came to join her, being headed by the Earl of Kent, the King's Brother, Henry Earl of Lancaſter, Brother to him who was beheaded, the Biſhops of Lincoln and Hereford, and many others, who brought her Forces, which they had muſtered privately for that Occaſion.

EDWARD II.

His Queen's Proceedings in France.

Her Invaſion of England.

EDWARD flatter'd himſelf all along that he ſhould be able to lay this Storm, by the Letters which he wrote to the Pope, the Cardinals, the King of France, his Wife, and his Son; not conſidering, that while he try'd thoſe fruitleſs Remedies, he gave the Queen and her Friends time to ſtrengthen their Party. They had ſuch good Succeſs, that no body had the Courage or Inclination to declare for the King, when he went about to raiſe an Army to oppoſe the Invaſion. The cold Reception he met with, almoſt wherever he came, oblig'd that unhappy Prince to retire to the Weſtern Counties, where he hop'd to find more Friendſhip. But the People of thoſe Parts were as diſaffected as their Countrymen; the Queen having given out every where, by her ſelf and her Friends, that ſhe only aim'd at the Favourites, for whom the People had no great Affection. When ſhe was at Wallingford, ſhe publiſh'd a Manifeſto to this very Purpoſe, and continu'd her March to the Weſt, in purſuit of the King. In this Extremity, Edward being deſtitute of Friends, Troops, and Money, reſolv'd at laſt to ſubmit to his ill Fortune; and having left Spenſer the Father in Briſtol, embark'd on board a ſmall Veſſel, with a deſign to retire to Ireland: But the contrary Winds drove him on the Coaſt of Wales, where he was obliged to land, and not knowing which way to turn himſelf, lay hid for ſome time in the Abbey of Neath. Mean time the Queen came before Briſtol, which making no great Reſiſtance, Spenſer the Father was there taken, and hang'd without any of the Forms of Law, at the Age of fourſcore and ten *. The King being not to be found, and there being certain Advice that he was gone beyond Sea, the Lords who accompanied the Queen met at Briſtol, and nam'd for Guardian, or Regent of the Kingdom, young Edward, who took upon him the Adminiſtration. This done, the Queen march'd to Glouceſter, where ſhe put forth a Proclamation, inviting the King her Husband to come and reſume the Government; though, according to all Appearance, and as the Sequel plainly demonſtrated, ſhe did not deſign he ſhould. A Rumour being now ſpread, that the King lay hid in Wales, the Earl of Lancaſter made ſuch ſtrict Search after him, that he found him; and having ſecur'd both him, and the Companions of his Fortune, viz. Young Spenſer, Baldock † the Chancellor, and Simon Reading, he brought them to Monmouth. Upon this News the Queen went to Hereford, where ſhe ſent for Spenſer, and caus'd him to be hang'd on a Gallows fifty foot high ‡. Then ſhe ſummon'd a grand Council, wherein it was reſolv'd, That as the Commiſſion of Guardian was expir'd by the King's Return, the Biſhop of Hereford ſhould be ſent to the King, to demand the Great Seal, without which they who were then at the Helm could do nothing that was valid. Edward being a Priſoner, deliver'd it with a good Grace, and authoriſed his Wife and Son to make uſe of it as they ſhould think proper, even in Affairs of meer Grace and Favour. As ſoon as the Queen had the Great Seal in her Poſſeſſion, ſhe therewith ſeal'd all the Acts ſhe thought neceſſary, in the King's Name, and eſpecially an Order for calling the Parliament. This was one of the laſt Orders that was paſs'd in the Name and by the Authority of the King, tho' he had no hand therein, and concludes the Acts of the fourth Tome of the Fœdera, ſo far as they relate to his Reign. There being a ſmall Chaſm in this Collection, between the Calling of the Parliament, and the Beginning of the Reign of Edward III, I ſhall juſt obſerve, for the ſake of connecting the Hiſtory, that the ſaid Parliament, which met towards the End of January, 1327, reſolv'd unanimouſly to depoſe Edward II, and to ſet his Son upon the Throne: Which Reſolution would have been executed without any other Formality, if the young Prince had not proteſted upon Oath, that he would never accept the Crown, without his Father's Conſent. Upon this unexpected Reſolution, the Parliament ſent Deputies to Kenelworth (Caſtle in Warwickſhire) where the King was then in Cuſtody, to require him to reſign the Crown; which the wretched ſtate of his Affairs did not permit him to refuſe. Nevertheleſs this Reſignation paſs'd for voluntary; and it was upon this Foundation that young Edward, who was but fourteen Years of Age, accepted the Offer of the Crown.

King Edward's Reſignation to his Son.

WE proceed now to thoſe Acts of this fourth Tome, which relate to the Events abovemention'd: But as it would be a Task too tedious, to undertake to ſhew the Uſefulneſs of every one of thoſe Acts in particular, I ſhall therefore only ſingle out ſome of the moſt remarkable, by which one may judge of the Uſe that may be made of the others.

The young one executed in like manner.

IN the firſt Place, we find ſeveral Orders here, dated in Auguſt 1323, [a] for apprehending Mortimer, who eſcaped out of the Tower; which ſhew that Mezeray was miſtaken, when he aſſerted that Mortimer made his Eſcape in 1325, and went to wait on Queen Iſabel at Paris, ſince it appears, that he was there near two Years before her.

A Miſtake of Mezeray, about Mortimer, rectify'd. p. 7, 8, 9.

THE next we come to is a remarkable Piece, becauſe it makes mention of Mortimer's being twice pardon'd. It was iſſued by the King at Nottingham, Nov. 14, 1323, and has this Title, De huteſio & clamore, which undoubtedly is underſtood by very few. It is a Tranſlation of † SIR Roger Baldock was alſo Biſhop of Norwich. He was committed firſt to the Biſhop of London's Priſon, from whence he was pull'd out by the common People, to be carry'd to Newgate; but they beat him ſo cruelly by the way, that he died of his Bruiſes, in great Torment. Walſingham's Chronicle.

the Engliſh Words Hue and Cry *, which come from the French Huer and Crier. The Engliſh have a Way ſometimes to find out lurking Criminals, which is practis'd no where elſe. The Conſtables, aſſiſted by all the People of the Village or Pariſh, make ſtrict ſearch in the Houſes and Fields, with great Cries, or Huées, which they call Hue and Cry, which is carried from Pariſh to Pariſh, 'till they come to the Seaſide; and as no body can excuſe themſelves from aſſiſting the Conſtables, who have Power to ſearch every where, 'tis a very hard matter for the Malefactor to eſcape. Nevertheleſs Mortimer was not to be found, which ſhews he was already gone beyond Sea.

THE ſeveral Pieces we have in this Collection, relating to the Affair at St. Sardos (above-mention'd) make us perfectly acquainted with the Cauſe and Original of the Diſputes between England and France, which no Hiſtorian that I know of, either French or Engliſh, has clearly explain'd. Mezeray ſays, that the Ground of the Quarrel betwixt the two Kings was Edward's refuſing to aſſiſt at the Coronation of Charles the Fair, and the putting of a Garriſon by the Seneſchal of Bourdeaux, into a Caſtle which the Lord of Montpezat had built in the Territories of France. But the Hiſtorian was certainly miſtaken in both; for in the firſt place, as to the Coronation, there's not a ſingle Act in this Collection, tho' there are a great many upon the Subject, which makes the leaſt mention of this firſt Cauſe of Quarrel; but there's a full Account of the Homage which Edward deferr'd, becauſe he pretended that the Summons was not made in due Form. As to the ſecond Particular, he is as much out in that as in the other; for the Diſpute was not about a Caſtle newly built, but about the Confiſcation of Montpezat Caſtle, on account of a Thing that happen'd at Sardos, which was a Village that belong'd to it. This Affair is perfectly well explain'd in ſeveral Pieces that we find in this Collection, both in the Reigns of Edward II. and Edward III.

Another Miſtake of Mezeray.

King's Order about the County of Cornwall. p. 84.

THERE's an Order from the King, dated Sept. 18, 1324, for taking the County of Cornwall into his own poſſeſſion again, becauſe of the riſque there was in leaving it in the hands of the Queen.

His Letter to the Pope about ſending his Queen to France, p. 140.

AND here we have a Letter from King Edward to the Pope [a]; which is a Piece the more remarkable, becauſe it ſhews that the firſt Propoſal of ſending Iſabella into France came from that Kingdom; that ſome eminent Members of King Charles's Council open'd the Matter firſt to the Pope's Nuncios; and that the latter propos'd the Expedient to the Engliſh Ambaſſadors: Whereupon the Biſhop of Exeter was diſpatch'd into England, to make the Propoſal.

THE Treaty which Iſabel made with the King her Brother, is inſerted here at large; a Treaty ſo diſadvantageous to the King of England, that ſurely the Spenſers, who govern'd him, were terribly afraid of a War, or elſe they would never have adviſ'd him to ratifie it; for he not only engag'd to deliver up all Guyenne to the King of France, without any other Security for the Reſtitution of it beſides Charles's bare Word; a Security which his Father Edward did not like in the Caſe of Philip the Fair; but he alſo conſented that Charles ſhould keep the Territory of Agenois, only ſaving to himſelf the Liberty of having his Right to it diſcuſs'd in the Court of Peers: And finally, in caſe he ſhould happen to carry his Cauſe in that Court, he engag'd to pay a certain Sum towards the Charge of the War. By all which 'tis evident that Iſabel was not very mindful of her Husband's Intereſts. This Treaty is dated May 31, 1325.

The Treaty with the French King, p. 153.

Queen's Conſpiracy againſt her Husband.

QUEEN Iſabel's Conſpiracy againſt her Husband has been, I may venture to ſay, but lamely explain'd by the Hiſtorians. 'Tis perfectly ſurprizing to ſee this Queen, who had made no great Figure in England before ſhe went to France, return a Year after at the Head of an Army, and dethrone the King her Husband, without any previous Sign of her Intrigues. Mezeray only ſays, that her Brother Charles promis'd her Aſſiſtance againſt the Spenſers; but that afterwards, when he heard of her Conduct with Mortimer, he turn'd her out of his Dominions, and forbad his Subjects to aſſiſt her: Whereupon this deſolate Queen took Shelter in Hainault, where John, Brother to the Earl of that Name, gave her a welcome Reception, declar'd himſelf her Knight of Honour, and aſſembled Three hundred Knights to conduct her into England. This Collection gives abundance of Light upon this Head, and ſhews, if I am not deceiv'd, that this Conſpiracy was form'd before the Queen went into France, and was carried on all the time ſhe was at Paris.

I WILL not here repeat what I have already ſaid, touching the Probability there is that her Correſpondence with Mortimer began in the Year 1323, or ſooner; and that it was owing to her Protection that the Life of that Man was ſav'd, which brought upon her all the Uneaſineſs ſhe ſuffer'd from the Spenſers. This being premis'd, it may be inferr'd that the Queen her ſelf was the Author of her Journey to the King her Brother, ſince 'tis evident, as we have already ſeen, that the firſt Propoſal of it came from him.

him. 'Tis equally probable that it was the Queen who was the Contriver of the Expedient for the Ceſſion of Guyenne and Ponthieu to her Son; for the Uſe ſhe made of it ſhews that ſhe was very much concern'd to bring it about; whereas it could not be imagin'd what Advantage the ſame would have been to the King of France, if it had not been only to do his Siſter a Favour. The French Hiſtorians ſay, that Charles had no hand in his Siſter's Conſpiracy, and that he even expell'd her his Dominions: But this Collection, I think, ſhews clearly that he enter'd very far into the Secret: For, beſides that Mezeray makes no Scruple to own, that the King had promis'd his Siſter a Supply both of Men and Money, the deſire the King expreſs'd to ſee her, and his readineſs to come into the Alteration or Exchange of Edward the Father's Homage into that of Edward the Son, could proceed from no other Cauſe but a deſire to ſerve her; otherwiſe it would have been more honourable for him to receive Homage from the King of England, than from his Son. He had ſo few Objections to make to this Alternative, that the Negotiation was concluded in leſs than a Fortnight: For the

If to this we add, that the King of France kept his Siſter at Court almoſt a whole Year after he had receiv'd the Homage of the young Prince, maugre all the Sollicitations of Edward, who preſs'd him many times to ſend her home again; that the ſaid Princeſs was

p. 226. ſtill in France on the 4th of September, 1326, as appears by a Letter from Edward of that Date, to the Inhabitants of Bayonne; and that ſhe landed in the County of Suffolk on the 22d ditto; we muſt be of Opinion that all Affairs were concerted before ſhe left the Court of the King her Brother, and by conſequence that ſhe was not expell'd, as is pretended, 'till it was time for her to enter upon Action.

Another Miſtake in Hiſtory diſcover'd.

p. 180. HERE is Edward's Anſwer [e], Decemb. 1, 1325, to Charles the Fair, who had ſignified to him that the Queen could not return into England, becauſe ſhe was ſo much hated by Spenſer the Son. In this Anſwer Edward juſtifies Spenſer, and aſſures the King of France, that he had never been wanting in his due Reſpect to the Queen; and that if he had, he ſhould not have eſcap'd Puniſhment; for by God, ſays he, there is neither Hugh, nor any Man living in our Power, who means her any Harm, but if we knew it, we would puniſh in ſuch a manner that others ſhould take warning; and this is, was, and always ſhall be our Will, and God be thank'd, we have the Power in our own hands. He added, that he could not conceive what made his Wife complain of Spenſer, conſidering how extremely civil ſhe was to him when he took his leave of her, and the very affectionate Letters ſhe had ſent him ſince her Departure.

EDWARD II.

King Edward's Letter to the King of France, about his Queen and Spenſer.

HE wrote a Letter the ſame Day to his Queen, preſſing her to return, and told her that the Biſhop of Wincheſter had aſſured him, that in his Preſence the King her Brother had proteſted that he would not detain her contrary to the Tenor of her Paſſport. The Letter begins with the Word Dame, which I know not whether 'twas the ordinary Style, or whether he gave her ſo dry a Title by reaſon of the Matters of Complaint he had againſt her.

Another to his Queen, p. 181.

THE next Day he alſo wrote a Letter to his Son, which by reaſon of its brevity, and to give an Idea of the French Language at that time, I ſhall here inſert entire.

A Miſtake in many Hiſtories, confuted by the King's Letter to the Pope, about his Wife and Son. P. 200.

MANY Hiſtorians, even of the Engliſh, have affirm'd, that Edward being provok'd at the Diſobedience both of his Wife and Son *, baniſh'd them both by a Proclamation; but this has no other Foundation than a Report which had been current in France, as appears by a Letter which King Edward wrote to the Pope on this Subject, dated April 15, 1326 [a], wherein he complain'd of thoſe who were the Propagators of thoſe falſe Reports, and aſſures him, that ſuch a Thought never came into his Head, and that inſtead of hindring their Return, he did all that lay in his Power to bring them home. Et idem filius noſter, ſays he, erga nos non deliquit, nec permittit ætatis teneritudo ut ſibi offenſa aliqua poſſit, aut debeat imputari. Propter quod inhumanum foret, nec fœdus permitteret naturale, tantæ crudelitatis ſævitiam contra eos exercere. i. e. And as for our ſaid Son, he has not offended us; and indeed the Tenderneſs of his Age is ſuch, that he cannot be chargeable, either with the doing or intending any Harm. Wherefore it would be both inhuman and unnatural to treat them with ſo much Rage and Cruelty.

His Proclamation againſt the Invader, Mortimer, &c. P. 231, 232.

EDWARD no ſooner heard the News of the Queen's being landed, but he publiſh'd a Proclamation [b] on the 27th of September, 1326, for purſuing and deſtroying all the Invaders of his Kingdom; but he excepted the Queen, his Son, and the Earl of Kent, his Brother. And by another Proclamation from thence next Day, he put a Price upon Mortimer's Head, promiſing to the Perſon who brought it, the Pardon of all his Crimes, and a Reward of Three Pounds † Sterling; which was ſuch a Trifle for ſo notable a Service, that I cannot help thinking there has been ſome Miſtake in the Tranſcript.

Manifeſto againſt the Spenſers. P. 236.

HERE is alſo the Manifeſto of the Queen, of Edward the Son, and of the Earl of Kent, againſt the Spenſers, in the uſual Style of Pieces of this nature, where the main buſineſs is to ſhew that nothing is aim'd at but the Good of the Publick [c].

EDWARD II.

THERE is likewiſe a Memorandum, dated the 26th of the ſame Month, at Briſtol, of the Nomination then and there made of Edward the Son, for Guardian or Regent of the Kingdom; and of the ſending the Biſhop of Hereford to the King, to demand the Great Seal. In it are theſe Words, Et idem dominus rex, habitâ inde aliquali deliberatione penes ſe, reſpondebat, Quod placuit ſibi, mittere dictum magnum ſigillum ſuum, præfatis conſorti ſuo, & filio; & quod iidem conſors & filius, dictum ſigillum, ſub privato ſigillo ſuo tunc clauſum, aperiri facerent, & non ſolum ea quæ pro jure & pace eſſent facienda, ſed etiam quæ gratiæ forent, ſub dicto magno ſigillo, fieri facerent. i. e. And the ſaid Lord the King, after having deliberated within his own Breaſt, made anſwer, That he approv'd of the ſending of his ſaid Great Seal to his Conſort and Son aforeſaid; and of their cauſing the ſaid Seal, then included in his Privy Seal, to be open'd; and that under the ſaid Great Seal they ſhould tranſact not only thoſe Things which might be done both by Law, and for the ſake of Peace, but alſo thoſe things which were Acts of meer Grace and Favour.

Edward the Son appointed Regent. P. 237.

THIS Great Seal was made uſe of to procure the Payment of ſome of the Queen's Debts, for reſtoring the Eſtate of the Earl of Richmond, which the King had cauſed to be confiſcated, becauſe the ſaid Earl had a Hand in the Treaty of Paris; and laſtly, it was made uſe of to aſſemble in the King's Name and Authority, that very Parliament which was to depoſe him.

Pope's Letter to Edward about Robert Bruce. P. 28.

DURING the four laſt Years of the Reign of Edward II, we find nothing remarkable in this Collection with reſpect to Scotland, but a Letter [d] January 1324, from Pope John XXII to this Prince; wherein he informs him of his Reaſons for giving Robert Bruce the Title of King of Scotland, a Style he had 'till then refus'd him; which, ſaid he, can be no Prejudice to the Rights of Edward.

FROM thence it may be inferr'd, that the Excommunication againſt the Perſon transported them out of his Dominions. This occaſioned a great Number of Letters, which this Prince ſent to the Pope, but were of no Availment.

Affairs Eccleſiaſtical.

THE Collation to Biſhopricks bred freſh Quarrels from time to time between the Pope and the King, and by conſequence gave the latter freſh Mortification; a very great Inſtance of this was the Caſe of the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, which I ſhall explain in a Word or two, becauſe it was one of the principal Subjects of the Acts of theſe four Years. Edward had ſent Rigand Biſhop of Wincheſter, and John Stratford Archdeacon of Lincoln, Ambaſſadors to the Pope. The former dying at Avignon, John XXII, according to the Uſage already eſtabliſh'd, being to diſpoſe of that Biſhoprick, and the King at laſt acknowledging the Pope's Right, which he had before in vain oppos'd, he immediately gave Orders to Stratford, to deſire that Biſhoprick for Robert Baldock, who was afterwards Chancellor. Stratford acted his Part ſo well, that he procur'd it for himſelf; which put Edward into ſuch a Paſſion with his Ambaſſador, that he called him a Prevaricator. He wrote ſeveral Letters to the Pope, to get this Nomination revoked: but it was in vain; for John ſtood by what he had done, and ſent home the new Biſhop, with a Letter of Recommendation, in which he aſſur'd Edward, that Stratford did all that was in his Power to get Baldock promoted to the Biſhoprick, but that Stratford's own extraordinary Merit had determin'd him to gratify him with it, in which he hop'd he had done the King a Pleaſure. When this Biſhop returned, Edward was reſolved to proſecute him for ſeveral matters charg'd upon him relating to the other Articles of his Embaſſy; but he could not carry his Point ſo far as to get him condemn'd: And this Affair came juſt to the ſame Concluſion as thoſe of this Nature generally did, that is to ſay, the new Biſhop was approv'd by the King, after having renounc'd the Article of the Pope's Bull which aſſign'd to him the Temporality.

Diſpute between the King and the Pope, about the Biſhop of Wincheſter.

EDWARD undertook another Affair, in which he ſucceeded no better. He would fain by the Pope's Authority have depos'd the Archbiſhop of Dublin, the Biſhops of Lincoln, Bath and Wells, Hereford, and Condom in Guyenne; or, at leaſt, have

IN January 1324, we find Edward complaining to the Pope, &c. [e] of a certain Prerogative called Conſervatiæ, which was pleaded by a certain Cardinal, Archdeacon of Ely, when he ſummon'd the Biſhop of the ſaid Dioceſs to appear before him. I know not what thoſe Conſervatiæ meant which Edward in his Letters call'd, Novæ adinventiones, quæ à tramite juris communis exorbitant; i. e. New Inventions, which ramble wide from the Path of Common Law *. It ſeems to have been ſome Privilege granted to the Cardinals, with reſpect to the Benefices they held in England; but I only give this by way of conjecture.

Edward's Complaint of the Conſervatiæ. P. 25, 26, 27.

AS the Pope took care to maintain his Authority, he was no leſs diligent to augment his Revenues. We find here, that John XXII, after having granted the King a Tenth upon the Clergy, for the War againſt Scotland, reſerv'd to himſelf for the Time to come, by another Bull, the fourth Part of the ſaid Tenth, for the preſſing Neceſſities of the Holy See. Edward refus'd for a while to pay the Pope the ſaid fourth Part, becauſe Reſervation had not been made of it in the firſt Bull: upon which the Pope wrote him a very ſevere Letter [f].

Pope's Letter to Edward, about the Tenths. P. 19.

NEVERTHELESS Edward did not flinch 'till 1326; when finding himſelf in very great Perplexities, he wrote to the Pope that he referr'd himſelf entirely to his Diſcretion upon that Head.

THE Obligation which the Archbiſhops of Canterbury were under, to go and receive the Pall in Perſon from the Pope's own Hand, was ſo eſtabliſh'd, that from the time of Honorius, who was the third Archbiſhop of that See, no body had been excus'd from it. And we find that in the Reign of William the Conqueror, Lanfranc, tho' he was in ſuch high Eſteem at the Court of Rome, could never obtain this Diſpenſation. Walter Reynolds, who was elected in 1313, had better Fortune; for he received the Pall at Canterbury, and obtain'd from Clement V, a Delay of five Years, which, we ſhall find in the Acts of this Collection, was often renew'd.

Archbiſhop's Pall, the Hiſtory of it.

THIS Pall was become ſo neceſſary to the Archbiſhops, that it was reckon'd ſuch an eſſential Mark of their Dignity, that they could not exerciſe their Functions without it: For we find here, that ſome Thief having ſtole away the Archbiſhop of York's Pall, the King wrote a Letter to the Pope g, to deſire him to ſend his Grace another *. EDWARD II.

g From Kenelworth, April 1, 1326.

* THE Pallium, or Pall, was a ſort of Mantle, worn by the Emperors, as an Enſign of Power, and by them in the 4th Century imparted to the Prelates, as a Mark of their Authority over the inferior Orders. At firſt it reach'd from Neck to Heel, covering all the Body, reſembling a Prieſt's Cope, but that it was cloſe before. Afterwards it became a kind of Stole, which hung before and behind, with four ſcarlet Croſſes, one on the Breaſt, another on the Back, and one on each Shoulder. The Popes gave it at firſt to Primates and Apoſtolick Vicars only; but not to any Weſtern Prelate, before the 6th Century. In the 8th they granted it to all Metropolitans, or Abbots, and afterwards to ſeveral conſiderable Biſhops, who receiv'd this Pall at Conſecration; 'till when they could not exerciſe any Function. It was uſed only at the Altar, in the Celebration of ſolemn Maſs, when they put it about their Necks, over their other Pontifical Ornaments. Dr. Howel ſays, It is made of Lamb's Wool, without any artificial colour, ſpun by a peculiar Order of Nuns; that it is adorned with little black Croſſes, having two Labels hanging down before and behind; and that on certain Days it is caſt into St. Peter's Tomb. We read that they ſometimes put it upon the Corpſes of Patriarchs and Archbiſhops when they are buried.

THE Romiſh Prelates pay a great Rate for this Pall; inſomuch that Dr. Howel tells us, That Dr. Gray, when choſe Archbiſhop of York, in the Reign of King John, gave for his, no leſs than 1000 l. By the ſuperſtitious Order of the Church of Rome, it ſhould be made of the Wool of thoſe two Lambs, which being offer'd at the High Altar, upon St. Agnes's Day, are, after the hallowing of them, committed to the Sub-Deacons of that Church, and kept by them in a particular Paſture. It muſt be noted, that the whole Garment is not of the Woollen Manufacture, but only that Liſt or Plaite of it, which falls down before and behind, and goes round the Neck. Claude Villette, a Canon of St. Marcellus, relates this whole Affair at large, in his Book called Raiſons de l'Office & des Ceremonies de l'Egliſe Romaine.

The REIGN of EDWARD III. Surnam'd of Windſor. †

THE Acts in the Fœdera, which relate to the Reign of Edward III, take up the far greateſt part of the 4th Tome, all the 5th and 6th Tomes, and part of the 7th. To make an Extract of every Piece in thoſe Tomes, would be a Work too tedious and voluminous; therefore we ſhall confine our ſelves to thoſe Acts that are of moſt Importance, and moſt capable of giving any light into his Reign, one of the moſt conſiderable in the Engliſh Hiſtory.

THE chief tranſactions of this 4th Tome, which takes in the eleven firſt Years of Edward III, may be reduc'd to four principal Heads.

I. DOMESTICK Affairs.

II. THOSE common to England and Scotland.

III. EDWARD's Quarrels with France. And,

IV. AFFAIRS Eccleſiaſtick, or Religious.

To give an account of the numerous Acts foreign to theſe four Articles, would ſwell this Work to a much greater Bulk than the Fœdera it ſelf.

General Character of his Reign.

† MR. Rymer gives the following general Account of this Martial Reign in his Dedication of this fourth Tome to the late Queen, in the Year 1707. "This Book, may it pleaſe your Majeſty, gives a Proſpect into the "Reign of your moſt noble Progenitor, King Edward III. a Time of great War, and great Succeſſes.

"SOME Years from the Beginning of his Reign, he wrote himſelf King of FRANCE; and before the "End of his Reign, he ſaw his younger Son (that was born at Gaunt) ſaluted King of SPAIN.

"HIS CONFEDERATES, the Counts of Holland and Zealand, the Marqueſſes of Cleve and Juliers, "the Dukes of Brabant and Guelder, of the Naſſau Family, the then Emperor, and other German Princes; "Names ('till now from your Archives reviv'd and rais'd to light) long buried in Oblivion: Theſe his CON-"FEDERATES ſeem much-what of the ſame Mould with YOUR MAJESTY'S ALLIES.

"IN the 20th Year of his Reign was the Battle of Creſſy.

"IN the 30th was the Battle of Poictiers.

"In the 41ſt Year of this Reign was that total Rout given to the United Forces of France and Spain; "whereby King Pedro was ſet upon the Throne, his Rival forc'd to quit the Kingdom, and flee into "France for ſhelter, &c."

N. B. Dr. Nicholſon firſt Biſhop of Carliſle, and afterwards of Londonderry, ſpeaking of this Prince, calls him the GREATEST in EUROPE, of his time, and the GLORY of our ENGLISH THRONE. And Mr. Joſhua Barnes, whoſe Account of his Reign is the beſt that can be conſulted, in the Opinion of that Learned and Right Reverend Antiquary, gives this general Character of Edward III, in his Preface.

"The Subject Matter of my Diſcourſe is the Honour of "my Country, the Life and Actions of one of the greateſt "Kings that perhaps the World ever ſaw.——It is an old "Obſervation, That Subjects uſually conform themſelves "to their Prince: And here certainly, if ever any "Great and Martial Monarch was Lord of any like himſelf, we ſhall find this King to have been ſo: Many great "and renowned Heroes and Captains, bold in Attempts, "wiſe in Conduct, and fortunate in Succeſs, being thick "almoſt in every Page of this Hiſtory: Wherein will appear the greateſt Variety of Adventures, the moſt hazardous Enterprizes of War, the moſt exact Counſels, and "politick Negotiations, and the moſt frequent inſtances of "courage, Piety, Generoſity, and Princely Conduct; with "the moſt wholeſom Laws and Rules of Government, that "perhaps the whole World can furniſh us withal, in ſo "ſhort a Period of Time."

And the Reverend Mr. Eachard, in his Introduction to this Reign, ſays, The Engliſh Nation not only recover'd Vigour and Strength in it, but alſo Beauty and Glory.

FOEDERA Tom. IV.

EDWARD III.

ARTICLE I.

Domeſtick Affairs.

King Edward III enters on the Government. P. 247.

EDWARD III was but fourteen Years of Age when he came to the Crown; which tho' his Father had been forc'd to reſign, yet in the very firſt Proclamation that was publiſh'd in the Name of the new King [a], his Miniſters make him ſay in the Preamble, that he took the Government of the Kingdom upon him, not only by the Conſent of his Father, but in Obedience to his Orders *. By this, and many other Acts of the like nature, 'tis manifeſt that the Declarations of Princes are not always the ſafeſt Vouchers for the Truth of Hiſtory.

His Guardians meer Cyphers.

THE ſame Parliament which depos'd Edward II caus'd Edward III to be proclaim'd, and choſe him twelve Guardians or Governours, of whom Henry Earl of Lancaſter was to take care of his Perſon: But this was a Nomination entirely uſeleſs; for the Queen, who had the Power in her own Hands, ſeiz'd the Government, and left the Guardians appointed by Parliament nothing more than the Shadow of Authority, while Roger Mortimer govern'd under her with abſolute Power. But the Parliament, far from reſenting it, vigorouſly ſeconded the Deſigns of the Queen and her Miniſter, Deſigns which had no other End but to run down the late Government. The Exiles were recall'd, the Conduct of the late Earl of Lancaſter was approv'd of, and the Judgment given againſt him revers'd, as contrary to the Laws of the Kingdom. The Biſhops of Winchester, Norwich, Lincoln and Hereford, were reſtor'd to their Temporalities, and had the chief Management of Affairs under the Direction of the Queen and Mortimer. And all the Sentences paſs'd againſt the Adherents of the Earl of Lancaſter were revers'd, upon a Suppoſition that they had been extorted by the Credit of the Spenſers. This is the main Subject of the firſt Acts of this Tome, which contain the Petitions preſented to the Parliament by thoſe who had been diſgraced in the late Reign.

Queen and Mortimer govern all.

Queen's Revenue.

ISABEL had a Dowry ſettled upon her, which ſwallow'd up two Thirds of the Revenues of the Crown, and ſhe paid the very Debts that ſhe had contracted in France, out of the publick Treaſury. Moreover, ſhe made an Aſſignment of a yearly Penſion of 1000 Marks to John Earl of Hainault, who had accompany'd her to England. This is the chief Affair from p. 249 to p. 262 of this 4th Tome.

ALL the Meaſures taken by the Queen, Mortimer, and the Parliament, were to render the late King's Conduct odious, in order to juſtify what they had done to him. When Iſabel undertook her Expedition againſt her Husband the King, ſhe relied chiefly on the Support of the Adherents of the late Earl of Lancaſter, who was beheaded at Pontefract; and it was they, properly ſpeaking, that depos'd King Edward II, and plac'd his Son upon the Throne. Therefore, in order to give ſome Colour for the exceſſive Rigour with which the late King had been treated, it was neceſſary, not only to juſtify that Earl's Conduct, but even to cry up his Merit, and ſet it in oppoſition againſt the pretended Injuſtice of Edward II. And the People being at that time ſo prepoſſeſs'd in favour of the Earl that they went even to St. Paul's Church to worſhip his Picture, as I have already mention'd; they did not let the favourable Conjuncture ſlip, but thought proper to write to the Pope in the Name of the King, deſiring him to canonize Thomas Earl of Lancaſter: And theſe were ſome of the Expreſſions made uſe of in the Letter [b].

Inſtance made for canonizing the Earl of Lancaſter.

* MR. Daniel, in his Hiſtory of this Reign, remarks, that this Preamble was intended to palliate the Wrong done to the Father, but that it made it more apparent.

DR. Kennet, in his Notes upon this Hiſtorian, would have the Reader obſerve, that he was no Friend to the Barons and their Cauſe.

BISHOP Nicholſon has a remarkable Note with reſpect to thoſe Barons, viz. That the Barons who join'd with the Earl of Lancaſter againſt Edward II, being too great and powerful to be nam'd Rebels, had the ſofter Name of Contrarients beſtow'd on them; and he takes notice of a Roll of Records in the Tower, which is from them call'd Rot. Contrarientium.

MR. Barnes ſays, a General Pardon was proclaim'd at his Acceſſion, which gave occaſion to ſucceeding Kings to follow the Example of ſo great a Precedent.

HENRY Tom. IV.

& fœcundat, dum ad piam ejus invocationem, tot glorioſa, ſuprà naturam, divinitus fiunt miracula & infinita ſalutis remedia, favente Deo, per ipſius preces & merita conceduntur.

i. e. HE was eminent for his ſingular Conſtancy, which he retain'd as a Prerogative; for having corporally ſworn, and bound himſelf before God, to keep the Statutes and Ordinances of the Realm of England, promulged by Order of the Council of the Realm, for the Benefit of the Republick, and the Defence of the Liberty of the Church, he inviolably kept his Oath to God; and out of his Zeal for Juſtice, magnanimouſly check'd and cruſh'd the perfidious Seducers who roſe up againſt the King and Kingdom. After many and tedious Conflicts which he went through, in the Purity of the Spirit, and the Hopes of a Reward in Heaven, the juſt Man devoutly ſuffer'd the Sentence of Death paſs'd by the unjuſt, and ſo ſweetly ſlept in the Lord: And now like a River deſcending from ſome pleaſant Place to water Paradiſe, being divided into ſeveral Branches, gives a wholeſome Temperature and Fruitfulneſs by its Celeſtial Dew to the Soil of England, which is dyed red with the Effuſion of his ſacred Blood; while through the pious Invocation of his Name, ſo many glorious ſupernatural Miracles are wrought by Inſpiration, and while the infinite Remedies of Salvation are by the Grace of God granted through his Prayers and Merit.

It is no wonder at all, conſidering the then Circumſtances of the Court of England, that thoſe who govern'd in the King's Name, ſhould write ſuch a Letter. But one cannot help thinking it ſtrange, that Edward III, when he came of Age, and was perfectly acquainted with the Wrong that had been done to his Father, ſhould ſollicit this Canonization more than once [d]. Nevertheleſs, this new Saint was not plac'd in the Calendar 'till the following Reign. But tho' his Canonization was a long time a coming, yet he was reverenc'd beforehand as a Martyr: And we find a Permiſſion from the King [e], to make a Collection for building a Chapel on the very Spot where the Earl was beheaded.

p. 291.

THUS the main Point was to blacken the Government of Edward II. The Condition of that depos'd King, as deplorable as it was, yet it gave Uneaſineſs to the Queen and Mortimer. Henry Earl of Lancaſter, who had him in his Cuſtody at the Caſtle of Kenelworth, had no reaſon to be fond of him; but his natural Generoſity did not permit him to inſult the Prince in his Miſery: And tho' he took care that his Priſoner ſhould not eſcape, yet he paid his Devoirs to him; at which the Queen was alarm'd. This, added to ſome particular Reaſons which that Lord had to be diſguſted with Iſabel, who had ſeiz'd the Government to his Prejudice, made that Princeſs of Opinion, that it was not ſafe to leave the King any longer in his Cuſtody. Therefore ſhe diſpatch'd an Order to Sir John Maltravers and Sir Thomas Gournay, to take Edward from Kenelworth Caſtle, and carry him to that of Berkley (in Glouceſterſhire.) Theſe two Gentlemen, the moſt brutiſh of the human Species, made that unhappy Prince ſuffer a thouſand horrid Indignities, enough to have broke his Heart; and thoſe who put him into their Hands intended no leſs: But his Conſtancy was proof againſt all their Barbarities: So that theſe Means failing, the two Guards had Orders to diſpatch him with all the Secrecy poſſible. They executed their Commiſſion in a manner the moſt ſhocking to human Nature, by thruſting a hot Iron into his Fundament, through a Pipe or Horn, and burning his Entrails *. This was done probably in October 1327, immediately after the young King's Expedition againſt the Scots. But the Miſcreants, inſtead of receiving the Reward they expected, were forc'd to fly, after they had ſeen the very Perſons that had employ'd them, the firſt to diſown them, in order to ſmother that Part which they themſelves had in their Parricide.

Murder of King Edward II.

NOT long after, Edward III ſolemniz'd his Marriage with Philippa of Hainault; which Match had been made up by his Mother before her Return to England. We have here the Pope's Bull of Diſpenſation for that Marriage [f], as alſo a Paſſport [g], for the Earl of Hainault to bring over his Daughter to England, to conſummate the Marriage.

* MR. Barnes ſays, this Murder was committed on the 21ſt of September, 1327, at Midnight, not when he was about to disburden Nature, according to Dr. Howel and others, but as he lay faſt aſleep in his Bed: And that the Keepers being a little ſtartled at the Orders from the Queen and Mortimer tho' they ſpar'd no other ill Uſage, ſent to the Biſhop of Hereford a fit Caſuiſt, who was, it is thought, the Adviſer of it, to know whether it was lawful; to which the Biſhop ſent this Anſwer, according to Sir Tho. de la More, Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum eſt; i. e. To kill King Edward you need not to fear it is good: Which Anſwer, according to the placing of the Commas, was either a Plea for himſelf, or an Encouragement for them.

His unsuccessful Expedition against the Scots.

NOT long before the King's Marriage, he had made an Expedition against the Scots, in which he had ill Success. Robert Bruce having broke the Truce, had sent his Troops to ravage the Frontiers of England, which oblig'd the English to raise a great Army to drive them out of the Country. Edward put himself at the Head of this Army; but after a great many fruitless Attempts to bring the Enemy to a Battel, he had the Mortification to see them retire. This War was concluded by a Treaty of Peace, not the most advantageous to England: For, by the Advice of the Queen-Mother, and of Mortimer, Edward quitted all his Pretensions to Scotland for the Sum of Thirty-thousand Marks Sterling, and concluded the Marriage betwixt Joan his Sister and David, Son to Robert Bruce. The Service which Mortimer pretended to have done by negotiating this Treaty, was rewarded with the Title of Earl of Marche, which the King gave him in full Parliament *.

Mortimer made Earl of Marche.

Peace with Scotland.

THE † scandalous Peace made with Scotland, without any Necessity, added to the Tragical Death of Edward II, and to the Insolence of the new-made Earl, made an Impression on the Populace, and much more on the great Men of the Kingdom. Henry Earl of Lancaster was one of those who were the most open in expressing their Disgust, which made the Queen and the Favourite take a Resolution to destroy him: They thought that the Protection he gave to a Gentleman who had kill'd the Lord Holland, furnish'd them with a good Pretence; for as he refus'd to deliver up that Gentleman to Justice, it was no difficult matter for them to persuade the young King, that there was a Necessity of chastising him for such a piece of Presumption; and Troops were rais'd for that end. Lancaster made Preparations on the other hand for his Defence, and brought over to his Interests Edmund Earl of Kent, the King's Uncle, with some other Lords; who being confederated, publish'd a Manifesto at large, exposing the Conduct of the Queen and her Minister. The Grievances therein set forth were so flagrant, that the Queen, for fear the whole Kingdom would be about her Ears, consented to an Accommodation, which was concluded by the Intercession of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Tho' there's nothing of this in the Fœdera, yet it was necessary to speak of it, to shew the Cause of that Hatred which Isabel and the Earl of Marche had conceiv'd against the Earl of Kent; such a Hatred as nothing could satisfy but that Earl's Death. For this End they hatch'd a deviliſh Conspiracy, which it would be difficult to parallel. As Edmund, who was but Twenty-eight Years of Age, was of a frank generous Temper, and no doubt a little too credulous, he was easily persuaded by the Queen his Sister-in-law, that the Deposition of his Brother was absolutely necessary for the publick Good; and it was this that made him concur with her in the Execution of the Project already mention'd: But it was not long before his Eyes were open'd, when he saw that he had been engag'd in wrong Measures: His Expressions, and the Repentance which he discover'd, made it plainly appear, that he wish'd heartily the Thing had never been done, and laid the Foundation of the Conspiracy which his Enemies form'd against him. Certain Persons were deputed to him, who made him believe that the King his Brother was still alive in Corfe Castle, and who engag'd him in Measures to rescue him out of Captivity. It seems that Edmund was himself present at his Brother's Funeral; but the Strength of his Hopes that the pretended Secret now discover'd to him was true, made him easily believe that he had been deceiv'd by a Sham-Funeral: He fell therefore into the Trap that was laid for him, and went to Corfe-Castle; where being assur'd that his Brother was a Prisoner, he desir'd Leave to see him. The Governour, who was properly instructed, excus'd himself upon account of the Orders he had to let no body see him; which throughly confirm'd the Earl in his Opinion; who finding therefore that he could not be admitted, gave the Governour a Letter for the King his Brother, in which he assur'd him that he would take Measures to gain him his Liberty. This Letter was carried to the Queen-Mother, who shew'd it to her Son, and obtain'd his Consent that his Uncle should be taken into Custody. It was at Winchester, where the Parliament was then assembled, that this unfortunate Nobleman was apprehended, condemn'd to lose his Head, and accordingly executed ‡.

EDWARD III.

* HE was made Earl of Marche, in the Parliament held at Salisbury, in August 1328.

† THE Parliament which concluded that dishonourable Peace with the Scots, was held at Northampton, in March 1328, when the King, by the Contrivance of his Mother, Mortimer, and Sir James Douglas, without the Privity of the Peers, surrender'd by Charter his Title and Sovereignty to the Kingdom of Scotland, restor'd many ancient Jewels and Monuments, among which one of great Value, call'd The black Cross of Scotland; also many Deeds, and other Instruments of their former Homage and Fealty, with the famous Evidence call'd The Ragman Roll, which was a Security and Memorial of the Fealty and Homage that the Scots ought to pay to the Kings of England; and besides, no Englishman was permitted to hold any Lands in Scotland, unless he would dwell there.

SEE Mr. Barnes's History of this Reign, who says, that the Lady Joan, King Edward's Sister, was married to David Bruce, the young King of Scotland, about the middle of July 1328; and that the Scots themselves afterwards, by way of Triumph, nicknam'd their Queen, Joan Make-peace; as if the Realm of England had made the Match out of Fear, to rid their Hands of the War.

p. 424. A LETTER to the Pope from King Edward III [k], the 24th of March 1330; wherein he tells the Pope, that the Earl of Kent had endeavour'd to foment Troubles in the Kingdom, by ſpreading a Rumour that the late King was ſtill alive; and that the ſaid Earl was the more juſtly puniſh'd, becauſe he himſelf was preſent at his Brother's Funeral. Nevertheleſs, 'tis not impoſſible but this Circumſtance, whether true or falſe, was added on purpoſe to prejudice the Pope againſt the Earl; for thoſe who were then at the Helm were not very ſcrupulous of the Truth: Moreover, we find ſo much Diſſimulation in many Letters in this Collection, that it is not always ſafe to credit every Tittle.

p. 430. AN Order from the King [l], for proclaiming the Death of the Earl of Kent throughout the Kingdom, and for taking up thoſe who ſpread a Report that Edward II was ſtill alive.

p. 447. ANOTHER Order [m] for apprehending Rice ap Griffin, a Welſhman, who was an Accomplice of the Earl of Kent, and rais'd a Diſturbance in Wales.

EDWARD being as yet but young, left every thing entirely to his Mother and the Earl of Marche, in whoſe Favour he was ſtrangely prepoſſeſs'd; while they on the other hand made the moſt of his extraordinary Confidence, and borrow'd the King's Name to procure themſelves all manner of Advantages. Iſabella got a Grant under the King's Privy Seal, dated

p. 410. the 17th of January 1330, at Oſeneye, for Ten thouſand Marks, part of the Thirty-thouſand which were to be paid by the King of Scotland; and it is very probable that the Earl of Marche finger'd the other Twenty-thouſand Marks, as was afterwards charg'd upon him.

IT was by their Advice, that Edward was perſuaded, tho' with a vaſt deal of Regret, to go over to France, to do Homage to Philip de Valois, whom he look'd upon to be an Uſurper of his Eſtate, as we ſhall find hereafter. It is very probable that he was inform'd, during his Voyage, of many Particulars which began to give him ſome Suſpicion of his Mother's Conduct; for as ſoon as ever he was return'd, he wanted to have it fully explain'd to him. They who took care to inform him of it, remark'd thoſe Errors to him which the Queen and the Earl of Marche had committed, as well in the firſt Expedition againſt the Scots, which was attended with ill Succeſs, as in the ſcandalous Peace which they had caus'd him to patch up, without any Neceſſity, with Robert Bruce. He was inform'd of the Barbarity with which his Father was murder'd, and had the whole Conſpiracy unravell'd to him, by which his Uncle the Earl of Kent loſt his Head. His Friends fully convinc'd him of the Prejudice he had done himſelf, by going to perform Homage to Philip de Valois. They magnify'd the Wealth and Expences of the Earl of Marche, which were by far too great for a Subject. They inſinuated to him, that it was very apparent that the Queen-Mother and her Favourite had a Deſign to keep him always in a ſtate of Minority; and laſt of all, to fill up the Meaſure of his Indignation, they told him, that his Mother was with Child by the ſaid Mortimer *. Theſe Informations had ſuch an Effect upon his Mind, that he reſolv'd to ſhake off the Yoke of his Managers, and to puniſh them. For this end he went to Nottingham, where the Parliament was to meet, with a deſign there to put his Project in execution. He lodg'd in the Town with a ſmall Retinue, while the Queen his Mother, and the Earl of Marche, lay in the Caſtle, with a Guard of One hundred and eighty Knights to attend them. It would have been difficult to have attack'd them with open Force; ſo that Edward went another way to work: He brib'd the Governour or Conſtable of the Caſtle, who introduc'd him in the dead of the Night, thro' a ſubterranean Paſſage, and gave him an Opportunity to enter into his Mother's Apartment attended by ſome reſolute Perſons, to whom he had communicated his Deſign. The Earl of Marche was ſeiz'd in the Queen's Antichamber, and carried off, notwithſtanding the Tears and Cries of the Queen, who begg'd her Son, without ceaſing, to ſpare the Gallant Mortimer. Two of his Knights, who offer'd to make Reſiſtance, were kill'd. This done, the Earl was carried out of the Caſtle the ſame way that the King enter'd, which was af-

Next day Edward diſſolv'd the Parliament, and call'd a new one at Weſtminſter, wherein the King complain'd of the Queen's Male-Adminiſtration; and declar'd, that notwithſtanding his Minority, he would from this time forward govern by himſelf. Afterwards he caus'd Articles to be drawn up againſt the Earl of Marche, who, without being heard in his Defence †, becauſe his Crimes were ſo publickly notorious, was condemn'd to die the Death of Traitors, and ſuffer'd it accordingly, on the common Gallows at Tyburn ‡. Queen Iſabel was ſtripp'd of her Eſtate and Authority, and confined to the Caſtle of Riſings . Mezeray, and thoſe who have copy'd after him, were miſtaken when they ſaid that this Prince haſten'd his Mother's Death in this Caſtle, ſince 'tis certain that ſhe liv'd there Twenty-eight Years.

p. 452. Edward's Proclamation againſt Mortimer.

A PROCLAMATION dated the 20th of October 1330 [n], containing the King's Reaſons for apprehending the Earl of Marche. He declar'd alſo in this Proclamation, that being inform'd that thoſe who had hitherto held the Reins of Government had been guilty of Male-Adminiſtration, he was reſolv'd to govern, himſelf, with the Advice of the great Men of the Realm.

p. 452. His Proclamation for a new Parliament.

ANOTHER Proclamation [o], in which the King invites the Subjects to lay their Grievances before the Parliament, and complains bitterly of the laſt Seſſion, ſaying, That the Members had been corrupted, and therefore refus'd to hear the Grievances of the People. From thence he took occaſion to exhort the Sheriffs to promote the Election of ſuch Members, in their reſpective Counties, as were truly concern'd for the Welfare of their Country.

ANOTHER [x] directed to the Mayor, &c. of Bayonne, for delivering Gournay into the Hands of ſuch Perſons as the King ſhould ſend to bring him over Priſoner to England.

'TIS plain that our Hiſtorians are miſtaken, who aſſert that Gournay was apprehended at Marſeilles †‡†, ſince 'tis very manifeſt from the Fœdera, that it was done in Spain. The Ruffian's Head was cut off aboard the Ship that was carrying him to England, which was probably owing to the Intrigues of thoſe who were Accomplices in his Crime, that he might not diſcover who ſet him at work.

It ſeems that neither the Queen, Mortimer, nor any of their Attendants, knew of this Paſſage; a particular Deſcription of which, the Curious will find in Barnes's Hiſtory, p. 48.

† MR. Barnes obſerves, that in this reſpect he had the ſame Treatment as he had ſhewn before to the two Spenſers, and to the Earl of Kent, the King's Uncle.

‡ MOST of our Hiſtorians ſay, this Execution was on the 29th of November 1330; but Mr. Barnes proves that it was on the 26th, and that he was buried on the 29th, after he had hung two Days and two Nights by the King's ſpecial Command.

‡ THIS was Sir John Nevil of Horneby; to whom, as Barnes ſays, the King granted 200 Marks in Tail ſpecial, and in his 15th Year he was Governour of Newcaſtle upon Tyne, tho' Mr. Drayton and other Hiſtorians have ventur'd to ſay, that he was kill'd in the Arreſt of Mortimer; and Mr. Drayton miſtakes him for Mortimer's Friend; an Error for which Mr. Barnes excuſes him, becauſe he was a Poet.

ARTICLE II.

Affairs of Scotland.

Acts relating to the Truce with Scotland.

THE thirteen Years Truce between England and Scotland had been concluded about three Years when Edward III came to the Crown. It was one of the firſt Cares of his Council to maintain this Truce, and, if poſſible, to change it to a laſting Peace. There are ſeveral Acts in the Beginning of this Reign, which ſhew that this was then the Diſpoſition of the Court of England.

p. 256. THE firſt is an Order [g], the 15th of February, 1327, for the ſtrict Obſervation of the Peace with Scotland.

p. 270. THE ſecond is a full Power granted to certain Commiſſioners to treat of a final Peace with the Scots: It is dated the 4th of March following [h].

p. 271. King of Scotland breaks it.

THE third is Edward's Confirmation of the thirteen Years Truce. But Robert King of Scotland was otherwiſe inclin'd: He wanted to take an Advantage of Edward's Minority; and therefore, without any colour of Pretence, he broke the Truce *. His Generals, Murray and Douglas, advanc'd to the Frontiers with an Army of 25,000 Men, almoſt all Horſe, and committed ſome Ravages upon the Lands which the Engliſh ſtill poſſeſs'd in Scotland. This Invaſion engag'd the Engliſh to raiſe an Army of 60,000 Men, including the 500 Men of Arms which John of Hainault brought from his own Country to Edward's Aſſiſtance. As the King was on the Point of ſetting out from York, where he had aſſembled his Troops, a Quarrel happen'd betwixt the Forces of Hainault and the Archers of the County of Lincoln, in which a great deal of Blood was ſpilt on both ſides †. Nothing but Time could put an End to this Quarrel; and in the mean while, the Scots paſs'd over the Tine between Carliſle and Newcaſtle, and ravag'd the Northern Counties of England.

Quarrel in the Engliſh Army.

THE King iſſued an Order [i] for raiſing Troops; which is intitled, De Arraiatione facienda. This barbarous Word is form'd out of the old French Word Arrayer, which ſignifies to adorn, prepare, or put in Order; in Latin, inſtruere. The Engliſh have appropriated this Word to ſuch Troops as they accoutre for War; and they call a Commiſſion for raiſing Soldiers, a Commiſſion of Array; and the Commiſſioners are call'd Arrayers, as we find in p. 296 of Tome IV.

King Edward's Commiſſion of Array. p. 287.

THE Uproar being appeas'd, Edward march'd towards Durham in queſt of the Scots; but it was a long Time before he could hear any Tidings of them: Which made him ſo uneaſy, that he promis'd a Penſion of 100 l. Sterling, and the Honour of Knighthood, to the Man that ſhould bring him in ſight of the Enemy. He was inform'd, not many Days after, that they were encamp'd but two Leagues from him, over-againſt Stanhope Park, on the other ſide of the River Were. He poſted thither with the Army immediately, on purpoſe to give them Battel; but they were ſo advantagiouſly poſted, that he had no opportunity of attacking them: And the two Armies fac'd each other for a whole Fortnight, with only the River between them, without coming to a Battel. At laſt, the Scots retir'd in the Night-time, and by precipitant Marches return'd to their own Country, whither the Engliſh did not think fit to purſue them. Thus ended this firſt Expedition of Edward; the ill Succeſs of which was afterwards charg'd upon Mortimer, who was accus'd of having favour'd the Enemy's Retreat.

* ABOUT Eaſter 1327, Robert Bruce King of Scotland ſent a ſhort and briſk Defiance to King Edward and all his Realm, telling them, That he would ſhortly with his Power invade the Realm of England with Fire and Sword, and there do as he had done before, in his Father's Reign, at the Battel of Bannockbourn. See Barnes's Hiſtory.

† THIS Fray is particularly related by Mr. Barnes, who ſays, that John of Hainault, and his Foreign Auxiliaries, being very much favour'd by the young King and his Mother, becauſe they had formerly appear'd in Defence of 'em againſt the Spenſers, even when her own Brother the King of France had deſerted her Quarrel; the King and Queen-Mother made a magnificent Feaſt, on purpoſe to do Honour to the ſaid Foreigners; but that their Servants, by their Inſolence, ſo exaſperated the Engliſh, that near 3000 of the Archers gathering together, many of the Hainaulders were ſlain, and the reſt, with moſt of the Knights their Commanders, then at Court, forc'd to fly to their Lodgings in the Suburbs of York, where they fortify'd themſelves the beſt they could. He ſays, that in the Tumult ſome part of the City was fir'd; that 80 Archers, moſt of them Lincolnſhire Men, were kill'd that Day, which was Trinity-Sunday; and that at Night the Foreigners roſe privately, and ſlew about 300 of the Archers of Lincolnſhire and Northamptonſhire, for which 6000 Archers had combin'd and vow'd a deſperate Revenge, but that the King, to ſecure the Strangers from their Fury, ſet ſtrong Guards about them, and diſplac'd the Archers from their former Quarters, who by the King's Authority, and the earneſt endeavours of the great Men, who charitably took the Strangers part, were in ſome time pacify'd.

FOEDERA Tom. IV.

The confus'd Accounts of this Expedition.

THE Particulars which Hiſtorians relate of this Expedition are a little confus'd, but they may be explain'd by having regard to the Dates of the ſeveral Orders which Edward iſſu'd during the Campaign, and which are to be met with in this Tome of the Fœdera. It would be too tedious to ſhew the Miſtakes which ſome modern Hiſtorians have committed in this Affair; therefore this Remark ſhall ſuffice, in order to direct the Curious who would know more of the Matter, to conſult the Tome it ſelf.

A Penſion ſettled on Rokesby for bringing the King's Army to the Sight of the Scots. p. 312.

THE King's Order for ſettling a Penſion on Thomas Rokesby, for bringing him to the Sight of the Enemy [i] *.

QUEEN Iſabel and Mortimer, who ſat at the Helm of Government in England, did not think a War for their Intereſt, and ſhew'd a very great Inclination for Peace. The King of Scotland finding them thus diſpos'd, laid hold of the Opportunity, and caus'd a Propoſal to be made to them of a firm and laſting Peace between both Nations, which was immediately accepted. This Treaty (as has been partly obſerved already) was altogether to the Advantage of Scotland; for by it Edward quitted his Right to the Sovereignty of that Kingdom, as well as all his other Pretenſions, and reſtor'd to Robert all the Deeds on which they were founded, with all the Jewels taken at Edinburgh by Edward I, his Grandfather. Thirty-thouſand Marks, which Robert was to pay in three Years time, were reckon'd a valuable Conſideration for all theſe Reſtitutions; and the Peace was ſeal'd by the Marriage of Joan, Edward's Siſter, with David Prince of Scotland, who was but ſeven Years of Age. Thus was England a Sufferer through the Minority of its King, and the Male-Adminiſtration of thoſe who govern'd in his Name. In this Tome we have the authentick Act which Edward deliver'd as his Reſignation of all his Pretenſions upon Scotland. It is dated [k] the firſt of March, 1328.

Scandalous Peace with Scotland.

King's Reſignation of his Superiority over Scotland. p. 337.

King Robert Bruce's Death. p. 400.

KING Robert died in 1329 [l], and there is a Paſſport of King Edward [m], which was granted to James Earl of Douglas, who ſet out with his Heart for Jeruſalem †.

IN a very little time the Face of Affairs was chang'd, Edward became of Age, or at leaſt aſſum'd the Reins of Government; and Scotland in its Turn happen'd to be under a Minority, by the Death of Robert Bruce, who left his Son a Minor. The Fall of Queen Iſabel, and the Puniſhment of the Earl of Marche, gave the Engliſh Liberty to complain of the ſcandalous Peace which had been made with Scotland: And it was no difficult Task to perſuade young King Edward that he was not oblig'd to obſerve a Treaty ſo diſadvantagious to England, and which had been made before he came of Age. He reſolv'd therefore to ſet it aſide, but was oblig'd to ſtay 'till he had made an end of ſome Affairs with France; ſo that he did not enter into Meaſures for the Execution of his Project 'till the Year 1331. He did not intend an open Rupture with Scotland, becauſe the Scots gave him no Cauſe for it; but was reſolv'd upon another Method to carry his Point, which was to excite Troubles in Scotland, that might furniſh him with the Pretext he wanted. For this End he ſent for Edward Baliol, the Son of John Baliol, whom Edward I plac'd upon the Throne of Scotland, and afterwards depos'd, to come into England. It was now Thirty-two Years ſince the Baliol Family had renounc'd the Crown: John was dead, and his Son did not ſo much as once think of reviving his Pretenſions. Mean time, as he was neceſſary to King Edward, he careſs'd him to a very great degree, and made him believe that the Kingdom of Scotland properly belong'd to him: And to theſe Perſuaſions he added a poſitive Promiſe of Aſſiſtance to enable him to recover his Right. As Men are very apt to cloſe with what ſeems to tend to their Advantage, Baliol thought that Edward only acted out of pure good Will to him, and therefore embrac'd his Offer without Heſitation; whereas nothing was farther from Edward's Thoughts, whoſe only View was to make a Tool of him to ſerve his own Purpoſes. THIS Affair being thus ſettled, Edward took care to acquaint his Subjects privately, that they would do him a Pleaſure by aſſiſting Baliol in his Deſign to recover his Kingdom. This was a ſufficient Hint to engage ſeveral Perſons who had old Claims to Lands in Scotland, which they had obtain'd by the Bounty of Edward I, but loſt by the Revolution that happen'd in Affairs after the Coronation of Robert Bruce. They rais'd Troops therefore, and went and offer'd them to Baliol, who was reſolv'd to tranſport them by Sea to Scotland: Juſt as he was putting them aboard, Edward publiſh'd Proclamations, expreſly forbidding his Subjects to aſſiſt Baliol; but this was not done 'till it was too late to hinder it.

p. 529. We find this Proclamation dated the 9th of Auguſt 1332 [m], with an Order of the ſame Day to all the Inhabitants of the Northern Counties, ſtrictly to obſerve the Peace with Scotland. He had publiſh'd an Order of the like Nature the Edward's Juſtification; and from hence they pretend to demonſtrate, that he had no hand in Baliol's Undertaking. But beſides that it is not always ſafe to truſt to the Declarations of Princes, it is manifeſt that Edward was privy to Baliol's Deſigns from the very Beginning; becauſe the latter did not come into England without two good Paſſports from the King, the one dated the 20th of July, 1330 [o], and the other on the 10th of October following [p]. But that they had ſuch a Correſpondence and Concert, will appear yet farther by the Sequel.

EDWARD's Proclamation did not hinder Baliol from embarking his Troops to the Number of 2500 Men, with whom he ſail'd to Kinghorn, where he had ſcarce put them aſhore, but he was obliged to ſtand a Battle with the Lord Seaton, who was advanc'd with 10,000 Men to hinder his landing. The Neceſſity which the Engliſh were under of getting the Victory, in an Enemy's Country, where they had no Place of Retreat, made them fight deſperately, ſo that they routed the Scots Army. This firſt Succeſs procur'd Baliol freſh Succours, which were brought to him by the ancient Friends of his Family. With this Reinforcement he had the Courage to face the Earl of Fife, who follow'd at the Heels of the Lord Seaton with a powerful Army, which he beat as heartily as he did the former, and put to the Rout. Two Days after, he defeated another Army, commanded by Nigel Bruce, which was augmented by the broken Remains of the preceding; and finally, he routed the Earl of Fife a ſecond time, who advanc'd with a burning Thirſt of Revenge, but carry'd off a double Mortification. Four Battels thus gain'd in a few Days, put Baliol in a Condition to fear no conſiderable Oppoſition any longer: He advanc'd therefore farther into the Country, took Perth, or St. Johnſtoun, and Edinburgh; after which he went to Scoon, where he was crown'd, if not with the Conſent of all the Scots, yet at leaſt without Oppoſition *.

EDWARD III.

Baliol's Coronation.

WHILE theſe Things were tranſacting in Scotland, Edward artfully made uſe of ſome Troubles that happen'd in Ireland, for a Pretence to arm: For this End he aſſembled his Parliament, and told them the Neceſſity of his carrying an Army into Ireland, to ſettle the Affairs of that Iſland. His Deſign was approv'd, and the Parliament granted him a conſiderable Subſidy. He rais'd Troops therefore, and ſent them towards the Weſt, as if he intended to imbark them on that Coaſt: While they were on the March, he told the Parliament, That the Troubles in Scotland demanded his Preſence in the North, and that it was not ſafe to let the Frontiers lie naked, while their Neighbours were up in Arms. His Voyage to Ireland was broke off therefore, and his Troops deſign'd for that Iſland, had Orders to advance towards the Frontiers of Scotland. Edward began from that time to complain that the Scots had broke the Peace, and he pretended to Advice from good Hands, that they had a Deſign to invade England. Tho' this was a very ſhallow Complaint, conſidering the ſad State of the Scots Affairs at that Juncture, yet it was upon this Pretext that he rais'd freſh Troops, as appears by a Commiſſion MEAN time King David, after all his Loſſes, was retir'd with his Wife into France, leaving a Regent in Scotland, who did all that Man could do to retrieve his Maſter's Affairs, which were at a very low Ebb. pointing Commissioners to treat with them, as appears by his Full Powers[y]; but to conclude any thing, was far from his Intention: For at the same time he made a Treaty with Baliol, whereby he own'd him for King of Scotland; on which Condition the latter yielded him the Town and County of Berwick, and engag'd for himself and his Successors, to perform Homage and Allegiance to the Kings of England for the Crown of Scotland. The Act is dated[z] the 23d of November following; and plainly shews the secret Understanding there was betwixt Edward and Baliol. For the latter therein declar'd, That he had been crown'd by the Permission of Edward, and by the Assistance of the good People of England. He added, moreover, in this Act of Cession, that he had perform'd Homage and Allegiance for all Scotland, and for the Isles thereon depending; and that he had taken the Oath of Fidelity to him, in quality of his Vassal.

He makes a Treaty at the same time with Baliol, who does him Homage for the Realm of Scotland. p. 537.

p. 539. By another Act of the same Date, Baliol engag'd to succour Edward with all his Forces, as often as he should be requir'd; and openly acknowledg'd, that he had been crown'd by his Assistance. It must be observ'd, that these Acts are dated the 23d of November; that is to say, three Months after Baliol's Entrance into Scotland. Can any body imagine therefore, that Baliol could in so short a space of Time, and immediately after his Coronation, without any apparent Cause, take a Resolution to become a Vassal to Edward, and to yield Berwick to him, if there had not been a previous Agreement for that purpose before he engag'd in the Undertaking? Vain therefore are the Efforts of certain Writers to justify Edward upon this Article, since it is manifest that he was the first Author of this Expedition.

Another of Edward's Commissions to treat with the Envoys of the Regent of Scotland. p. 540.

YET, for all this, Edward continued to dissemble the Part he was acting, and to amuse the Regent of Scotland by Negotiations, as appears by another full Power which he granted to Commissioners to treat with him, dated at York the 14th of December following.

His Apology to the Pope. p. 540.

BUT this Disguise being seen thro' by the Publick, the Pope wrote to him, reproaching him for his Injustice to Scotland: And here we have Edward's Answer, dated the 15th of the same Month[a], wherein he endeavours to justify himself from the Suggestions of his Enemies, and for this End makes use of the same Argument we have already mention'd, viz. by giving the Pope to understand, that just as he was setting out for Ireland, he was inform'd that the Scots had a Design to invade his Dominions, and that this was the only Reason which engag'd him to march towards the Frontiers. The Date of this Answer of his to the Pope, is three Weeks after he had receiv'd Baliol's Homage.

IT was not long neither before the Regent of Scotland suspected Edward's Designs, who he imagin'd would not have brought so powerful an Army upon the Frontiers, if he had not had some ill Intention. Therefore he spent the whole Winter in raising an Army in those Counties which continued to declare for King David. This was enough to furnish the King of England with Matter of Complaint that the Scots intended to break the Peace, and to invade England; which, says Edward, oblig'd him to be beforehand with them; and he himself actually began the Hostilities; and when the Scots prepar'd to defend themselves, the Lord William Douglas, who had the Misfortune to be taken Prisoner by the English, was laid in Irons, as if he had been guilty of Rebellion or High-Treason.

His Apologies to the King of France and the Earl of Flanders, for the War with Scotland, p. 556, 557.

THE War being begun, Edward still pretended that the Scots were the Aggressors, and endeavour'd to make the King of France and the Earl of Flanders believe as much, by two Letters; that to the Earl of Flanders being dated[b] the 27th of April, 1333, and that to the King of France dated[c] the 7th of May following. This plainly shews what Precaution is necessary in the reading of the Letters of this and many other Princes, wherein we find the Truth so often disguis'd.

He besieges and takes Berwick. p. 564.

ALL the Motions of Edward ended at last in the Siege of Berwick, which he attack'd in July following, the 15th of which Month is the Date of its Capitulation. The Governour of it being inform'd that the Regent was advancing to raise the Siege, thought he should run no hazard by engaging to surrender the Place, if it was not reliev'd before the 20th Instant. No sooner was the Capitulation sign'd, but Edward heard that the Enemy was just at hand, and therefore he went to receive them upon Halydown Hill, where he gain'd one of the most signal Victories that the English ever obtain'd over Scotland. And here we have the King's Orders[d] for Thanksgivings for the said Victory, which was won, if I mistake not, upon the 18th of that Month *.

A Miſtake of Hiſtorians about Baliol's firſt Parliament, p. 590, to 595.

IN February 1334, Baliol held his firſt Parliament at Edinburgh, and not at Perth, as many Hiſtorians have affirm'd *; for Mr. Rymer has given us the Acts of the ſaid Parliament [e]. The Homage perform'd by Baliol was therein approv'd; England's Sovereignty over Scotland re-eſtabliſh'd, and the Surrender of Berwick confirm'd: Moreover, all the Acts paſs'd in the Reign of Robert Bruce were therein repeal'd, as having been made by illegal Authority.

Baliol's Grants to King Edward.

ON the 12th of June following, Baliol thinking he had not done enough for King Edward, was deſirous to give him a farther Teſtimony of his Gratitude, by an Inſtrument [f], whereby of his own accord and free Will, he gave him the Grant of Edinburgh, Roxburgh, Jedworth, Selkirk, and ſome other Towns, Caſtles, and Diſtricts, which lay convenient for England; of all which Places Edward immediately took poſſeſſion; as we find by two Acts of his [g].

p. 614.

Edward takes poſſeſſion of them. p. 616, 617.

THE Scots finding themſelves thus betray'd by their new King, began to take new Meaſures, and reſolv'd to periſh, rather than be any longer in Subjection to the King of England. They perceiv'd, without much Difficulty, that Edward was in reality King of Scotland more than Baliol; and that the latter was but a Tool to ſerve the Purpoſes of the King of England: Therefore they ſecretly aſſembled ſome Troops, with which they went and ſurpriz'd Baliol when he thought nothing of the Matter; and by that unexpected Attack entirely defeated him, and oblig'd him to mount a Horſe without a Saddle, and fly to Carliſle, from whence he ſent his Protector an Account of his Diſaſter.

Baliol defeated meerly by a Surprize.

King Edward revenges it by an Excurſion into Scotland, and after a ſhort Truce ravages it again.

EDWARD was too deeply engag'd in his Affair, to leave his Work unfiniſh'd and imperfect; therefore he march'd into Scotland, where he ravag'd ſeveral Counties, and then return'd into his Dominions. The Scots aſſembled again in the following Winter, in order to make head againſt another Invaſion, which they apprehended from Edward; but the King of France procur'd a Truce for them to the end of June, which gave them ſome Reſpite. As ſoon as it was expir'd, Edward ravag'd Scotland a ſecond time, but could not bring the Scots to a Battel, becauſe they were afraid to expoſe the few Troops they had left. Mean time the Earl of Namur, who ſerv'd England, was taken by the Scots, but ſet at liberty by Murray the Regent of Scotland; who, to extend his Generoſity to him yet further, thought fit to accompany him to the Frontiers, and had the Misfortune to be taken Priſoner himſelf by the Garriſon of Roxburgh, upon the 13th of Auguſt. After Edward had done all that he liſted in Scotland, at the Requeſt of the Pope and the King of France, he granted a Truce 'till the Feaſt of Eaſter, 1336 [h].

Edward grants another ſhort Truce. p. 674, 675, 676, 681, 684, 685.

DURING this Truce, King David, who was all the while a Refugee in France, had the Liberty of ſending Ambaſſadors into England to treat of an Accommodation, but it all came to nothing. Thoſe Negotiations are the Subject of ſeveral Acts in this Collection, which are of the leſs Importance, becauſe they were of no Effect. Tho' Baliol ſtill bore the Title of King of Scotland, he had no more Authority there; for Edward was Lord of all, and he only allow'd Baliol five Marks a Day for his Subſiſtence.

As ſoon as the Truce was expir'd, Edward march'd a third time into Scotland, as appears by diverſe of his Orders, dated at Perth, or St. Johnſtoun, from the 3d of July to the 3d of September, 1336.

IN the next Article we ſhall find the Motive which inclin'd that Prince to give the Scots ſome Reſpite, tho' he would not have abandoned his Enterprize nevertheleſs, if he had not thought them ſufficiently reduced. Here end the Acts of this Fourth Tome, which relate to Scotland.

IN our Account of the Second Tome of the Fœdera, the Foundation of the King of England's Pretenſions to Scotland is ſtated at large, and it is left to the Reader to judge whether Edward III was juſtifiable in reviving them, after they had been ſo ſolemnly renounc'd, and whether the Ways and Means he made uſe of for this End were regular. They who have endeavour'd to juſtify him upon this Article, have rather given Proofs of their Prepoſſeſſion than of their Sincerity; the Prepoſſeſſion, I mean, of England's Sovereignty over Scotland, which has been for a long time the favourite Paſſion of the Engliſh Politicians, and is ſo ſtill with ſome; for not many Years ago, Books were publiſh'd upon this very Subject with as much Earneſtneſs as if the Affair was a new Subject of Controverſy; but it is to be hoped that the Union of the two Kingdoms has now almoſt entirely quaſh'd this Contention, which has already been of too long ſtanding.

ARTICLE III.

Affairs of France.

FEW People are Strangers to the great and famous Quarrel between Edward III and Philip of Valois, concerning the Crown of France, and the War that broke out betwixt thoſe two Princes upon that occaſion. This Fourth Tome contains only the Preparations for this bloody War; ſuch Preparations as laſted eight or nine Years before Edward declar'd actual War. Tho' the Tranſactions during thoſe nine Years may ſeem of little Importance at firſt, yet ſeveral Inſtructions may be gather'd from the Acts which this Tome furniſhes for that Period, or rather Parentheſis of Time. They let us in a great meaſure into Edward the Third's Character, whoſe Enterprizes were attended with ſuch great and happy Succeſſes, that Hiſtorians have ſlightly paſs'd over the minuteſt of his Actions, in order to expatiate upon the moſt conſiderable. In the Narrative of his Victories they have taken vaſt Delight to extol his Valour, his Prudence, Generoſity, and the Sublimity of his Genius; and every body muſt acknowledge that the Encomia they gave him were his Due. But all this is not ſufficient to make up the complete Character of this Prince; which, to be perfectly acquainted with, the Reader ſhould know his Suppleneſs in Negotiations, and ſome other Circumſtances attending his Actions of a lower Claſs; which ſhew that his Virtue was not of the moſt rigid kind, or at leaſt that he was convinc'd that Diſſimulation was not incompatible with the Virtues of a great King. This was a Fault which he was guilty of in common with many great Princes, who were as careleſs as he of the Reputation they left to Poſterity; tho' ſuch a Care or Regard ought to be as great a Conſtraint and Check to them, as the Fear of the Laws is to private Perſons. We have ſeen a remarkable Inſtance of this Inſincerity in Edward, in the Deſigns which he form'd againſt Scotland; and the remaining part of this Tome furniſhes us with ſome other Proofs of it in his Conduct to Philip de Valois, before he formally enter'd upon that War which he had long been contriving againſt him.

King Edward's Character.

AS ſoon as Edward was ſeated on the Throne, the Queen his Mother, and Mortimer, who govern'd all Affairs, and as much dreaded a War with France as with Scotland, conſulted how to put an end to all the Differences which England had with France. The laſt Treaty which Iſabel concluded at Paris, had left ſome things undetermin'd, that were capable of producing Quarrels between the two Crowns, and which it was therefore neceſſary to prevent, eſpecially during Edward's Minority. Accordingly Ambaſſadors were ſent to France about a Month after the King's Coronation, in order to ſettle all the Matters in diſpute [m], and they concluded a Treaty the 31ſt of March [n]; by which it was ſtipulated, among other things, that Edward ſhould pay Charles the Fair Fifty-thouſand Marks Sterling for the Charges of the preceding War, and demoliſh the Caſtles of the condemn'd Lords of Gaſcoigne, who were moreover pardon'd as to Life and Member, provided that they obey'd the Ban, i. e. ſubmitted to Baniſhment. Tho' Edward did not much mind the Execution of this Treaty, yet the two Kings liv'd in Peace all the reſt of this Year.

Ambaſſadors ſent to France, p. 264, 267.

Treaty with Charles the Fair of France, p. 279.

ABOUT the Beginning of 1328, a freſh Quarrel broke out between the two Crowns, of much greater Importanee than that which was lately accommodated. Charles the Fair happen'd to die on the firſt of February, without Male-Iſſue; but Blanche, his Queen, was ſeven Months gone with Child. It was given out, that before his Death he nominated his Couſin-German, Philip de Valois, to be Regent 'till the Queen was brought to bed. On the other hand, Edward demanded the Regency, as the neareſt Relation of the deceas'd King, to whom he was Nephew;

whereas

FOEDERA Tom. IV.

whereas Philip, as has been ſaid, was no more than Couſin-German. This was a Queſtion which the States of the Kingdom were aſſembled to decide. Philip founded his Plea upon the Salic Law; which, ſaid he, excluded all Women and their Deſcendants from the Crown, and by conſequence from the Regency. Edward argu'd on the other hand, that the Salic Law only excluded Women from the Crown on account of their Sex, and not the Male-Iſſue deſcended from ſuch Women, becauſe they had not that Imbecillity of Sex. The States however adjudg'd the Regency to Philip de Valois, during the Queen's Pregnancy; who being brought to bed of a Daughter on the firſt of April that ſame Year, Philip de Valois was own'd King of France, and crown'd the 28th of May following.

Before we proceed further, 'tis neceſſary to obſerve, that the Subject in Debate has been attended with ſome Difficulties that were never fully clear'd up, and which ſome Acts in this Tome may help to elucidate or reſolve. The firſt Difficulty is to know whether Edward ſent Ambaſſadors into France to demand the Regency immediately after the Death of Charles the Fair. 2. Whether the States of France made two Decrees, one for aſſigning the Regency to Philip, another for adjudging the Crown to him. 3. Whether Edward's Ambaſſadors demanded the Crown for their Maſter, after Queen Blanche's Delivery; whether they were heard, and whether the States determin'd for Philip, after Conſideration of the Arguments brought by both Claimants. 4. It will be neceſſary to examine where the Knot of the Queſtion between the two Claimants chiefly lay; a Diſpute which the French Hiſtorians ſeem to have hurry'd over in too general a manner, and with very great Confuſion, as if they were afraid to loſe Ground by a cloſe Diſcuſſion of Particulars. I hope therefore it will not be unacceptable if I make a ſhort Pauſe upon each of the ſeveral Queſtions, becauſe the great Conſequences with which this famous Proceſs was attended, render this Subject one of the moſt conſiderable Articles in the Hiſtories of France and England.

Diſpute betwixt Edward and Philip de Valois about the Regency of France.

I. ALL the French Hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm, that Edward ſent Ambaſſadors to France to demand the Regency; and they mention the very Speech which they made to the States of that Kingdom, with their very Allegations, and the Anſwer return'd to them by Robert of Artois, who was then a great Stickler for Philip. But among all the Engliſh Hiſtorians, I know not one who mentions this Embaſſy: And in all the Acts of this fourth Tome, which contains a multitude of others that are of leſs Importance, there's not a ſingle Sentence to be found which gives room to believe that Edward ſent any Ambaſſadors upon this Errand. 'Tis likewiſe to be ſuppos'd, that Queen Iſabel and the Earl of Marche, who manag'd all the Affairs of the Realm, would not have offer'd at any ſuch thing, for fear of engaging themſelves in a War with France, ſince the ſaid Queen and Earl, for the ſake of avoiding a War with Scotland, had preſum'd viſibly to betray the Intereſts of their Pupil. Theſe Reaſons make it ſhrewdly ſuſpicious, that the Speeches of the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, and of Robert of Artois, were invented by Paul Emilius, who publiſh'd them, or by ſome other Hiſtorian. Nevertheleſs this is but a negative Proof, which cannot entirely be depended on, ſince all the French Hiſtorians agree in the contrary. But be it as it will, whether Edward did or did not ſend Ambaſſadors to demand the Regency, 'tis certain that he look'd upon the States Determination in favour of Philip de Valois, as a piece of Injuſtice done to himſelf, being very ſenſible of the Advantage which his Competitor might reap from the Regency, in caſe the Queen Dowager ſhould be brought to bed of a Daughter. This appears from the Letters which he wrote during the Interval between the Decree made about the Regency and the Queen's Lying-in, who was not brought to bed 'till the Month of April. Theſe Letters, directed to ſeveral Noblemen of Guyenne, to the Univerſities, Biſhops, Priors, Abbots, Knights, and Gentlemen of eighteen Towns of Navarre, to twenty-nine Noblemen of Foix and Languedoc, and to nineteen Towns of this latter Province, imported that he intended to recover his Inheritance by one means or another, when he ſaw it a proper Time. One would be apt to think, that by his Inheritance he meant Guyenne, if in ſome of thoſe Letters he did not plainly talk of the Inheritance of his Mother: This ſhews that he ſpoke of the Kingdom of France, as well as of Navarre, which was in the ſame Caſe, and not of Guyenne, to which his Mother had no Right. Theſe Letters are dated [a] the 28th of March, 1328, before the Queen's Lying-in.

II. THE ſecond Difficulty to be ſolv'd, is to know whether the States that had given the Regency to Philip de Valois, immediately after the Death of Charles the Fair, did by a ſecond Sentence decree the Crown to him likewiſe, after the Queen Dowager's Delivery. Here we find a mighty Confuſion in the French Hiſtorians, who jumble theſe two Queſtions together, which they ought by all means to have ſtated ſeparately. They ſay indeed, that the States ſettled the Regency on Philip; and they affirm likewiſe, that the States ſet the Crown upon his Head: But when they talk of the latter Decree, it looks as if they meant the former relating to the Regency, becauſe they there bring in the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, and put the very ſame Speech into their Mouths which they made, when they demanded the Regency for their Maſter; and they make Robert of Artois return juſt the ſame Anſwer. It is impoſſible that the ſame Things ſhould happen on thoſe two different Occaſions: The Reaſon is plain; for ſuppoſing that the Ambaſſadors of England were preſent at the firſt Decree of the States about the Regency, which I am loth either to affirm or deny, for the Reaſons mention'd in the foregoing Article; it is however certain, that they were not preſent when the Crown was decreed to Philip; and that they did not demand it, becauſe they had not yet receiv'd Orders about it. What I have now mention'd, is evident from two deciſive Pieces in this Collection. The firſt is a full Power granted by Edward to his Ambaſſadors, to demand the Crown of France in his Name; which full Power is dated [p] the 16th of May, 1328, only twelve Days before Philip's Coronation.

Confuſion in the French Writers.

King Edward's Demand of the Crown of France, p. 354.

Now that the Engliſh Ambaſſadors could get to Paris, or ſuppoſing them there already, that they could receive their Commiſſion, and execute it; that a Queſtion ſo important ſhould be examin'd and determin'd in an Aſſembly of the States, where, according to Mezeray, Parties ran very high; and finally, that the Preparations for the Coronation, and the Ceremony it ſelf, ſhould be perform'd in the ſpace of twelve Days; that ſo ſhort a ſpace of Time, I ſay, ſhould be ſufficient for all thoſe Things, is a Matter almoſt paſt Belief. The ſecond Piece is a ſort of Manifeſto by King Edward, which we meet with in the 5th Tome of the Fœdera: In the ſaid Manifeſto, Edward expreſly complains, that his Ambaſſadors had not been heard, and that they had even run the hazard of their Lives. All this gives room to believe, that there was no ſolemn Sentence given touching the Crown, and that when Philip de Valois had obtain'd the Regency, he never troubled his Head about a ſecond Deciſion, but caus'd himſelf to be crown'd; imagining that the ſame Reaſons which made him a Regent, conſtituted him King. It muſt be own'd, at leaſt, that if there was a ſecond Decree, it was made with very great Precipitation, and without the Intervention of the Engliſh Ambaſſadors.

III. THE third Difficulty is explain'd under the ſecond Head, and therefore it is not neceſſary to inſiſt on it again.

IV. THO' Edward ſeem'd tacitly to acquieſce in the Decree of the States, yet he never abandon'd his Deſign to aſſert his Right when a fair Opportunity ſhould offer; but his Age, the Subjection in which he was kept by his Mother and Mortimer, and the War with Scotland which enſu'd, hindered him from openly diſcovering his Deſign, 'till the Year 1337, as we ſhall ſhew preſently. But as this Affair was attended with terrible Conſequences, and was, as it were, the Beginning and Cauſe of the moſt remarkable Tranſactions mention'd in the Hiſtories of France and England for above a Century, it is neceſſary to explain the fourth Difficulty, which is to know exactly upon what Plea Edward grounded himſelf, when he undertook to wreſt the Crown of France out of the Hands of Philip. It ſeems as if the main View of the French Authors, was to render this Matter obſcure, by treating it in a general way, and inſinuating that Edward diſputed with the French the Authority of their Salic Law, of which they had been in Poſſeſſion near a thouſand Years: By this means, if I may venture to ſay it, they have miſled their Readers, and prejudic'd a multitude of People againſt Edward's Pretenſions.

A juſt Reflection on the French Authors.

THE Salic Law, according to which the French exclude Women from the Crown, is only founded upon Tradition; for never was any Original, or Authentick Copy of it produc'd. The Author of it and its Vouchers are alike unknown; for they only quote an old Chronicle, without giving us either its Date or Author, which aſcribes the Glory of it to Pharamond, the firſt King known among the French. From Pharamond to the Death of Lewis Huttin, that is to ſay, for almoſt 900 Years, it was not put in practice; at leaſt we know of no publick Act, or any Fact related in ancient Hiſtories, to prove beyond diſpute that the French govern'd themſelves by this Law in the Diſpoſal of their Crown. This will no doubt be thought very ſtrange, by thoſe who are already prepoſſeſſed in its favour; therefore it is neceſſary to enter into a ſhort Detail upon this Subject, and briefly to run over the three Races or Families of the French Monarchs.

Salic Law.

[p] At Northampton.

FOEDERA Tom. IV.

The Merovingian Race of France.

WHILE the Family of Meroveus was upon the Throne, there are but three Inſtances that can be produced to prove the Practice of this Law; and all three too weak to ſupport the Inferences which ſome would fain deduce from them. The firſt is taken from the Settlement which was made of the Crown after the Death of Childebert King of Paris, whoſe two Daughters were depriv'd of their Father's Succeſſion. See what Mezeray ſays upon this Subject, in his Abridgment. Their Uncle Clotaire, either in hatred of their Father, or for fear leſt they ſhould pretend to the Succeſſion, detain'd them in Priſon 'till he was ſure of the Kingdom. This is the firſt Inſtance of the Salic Law in Favour of the Males. Is it poſſible to bring a more ſilly Allegation than that to prove the Authority of this Law, ſince it manifeſtly diſcovers that it was Force only which depriv'd thoſe Daughters of Childebert of their Father's Inheritance! The ſecond Inſtance may be fetch'd from the Hiſtory of the Succeſſion after the Death of Cherebert King of Paris. This Prince had left three Daughters, of which the two eldeſt were Baſtards and Nuns. Bertha, who was the youngeſt, and was afterwards the Wife of Ethelbert King of Kent in England, was hinder'd from ſucceeding her Father, by her three Uncles, Gontran, Sigebert and Chilperic: But this was likewiſe by Force, and not by vertue of the Salic Law, of which no Hiſtory makes mention in this Place. In order to prove that this Succeſſion was by vertue of the Salic Law, the ſaid Law ſhould either be produc'd in due Form, or at leaſt it ſhould be proved that it had been put in Practice before: But the Inſtance I gave juſt now is the only one that precedes this; and, as I have before ſhewn that to be inſufficient, there's no making uſe of it upon this Occaſion. The third Inſtance is taken from the Succeſſion of Gontran, which his Brothers ſhar'd betwixt them, becauſe he had left only one Daughter: But this Daughter was a Nun, and by conſequence not capable of ſucceeding. Beſides, Hiſtory ſays no where, that Gontran's Brothers ſucceeded to him by vertue of the Salic Law, but only that they ſhar'd the Succeſſion; which they were like enough to do, as well by Force as by legal Right; the rather, becauſe 'tis well known that the French Princes were not over ſcrupulous at that time. All who underſtand any thing of the Hiſtory of France, know full well that in thoſe Days Force had a greater Share than the Laws, in the Diſtribution of the Kingdoms into which that Monarchy was divided. Towards the Concluſion of this Race, the Mayors of the Palace * took upon them to place ſuch Princes of the Royal Family on the Throne as they thought fit, without troubling themſelves with the Laws of the Country, Laws which are moreover very much unknown to us.

EDWARD III.

The Carlovingian Race.

IN the Carlovingian Race, which ſucceeded next, to the Throne, we don't find that the Daughters were depriv'd of the Crown by vertue of the Salic Law; nor am I certain that there was ever any occaſion to put it in Execution. Be this as it will, we learn on the contrary, that, towards the end of this Race, the Deſcendants of Charlemagne, by the Female ſide, diſmember'd that potent Monarchy, as Mezeray ſomewhere obſerves; and all the while it does not appear that the Salic Law was ſo much as once oppoſed to their Pretenſions.

The Capetian Race.

As to the Third, namely the Capetian Race, 'tis certain that there was no occaſion to put that pretended Law in Execution for above 300 Years: And if any ſhould offer to object that never any Women ſucceeded to the Crown from the beginning of the Monarchy, that's ſaying nothing to the purpoſe; for by the ſame Reaſon it may be prov'd, that there's a Law which excludes from the Crown thoſe that are born blind, becauſe ſince Pharamond no one that was born blind ever aſcended the Throne. To this we may add, that if the Salic Law had been eſtabliſhed and own'd in France, Hugh Capet, who diſtributed among the Grandees of his Realm thoſe Lands, of which Duchies, Earldoms, and Lordſhips were afterwards form'd, would not have fail'd to ſubject thoſe Lands to that ſame Law; becauſe no body could have taken it ill, if he had ſubjected the Parts to the ſame Law to which the Whole was ſubject. Nevertheleſs he did not do it; for on the contrary, it is certain that the great Fiefs belonging to the Crown deſcended to the Females, as is poſitively affirm'd both by Paſquier and Mezeray. But I do not pretend by this to combat the Right of the Males as for what relates to the Time preſent; the States of the Realm having thus eſtabliſh'd it, being a ſufficient Conſideration to put it out of all manner of

* THESE Maires du Palais, as the French call them, were Officers, whoſe Authority was ſo exorbitant, that they were not only the Guardians, but Governours of ſome of their ancient Kings, and either enthron'd or dethron'd them at their Will and Pleaſure. Hiſtory tells us, that Clouis II, and the ten Kings that follow'd him, to the concluſion of the Merovingian Race, were call'd Faineans, i. e. Idle Drones, becauſe inſtead of minding the Government themſelves, they left all to theſe Mayors, to whom every body made their Court, while the Princes ſpent their Time in Pleaſures, and were in a manner kept Priſoners in their Palaces, with ſuch Servants as the Mayor pleas'd, who were rather Spies upon them, than Attendants: And this very Clouis marry'd a Slave belonging to the Mayor of his Palace. Vid. Mezeray.

Diſpute:

FOEDERA Tom. IV.

Diſpute: Neither do I propoſe to treat of any thing but what paſs'd down to the firſt Deciſion of the States of the Realm, made after the Death of Lewis Huttin; which was not many Years before the Proceſs now in queſtion. To this Enquiry into the Salic Law in general, it is neceſſary to add another for the ſake of particular Caſes which have reſpect to that Law, by ſhewing what regard was had to it from the Death of Lewis Huttin, to that of Charles the Fair.

A farther Inquiry into the Salic Law.

Lewis Huttin, who died in 1316, only left one Daughter nam'd Joan; his Queen Dowager being then with Child, the States choſe to ſtay 'till ſhe was deliver'd, before they diſpos'd of the Crown: For if ſhe had been brought to bed of a Son, this Son muſt have ſucceeded the Father; not by vertue of the Salic Law, but by vertue of a Law common to all States where the Males are preferr'd before the Females in the ſame degree of Kindred. 'Till the ſaid Queen was brought to Bed, Philip, Brother to the deceas'd King, was declar'd Regent; an Honour which young Joan his Niece was not in a Condition to diſpute with him, becauſe ſhe her ſelf was under the neceſſity of having a Guardian. But Mezeray obſerves, that the Duke of Burgundy, Joan's Uncle by the Mother's ſide, made Preparation to aſſert his Niece's Right in caſe the Queen Dowager miſcarry'd, or was deliver'd of a Daughter. Mean time the Queen was brought to Bed of a Son nam'd John, who was immediately recogniz'd for King, but did not live above eight Days; whereupon a great Quarrel aroſe about the Succeſſion. Charles Count de Valois, Uncle to the deceas'd King, and the Duke of Burgundy, declared openly for Joan againſt her Uncle Philip; in which they both ſet up againſt their own Intereſts, becauſe as they were Princes of the Blood, the Salic Law was advantagious to their Families. This ſhews that the ſaid Law was not yet firmly eſtabliſh'd, becauſe the firſt Princes of the Blood, and the chief Peers of the Realm, made no Scruple to maintain a Right which was directly againſt it. Be that as it will, the States decided in Favour of Philip, who was ſurnam'd the Long, and was the fifth King of France of that Name. This now was the firſt clear, exact and undiſputed Deciſion that the States of France ever made in Favour of the Salic Law, which was 900 Years after the Foundation of the French Monarchy. Philip the Long dying after a ſhort Reign, and leaving only three Daughters, his Brother Charles the Fair ſucceeded him without Oppoſition, to the Prejudice of his Nieces. This again was a ſecond incontеſted Deciſion in Favour of the Males.

Laſtly, after the Death of Charles the Fair, who left his Queen alſo with Child, the Diſpute now in queſtion aroſe between Edward III and Philip de Valois for the Regency, or rather for the Crown of France. Thus I have given you the moſt material Paſſages, with reſpect to the Salic Law, from the very Foundation of the French Monarchy. EDWARD III.

A State of the Queſtion between Edward and Philip de Valois.

Now, in order to give a true State of the Controverſy between Edward and Philip de Valois, it muſt be conſider'd that they both laid down the Salic Law for the Baſis of their Pretenſions. The only difference between them was, that Philip would have it to extend to the Deſcendants of the Females; whereas Edward inſiſted, that it ought to extend only to the Females, becauſe of the Imbecility of the Sex; and not to their Male-Deſcendants who had not that Incapacity. It is therefore plain, that thoſe who have aſſerted that Edward directly oppugned the Salic Law, have not ſtated the Queſtion as it ought to be; for Edward was too wiſe a Prince to reject a Law which was the only Baſis of his Right.

An Overſight of ſome Hiſtorians detected.

FOR without the Salic Law, what Right had Charles the Fair to the Crown, when his elder Brother had left three Daughters? And if Charles had not had a Right to the Crown, how could his Siſter Iſabel, who was Edward's Mother, come by any Right to it? Beſides, if the Salic Law had not taken Place, Edward himſelf would have had no Right to the Crown; becauſe the Daughters of Philip the Long, the Daughters of Charles the Fair, and his own Mother, who was ſtill alive, would have come in before him. Therefore he was far from diſputing the Authority of this Law, which, whether true or not, was ſo much for his Advantage; but he maintain'd that it extended to the Females only, and not to their Deſcendants: From whence he inferr'd, that as he was the neareſt Male Heir to the deceaſed King, the Crown devolv'd to him by Right of Affinity; and not to Philip de Valois, who was not ſo near a-kin by one Degree. Philip on his part maintain'd, that the Law excluded not only the Females, but their Deſcendants; and this was properly the very Queſtion now to be decided by the States of the Realm. In order to form a Judgment of this Proceſs by the ordinary Rules of Juſtice, it were neceſſary to have recourſe to the Law it ſelf, or to Precedents; but neither the one nor the other is to be found. The Salic Law was no where in being, and in all the Hiſtory of France there was not a ſingle Inſtance to be met with that match'd the preſent Caſe: For the two foregoing Deciſions of the States, with reſpect to Philip the Long and Charles the Fair, and which at the same time were the only ones to be met with in the History of France, did in no Sense come up to it: It is true, they establish'd the Authority of the Salic Law, but they had no View to the Exclusion of the Descendants of Females, the only Point in Controversy. This, by the way, confirms me in my Opinion, that the Harangues inserted by Paul Emilius, I mean the Speech of the English Ambassadors, and the Answer of Robert of Artois, are spurious; because neither the one nor the other enters into the Knot of the Question. If it was a difficult Matter to prove the Existence of the Salic Law, as I have already demonstrated, it was no less difficult to explain it, for want of considering its Terms and Circumstances. Nevertheless, there was a necessity of giving Judgment one way or another; and the States decided the Matter in favour of Philip de Valois, to which they were determin'd probably by four Reasons. 1. That Isabel could not convey a Right to her Son, which she had not her self. 2. That Edward was a Foreigner, born out of the Realm. 3. That he was still a Minor: And, 4. That they were afraid of a Civil War if they should award the Crown to that Prince; and that if such a War should be the Consequence, they had rather expose themselves to the Hazards of a Foreign one. But these are Reasons which this is not a Place to enquire into. It is sufficient to observe, that the Decision of the States was new and unprecedented; that it was not taken from the Law it self, and that it was purely grounded upon Reasons of State. From hence, therefore, I cannot help concluding, that Edward's Pretensions were not so extravagant as the French Authors would have them commonly understood. A grand Decision, which is supported neither by the Law it self, nor any preceding Decree, is necessarily subjected, which way soever we turn it, to the Reproaches of the Party who loses the Cause, without any Reflection upon the weakness of the Reasons urg'd by the Complainant. Edward therefore might complain, that the Affair had been wrong decided, as to the Matter of it, and that the Award was null and void as to the Form of it, because it had been pass'd with too much Precipitancy; and particularly because his Ambassadors had been deny'd a Hearing. And if to all this we add, that it is extremely probable there was no other Decree of the States than that which awarded the Regency to Philip, it will naturally be suppos'd that Edward did not complain without Reason; and it was this very Consideration that made him take a Resolution to maintain his Right by Force of Arms. I hope to have Pardon for this Digression, tho' it is not borrow'd from the Acts of the Fœdera, where nothing is to be found that sets forth Edward's Right in particular; for in all the Acts where any mention is made of it, the said Right is all along suppos'd as devolv'd to Edward by the Death of Charles the Fair, without entering into the particular Merits of the Cause. EDWARD III.

Decision of the States of France in favour of Philip de Valois consider'd.

A Vindication of Edward's Pretensions.

BUT though the Acts of the Fœdera do not give us the particular Reasons on which the said Prince founded his Pretensions to the Crown of France; yet they plainly discover that he intended some time or other to assert his Right; contrary to the Opinion of those Writers who affirm that he was put upon it by Robert of Artois, and of others, who pretend that he never design'd it 'till the Year 1339, when he was provok'd by the Flemings, which we shall take notice of in the Account of the next Tome.

IT was with this View that in June 1328, King Edward form'd the Project of a League against France, with the Duke of Brabant, and all the Towns and People of that Province, as well as all those Noblemen in particular, who were inclin'd to engage in his Service, as appears from several Commissions which he dispatch'd that very Year.

His League with the Brabanters against France.

WE find in a full Power which he gave to his Commissioners, dated the 22d of August 1328 [q], that he order'd them to demand of the Duke of Brabant, and all who would enter into his Service, that they should engage to serve him as well in Peace, as in a time of War, against any King or Prince whatsoever. This is a manifest Indication, that the Person aim'd at was the King of France, with whom he was then at Peace, and against whom he nevertheless intended a War; for if this League had a View to the Scots, he needed not to have been so careful in the wording of his Commission. P. 366.

THERE is another full Power to his Envoys [r], to treat with the Count de Loos, and all manner of Persons that were dispos'd to engage in his Service. P. 366.

THERE's one of the like nature [s], to the Seneschal of Gascoigne, and the Constable of Bourdeaux, impowering them to treat upon the same Foot with the Count d'Armagnac, the Viscount of Lomagne, the Lord of Albret, and with all manner of Persons of what Rank or Condition soever. Shall it be said then, that all these Preparations were made against Scotland, with which Nation his Majesty had but just concluded a Peace? No; for it appears on the contrary, that they P. 367.

were design'd France, by certain Letters Patent [t], the 16th of the same Month, by which his Majesty engag'd himself to make neither Peace nor Truce with France, without including the Towns and Nobility of Gascoigne. Nor can it be said that he had a mind to go to War with France for any Interests or Views less than for the Crown it self, because he had settled all his other Disputes with that Kingdom but the very Year before.

PHILIP of Valois, who was engag'd in a War against the Flemings from the beginning of his Reign, was in no great haste to demand King Edward's Homage for the Dutchy of Guyenne, and Earldom of Ponthieu; for it was not 'till March 1329, that he summon'd him to go over and pay it in Person. Edward was very loth to go and humble himself to a Prince, whom he look'd upon as no better than an Usurper; but his Council was of another Opinion, and it was agreed that he should go and pay the Homage himself. Our Prince was as yet under the Guardianship of his Mother and of the Earl of Marche, who thought a War extremely prejudicial to their Interests, as plainly appear'd by the Peace which they had made with Scotland. It is very probable therefore that it was by their Interest that the aforesaid Opinion was carry'd in Council, on purpose to avoid a War, which would have been inevitable if this Homage had been refus'd. Mean while Edward's Compliance was sorely against the Grain, tho' he had not Resolution enough as yet to resist those to their Faces who had the Management of his Affairs. Mr. Barnes, who wrote the History of his Life, avers, that he made an open Protestation before all his Council, against the Homage which he was to pay, that his Pretensions to the Crown of France might not be thereby prejudic'd. And though we have nothing like this in the Fœdera, yet all the Measures taken by this Prince, both before and after the Homage, render this Circumstance very probable. All we have in that Collection upon this Subject is a Letter from King Edward to Philip, in which he acquainted him, that he had for a great while resolv'd to pay his Duty to him, but that several Affairs had interven'd to hinder him. This Letter is dated the 14th of April 1329 [u]. He went over to France on the 15th of May, and perform'd his Homage at Amiens, on the 6th of June following. The Instrument, or Deed of Homage, containing all the Particulars which pass'd upon that occasion, discovers some things which may serve to clear up Facts that have been wrong explain'd by certain French Historians.

King Edward's Letter to Philip de Valois, about his Homage. P. 381.

PHILIP had claim'd * Liege Homage of Edward for the Dutchy of Guyenne, and the Earldom of Ponthieu; but in the Conferences which were held upon that Subject before the Ceremony, Edward protested, That he was not certain whether he ought to render Liege Homage, and therefore he refus'd to perform it otherwise than in general Terms Nevertheless he promis'd upon his Honour, That if it should appear to him, after he had consulted his own Archives, that the Homage ought to be Liege, he would recognize the same by Letters Patent under his Great Seal. And upon this Condition he was admitted to perform only a Verbal Homage.

The History of it.

THE Instrument above-mention'd imports, that Edward appearing before Philip, Miles de Noyers, Viscount of Melun, Great Chamberlain of France, said to him, SIRE, The King would have you understand, that he does not admit you to Homage for the Lands which he possesses and ought to possess in Gascoigne and the Agenois; as to which Lands the late King Charles protested, that he never meant to receive Homage. Then the Bishop of Lincoln protested on his part for Edward, That the Homage he was performing should not prejudice his Right to all Guyenne, and all its Dependencies; and that France should not thereby acquire a new Right. After this, he deliver'd a Schedule to the Chamberlain, containing the Form of the Homage; upon the receiving of which Schedule the Great Chamberlain said to the King of England. "SIRE, You become Liege-"man to my Lord the King, for the "Dutchy of Guyenne and its Dependen-"cies, which you acknowledge to hold "from him, as Peer of France, and "Duke of Guyenne, according to the "Form of the Peace made between his "and your Predecessors, the Kings of "France and England, and according as "you and your Ancestors, the Dukes of "Guyenne, have perform'd for the said "Dutchy to his Ancestors, the Kings of "France." The King of England answer'd, Yes. Then the Chamberlain proceeding said, SIRE, The King of France receives you according to the Protestations already made: To which the King of France said, Yes. This done, Edward putting his Hands between those Philip, the latter receiv'd him by a Kiss. The same Ceremony was repeated by way of Homage for the Earldoms of Ponthieu and Monstrevil. The Schedule above-mention'd, was exactly agreeable to the Words of the Chamberlain just now repeated. It is certain, therefore, that Edward paid only a Verbal Homage at that time, and in general Terms, though du Tillet, de Serres, and some other French Historians, have asserted the contrary *.

IT appears by a Memorandum in the Fœdera, that Edward return'd to England on the 11th of June †. Before he went, he agreed with Philip, that as to their reciprocal Demands and Pretensions, he would send Ambassadors to Paris, to put an end to all Disputes. The rest of this Year was spent in various Negotiations, as well about the reciprocal Demands made at Amiens, as on the Proposals of marrying Edward's Brother and Sister to the Children of Philip x. Edward, as had been agreed on, sent as Ambassadors to Paris, Henry Earl of Lancaster and the Bishop of Norwich y.

Marriage Treaty betwixt the Families of England and France.

P. 392, 403. P. 407, 411.

EARLY next Year, Edward had Intelligence that Philip intended to press him to a categorical Answer, about the Nature of the Homage perform'd at Amiens; and therefore he sent a Full Power to his Ambassadors to discuss all his Rights at the French Court: But all this was only to gain time; and Philip, who perceiv'd it, sent Ambassadors to him, requiring him to send over the Declaration which he had promis'd by a Letter from Eltham, dated the 5th of February. Those very Ambassadors did Edward amuse almost a whole Year, without giving them a positive Answer, by starting Proposals from time to time, which, though perfectly trifling, occasion'd divers Negotiations that we find in the Acts of the Year 1330.

P. 411.

KING Edward continued all the while to make sure of extraordinary Assistance from the Lords and Towns of Guyenne, as appears from several Full Powers issued for that purpose from Woodstock z, to one of which is added a List of One hundred and eighteen Lords; which shews that the King had great Designs that were not bounded by Guyenne. Mean time, as Philip still teaz'd him, and as Edward's Affairs were not yet ready, a Treaty was concluded at Bois de Vincennes, on the 1st of May *; by which Edward engag'd to pay Philip Fifty thousand Marks Sterling, according to the Agreement made with Charles the Fair; and Sixty thousand Livres of Paris, which he ow'd for the Conveyance of Guyenne, which his Father had made over to him. He engag'd likewise to demolish the Castles of the Lords of Gascoigne, who were under Condemnation. His Ratification of this Treaty is dated a the 8th of July; but Philip was not pleas'd with it, as appears by two Letters from Edward, the one to the Pope, the other to the Seneschal of Guyenne, both dated b the 20th Day of September. Philip had no reason indeed to be satisfy'd with a Treaty which did not procure him any new Advantage, and which took no manner of notice of the principal Article of his Pretensions, viz. the Declaration of the Homage. But his Refusal to ratify this Treaty was not at all disagreeable to the King of England, who was glad to keep Affairs embroil'd, that he might have a Colour for making Preparations against Philip, without giving him any room to suspect that he aim'd at his Crown. Therefore he sent a Commission to the Seneschal of Guyenne, to treat with the Counts de Foix and de Cominges, and others; which Commission is dated the 20th of September, as above.

WHILE these things were transacting, Philip, being out of Patience because his Ambassadors receiv'd no Answer, sent his Brother the Count d'Alençon into Guyenne, where he took and demolish'd the Castle of Xaintes, and plunder'd that of Bourg. Edward was then laying that Scheme with

* MR. Barnes also quotes Mezeray, and the King of England's own Letters afterwards, to shew that this was a Mistake; and it deserves the more to be taken notice of, because it stands uncorrected in the General History of England, where Mr. Daniel, Penman of this Reign, seems to have taken it upon trust from those careless Writers above-mention'd, That when the King appear'd before Philip, he consented to put off his Crown, Sword, and Spurs, and to kneel down before him on a Cushion. Mr. Barnes observes what a mighty Disappointment our King's Stiffness in this Point was to Philip of France, who expected a very formal and full Homage, and invited the Kings of Bohemia, Navarre and Majorca, that he might have the more notable Witnesses of it. There came also, says our Author, all the chief Nobility of France, as if they had resolv'd to out-rival the English Nation, from whom they expected no more than 600 Horsemen; but our King carry'd over with him four Bishops, four Earls, of whom two were his Uncles, eight other Lords, above forty Knights, and a thousand Horse of War.

† THE Reason of the King's hasty Departure seems a Circumstance too material to be omitted, taking for granted what Mr. Barnes says, viz. That Philip inwardly fretting that the King had not paid him the Obeisance he expected, laid a Plot to seize his Person when he was most separated from his Attendants; which being whisper'd to the King, he took shipping with his Company on a sudden, and sail'd for England, before any Man knew the reason of his haste.

x The King's full Powers for negotiating the Marriages are dated at Canterbury the 16th of June, and at Gloucester the 24th of September, 1329. y Their Instructions are dated at Kenelworth the 3d of December, and at Eltham the 27th of January following. z On the 27th of April.

a EVEN the accurate Mr. Barnes seems to have been mistaken here, in dating this Treaty May 30.

Baliol, which was mention'd in the 'foregoing Article; and to prevent the Interruption of his Projects, he reſolv'd to give the King of France Satisfaction, and accordingly ſent him the Letters Patent which he promis'd about the Homage. In thoſe Letters he declar'd, That the Homage which he had perform'd ought to be deem'd Liege; and that for the future thoſe which he and his Succeſſors ſhould pay, ſhould be perform'd after the ſame manner, and with the ſame Circumſtances as Philip demanded; of which there was a Pattern in thoſe ſame Letters, which were dated the 30th of March 1331 [d].

FIVE Days after, Edward went to France, on pretence of fulfilling a Vow; there he had an Interview with Philip, and made an Agreement with him, dated the 10th of April, whereby Philip gave him Thirty thouſand Livres Tournois for the Damage done at Xaintes and Bourg [e]. He alſo pardon'd the Lords of Gaſcoigne [f], and conſented that their Caſtles ſhould not be demoliſh'd. An Hiſtorian, who wrote the Life of Edward, pretends that he went over to France in a Diſguiſe, and without Philip's Knowledge, in which he is certainly miſtaken *.

ONE would have thought that a firm Peace ſhould have been eſtabliſh'd between the two Kings, but Edward had no deſign to keep it; and therefore he endeavour'd, in all the Treaties which he made with Philip, to leave ſome Handle or other, that he might always have a Pretence for taking Arms when he ſaw a proper time: Then was not a favourable Conjuncture, becauſe he was engag'd in a War againſt Scotland; and inſtead of being in a Condition to fall upon Philip, he had reaſon to fear the latter's giving powerful Aſſiſtance to the Scots: Therefore he was under a Neceſſity, during this War, to amuſe him with the Appearances of a ſincere Deſire to live in Peace with him, and yet to leave Affairs in ſuch a Condition, that a Pretext for a Rupture might not be wanting on a proper Occaſion. That was manifeſtly the Aim of all Edward's Negotiations with France, during the Term of five Years, which the War with Scotland laſted. And for this Purpoſe, knowing that Philip's Heart was entirely ſet upon an Expedition, which he had engag'd in, to the Holy Land, he made him believe he would go with him, and ſent Ambaſſadors to him to regulate all things proper for their Voyage. But as this Affair would, perhaps, have been ſettled too ſoon for him, he affected to ſpin out the Time, by renewing ſome old Pretenſions, which the Treaties of Monſtrevil and Perigueux, made between his Grandfather and Philip the Fair, had left undetermin'd: And under pretence of deciding theſe Differences, before they ſet forward to the Holy Land, Edward trifled with Philip while he puſh'd on his Conqueſts in Scotland. And the better to decoy the King of France, at his Sollicitation, he granted the Scots ſeveral Truces from time to time, on purpoſe to make him believe that he really deſign'd to continue his Friend and Ally. And this was the Drift of all the Acts we meet with on this Subject, from the Year 1332 to 1335, which are no more than Full Powers to treat with Philip, ſometimes upon the Expedition to the Eaſt, ſometimes upon Projects of Marriages between the Princes and Princeſſes of the two Families, and at other times upon the Treaties of Monſtrevil and Perigueux, and other Particulars which it would be needleſs to mention.

EDWARD III.

MEAN while, though Philip did not ſuſpect that Edward had any Thoughts of reviving his Pretenſions to the Crown, yet he was ſenſible that it was not his Intereſt to ſuffer him to be abſolute Maſter of Scotland; and therefore he declar'd his Deſign to aſſiſt that afflicted Nation, whoſe King was come to his Court for Refuge. Edward laid hold on this Handle as a Pretext to make Preparations on his part. For this end he call'd a Great Council at London, to conſider of thoſe which France was making againſt England. Edward took it for granted, that the Aſſiſtance given by France to Scotland, was a Breach of the Peace with England; but he would not have it underſtood that the War which himſelf carry'd on againſt Scotland, an Ally of France, was any Breach of the Peace at all. This ſeem'd to be the reaſon of that Quarrel, which grew every Day hotter between the two Kings: And the happy Succeſs Edward had been bleſs'd with againſt Scotland, made him talk with the greater Confidence, becauſe he ſaw the Day at hand when he might be able to bring all his Deſigns to light. This was the State of Affairs during the Years 1332, 1333, 1334 and 1335; that is to ſay, the moſt part of the time that Edward was engag'd in the War with Scotland.

IN 1336, when he expected little or no Oppoſition from the Scots, he preſs'd the Concluſion of his Foreign Alliances, eſpecially thoſe with the Duke of Brabant, the Earl of Guelderland, and the Marquiſs of Juliers. And to incline his Subjects to raiſe him great Supplies, he pretended that the Kingdom was threaten'd with an Invaſion from France, and order'd all his Subjects from 16 to 60 Years old to bear Arms [g]. At the ſame time he demanded the Reſtitution of ſome Lands which Philip detain'd from him in Guyenne; and [h] call'd a Great Council to conſider of Ways and Means for oppoſing the pretended Invaſion from France; which was with an apparent View to have a Pretext for deſiring the greater Supply from his Subjects. Nevertheleſs he ſent Ambaſſadors again to France, to treat with Philip about the Voyage to the Holy Land [i]; from whence it may be ſuppos'd by the way, that he was not under the leaſt Apprehenſion of an Invaſion. Mean time, he did not ſend this Embaſſy with a View to engage in that Undertaking, but only to avoid the Reproach of his having hinder'd the holy Voyage, of which Philip made a Handle to the Pope.

He ſends Ambaſſadors to Philip to treat about the Voyage to the Holy Land. P. 703.

P. 704. With this View he gave a Commiſſion to his Ambaſſadors, at the ſame time, to treat with Philip for the adjuſting of all the Differences that remain'd betwixt them, on purpoſe to make him believe that his only Aim was Peace. But he took care not to leave the old Pretenſions, with reſpect to the Treaties of Monſtrevil and Perigueux, out of the number; which ſo perplex'd the Treaty, as render'd the Concluſion of it exceeding difficult; which was what he wanted.

THE Invaſion which Edward pretended to be ſo much afraid of from Philip, came to nothing more than an Embaſſy which the latter ſent to England, to ſollicit ſome Accommodation in favour of King David [k]. But all this was to no Purpoſe, for Edward had no other View than to amuſe the King of France, and ſo nothing was concluded. Edward found the Scots were ſo exhauſted, that he ſaw the War on that ſide drawing to a Period; and therefore, as is ſaid before, he us'd double Diligence to conclude his Foreign Alliances, that he might be in a Condition to attack France as ſoon as that War was ended. This is evident from all the Acts in the Year 1336, in which we find his Full Powers to conclude Alliances with ſeveral Princes of Germany and the Netherlands, while he was compleating the Reduction of Scotland. It is probable that he would not have made a Secret of his Deſigns againſt France ſo long, if the Diſgrace which happened in Scotland to his General the Earl of Athol had not carry'd his Arms into that Country a fourth time *. Therefore he made as if he was for an Accommodation with Philip, and alſo with David Bruce, and received the Ambaſſadors whom both thoſe Princes ſent to him [l]. Mean time, he continu'd to negotiate with Foreign Powers; and not only with Princes, but with all manner of Perſons that were diſpos'd to engage in his Service [m].

Moſt Hiſtorians ſay that this Robert of Artois put it firſt into Edward's Head to go to War with Philip for the Crown of France: But the Meaſures which Edward had concerted before that Earl's Arrival, make it apparent that the moſt he did was to confirm him in the Deſign which he had already form'd.

IN the Conventions which he made with the Earl of Hainault [o], it appears, that the ſaid Earl, tho' he was his Brother-in-law, would not engage with him but upon condition that Edward ſhould have the Title of the Emperor's Lieutenant or Vicar. This ſhews the reaſon why Edward courted that Dignity, which the Pope reproach'd him for afterwards, as being beneath him.

His Letter to the Emperor, urging him to be reconcil'd to the Holy See. p. 799.

IN a Letter [p] to Lewis of Bavaria, the Emperor, Edward ſollicited him to be reconcil'd to the Holy See. And it appears by this Letter, that the Emperor had engag'd to come in Perſon to Edward's Service with 2000 Men at Arms, for which he was to receive 300,000 Florins.

ALL the World now plainly ſaw that Edward was reſolv'd upon a War with France, but no Declaration had as yet been made that it was to enforce his Right to the Crown. This was a Secret which Edward kept ſtill in his own Breaſt. The Pretence he made uſe of for arming, was to put himſelf in a Poſture of Defence againſt Philip, who had made an Alliance with the Scots, and threaten'd, as he ſaid, to invade England. In order to make his Subjects believe with what Regret he took Arms, he put forth a Proclamation [q], in which he notify'd to his People all the Steps that he had taken to prevent this War, of which theſe were the chief.

EDWARD III.

His Offers to France.

1. HE had offer'd his Son the Duke of Cornwal in Marriage to a Daughter of Philip, without deſiring any Dowry.

2. HE had made an Offer of his Siſter Eleanor, Counteſs of Gueldre, in Marriage to John, Philip's eldeſt Son, with a very great Sum of Money.

3. HE had offer'd Philip as much Money as he ſhould reaſonably demand, to make him ſatisfaction for Damages.

4. HE had propos'd to accompany him to the Holy Land, on condition that he would reſtore him one Moiety of the Lands which he kept from him.

5. HE had made him the ſame Offer, if Philip would but engage to make him that Reſtitution after their Return.

6. AT Philip's Requeſt he had granted the Scots a Truce, during which they had kill'd the Earl of Athol.

7. AND, notwithſtanding this Inſtance of the Scots Treachery, he had, at the Requeſt of the King of France, granted them another Truce.

THE Reader will judge of the Importance of theſe Offers, and whether they were not liable to ſuch Conſtructions as might have eaſily furniſh'd Edward with a Pretext for revoking his Promiſe. Accordingly Philip did not regard them. The Ruin of the Scots (the only thing that Philip was then afraid of) was too prejudicial to his Intereſts, to ſuffer him to abandon that Nation, as Edward demanded of him in purſuance of thoſe Offers, which were not near ſo advantagious to Philip as to the King of England.

His Letter on the ſame Subject to the Pope. p. 807.

EDWARD wrote much in the ſame ſtrain to the Pope, on purpoſe to arm him, as he ſaid, againſt the falſe Suggeſtions of his Enemies [r]; but not a Word yet of his Pretenſions to the Crown of France: On the contrary, he granted full Powers to his Commiſſioners, dated the 3d of October [s], to treat with the King of France on all Points whatſoever, p. 812.

* MR. Barnes, who gives an extraordinary Account of this Man, ſays, that though he was but of mean Birth at Ghent, being no more than a Refiner of Honey, or as ſome call'd him a Brewer, yet he roſe to that exceſſive Wealth and Power, by his great Wit and Courage, that he render'd himſelf more abſolute than ever any Earl of Flanders: For undertaking to be the Patron of the People, he had all things entirely at his Command; and thoſe who would not appear to be his Friends, were treated as Enemies to the Publick. He never walk'd the Streets without ſixty or eighty luſty Yeomen at his Heels, among whom were three or four of his ſecret Council, who, upon a Sign given from him, kill'd every Man they met with upon the Spot, be he who he would, if he was one that Jacob van Arteveld fear'd or hated. He collected every Groat of the Earl's Rents and Profits, and ſpent them at pleaſure, without taking or making any Account; and baniſh'd all the Lords and Gentlemen whom he ſuſpected to be the Earl's Friends; of whoſe Lands he levied one Moiety for his own Uſe, the other for the Uſe of the Exiles Wives and Children. And in every Town he had Soldiers and Servants in pay, to ſpy and give him notice if any Perſon had a Deſign againſt him, whom he never left 'till he had baniſh'd or deſtroy'd. From hence the Engliſh were under a Neceſſity of making him their Friend, which in the Courſe of Providence afterwards prov'd his Downfall: For on the 17th of July 1345, he was murder'd in his own Houſe at Ghent by the Populace, who were exaſperated by his endeavouring to eſtabliſh King Edward's Son, Count of Flanders, in prejudice of the right Line; and by his ſquandering the Treaſures of Flanders, and conveying them to England.

without making the leaſt mention, all the while, of the Crown.

YET the very ſame Day he gave a Power to his Envoys beyond Sea, to yield to thoſe who were inclin'd to engage in his Service, certain Lands and Fiefs belonging to him, whether he was in poſſeſſion thereof or not, as well in the Kingdom of France, Dutchy of Aquitain, and other Parts abroad, as in England, Ireland, &c.

EDWARD III.

ARTICLE IV. Affairs Eccleſiaſtical.

THERE are fewer Pieces in this 4th Tome, relating to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, than in any of the three preceding; and ſuch as we find here are of no great Moment, or properly ſpeaking, but a Repetition of what has been already publiſh'd in the others. Here are the very ſame Diſputes between the Popes and the Engliſh, touching the Collations to Benefices, Appeals, and Citations to the Court of Rome. Therefore I think it will be needleſs to enter into any Particulars upon this Head, ſince we have ſeen what it treats of in the preceding Tomes. It muſt only be remember'd, that in all the Diſputes which happen'd between the King and the Pope about the Collation to the Benefices, the King was always worſted, becauſe the Clergy took part with the Pope. This made the Popes endeavour every Day to augment the number of Benefices, and to claim the ſole Diſpoſal of them to themſelves. For Example, we find in this Tome, that when the See of Worceſter became vacant, by the Tranſlation of its Biſhop to that of Ely, the Pope immediately fill'd the vacant See, without any regard to the Nomination of the Chapter. The Reaſon he gave for it was not borrow'd from Scripture, nor from the ancient Canons, but from his mere Will and Pleaſure: For, ſaid he, before the Vacancy of the See of Worceſter, we had made an Order, that all Biſhopricks, which became vacant by the Tranſlation of Biſhops to another See, ſhould be at our Diſpoſal. At this rate, if he had taken a Fancy to order before-hand, that all the vacant Benefices, no matter how, ſhould be at the Diſpoſal of the Holy See, it would have been a ſufficient Reaſon to deprive all the Chapters, and all the Patrons of their Right. But we ſhall ſee in the Sequel of this Reign, that the King and Parliament gave a Check to this Uſurpation.

HERE are in this, as well as in the other Tomes, ſeveral Orders of the King againſt Appeals and perſonal Citations to the Court of Rome, and againſt other of the Pope's Vexations; but as they contain nothing new, or particular, we ſhall paſs them by.

FOEDERA Tom. IV.

King's Letter to the Pope about the Clergy paying Tenths. p. 428.

A LETTER from Edward to Pope John XXII [z], shews, that this Pope did not forget himself when he granted the King the Tenths upon the Clergy, because of those which he granted to this Prince, for the Term of four Years, he reserved one Moiety to himself.

WE find also the very same Pope demanding 30 Years Arrears of the Tribute establish'd by John Lack-land, deducting only what Edward II had paid. The King, whose Interest it was at that time to humour the Court of Rome, promis'd to pay 500 Marks every Year 'till the whole was paid, reckoning four Florins of Gold for every Mark; but he was not so good as his Word, and we shall see hereafter that at last he abolish'd this Tribute.

EDWARD having given leave to a certain Cardinal, who had Benefices in England, to summon his Debtors into the Spiritual Court; the Parliament pray'd him to revoke that Order, as contrary to the Laws of the Kingdom: which he did accordingly [a].

Pope's Bull against certain Heretics of Bavaria. p. 315.

THE chief thing in this fourth Tome, with respect to Religion, is a Bull of Pope John XXII, against certain Heretics of Bavaria, who taking part with the Emperor against the Pope, had written a Book containing certain Propositions which the Pope condemns in this Bull; and not only condemns, but particularly confutes by such Arguments as were furnish'd him, or were approv'd, says he, by a great number of Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, and Doctors both of Divinity and Law. If the Account given of this Tome were not too long already, I would here add every one of the Pope's Arguments at large: But to be short, I shall content my self with mentioning the five condemn'd Propositions, and some of the most remarkable Proofs by which the Pope confutes them. This Bull is dated at Avignon the 10th of the Calends of November, 1327. EDWARD III.

PROPOSITION I.

WHEN Jesus Christ paid Tribute to the* Emperor, by means of a Piece of Money † taken in the Mouth of a Fish, he did not do it out of Complaisance, but mere Necessity.

JESUS CHRIST, says the Pope, being the Son of David, was not oblig'd to pay Tribute; therefore is is false to assert, that he was under a Necessity to pay it. The Hereticks reason falsly when they say, that the Temporalities of Jesus Christ, and by consequence Church-Livings, were subject to the Emperor's Jurisdiction; because Jesus Christ paid for his Person, and not for his Estate.

PROPOSITION II.

St. PETER had no more Authority than the other Apostles, and Jesus Christ has establish'd no Head over the Church.

AMONG other Arguments which the Pope brings to confute this Proposition, he says, that Jesus Christ gave the other Apostles a limited Power, when he said to them, Whosesoever Sins ye remit, &c. and when he said, Go forth and baptize: But that the Authority which he gave to Peter was unlimited, Feed my Sheep; and elsewhere, I will give thee the Keys, &c. which he says to no other Apostle in particular.

MOREOVER he said to St. Peter, Launch out into the Deep, meaning that he alone was to define the most important Doubts and Disputes in Matters of Faith; whereas he said to the other Apostles, Leave your Nets.

PROPOSITION III.

IT belongs to the Emperor to make a Pope, to depose him, and to punish him.

AMONG the Arguments which John XXII makes use of to combat this Proposition, he says, That St. Peter was establish'd by Jesus Christ, and not by any Temporal Lord; that the Emperors before Constantine made no Popes; and that Constantine, far from having acquir'd such Right by his Conversion, became on the contrary a Son and a Disciple subject to the Pope. He adds, that this

Emperor

FOEDERA Tom. IV.

Emperor transferr'd the Seat of his Government to Conſtantinople, becauſe he thought it impracticable to exerciſe his Power in a City which was the Reſidence of the Head of the Chriſtian Church.

AFTER many other Arguments, which have nothing in them more than common, he falls upon the Heretics for maintaining, that Pilate in quality of Judge Ordinary caus'd Jeſus Chriſt to be crucify'd. Upon this he ſays, that theſe Words are capable of a double Senſe, to mean either that Pilate crucify'd Chriſt de jure, or that he did it de facto; if de jure, this is falſe, for no Man can be condemn'd by Law 'till he is found guilty; now Jeſus Chriſt was innocent: If we underſtand it, de facto, no other Inference can be drawn from it, but that the Emperor may unjuſtly put the Pope to Death, and not only the Emperor, but any other private Perſon.

PROPOSITION IV.

ALL Prieſts, whether Popes, Archbiſhops, or Biſhops, have an equal Juriſdiction according to the Inſtitution of Jeſus Chriſt. And if any one has more Authority than the others, they have receiv'd it from the Emperor, who, as he gave it, can alſo revoke it.

AMONG many other Arguments, the Pope makes uſe of the following, to ſhew that the Diſtinction of ſeveral Degrees of Power in the Church, is by the Inſtitution of Jeſus Chriſt. He by whoſe Authority any thing is done, ſeems to do it himſelf. Now Peter, the Vicar of Jeſus Chriſt, and the Head of his Flock, conſidering, that as the Flock increas'd, it would be neceſſary to increaſe the number of Shepherds, inſtituted various Degrees of Power in the Church: Therefore ſuch Diſtinction being made by the Authority of St. Peter, it is the ſame as if it had been made by Chriſt himſelf.

As to the Queſtion, Whether all Prieſts are equal? he ſays, that as to the Dignity of their Order they are all equal, but not as to Power. Yet he acknowledges, that when an inferior Prieſt celebrates the Euchariſt, the ſame Effect follows as if it had been done by a Superior; becauſe it is one and the ſame internal Prieſt, viz. Jeſus Chriſt, who produces Tranſubſtantiation.

EDWARD III.

PROPOSITION V.

THE whole Church join'd together can puniſh no Man in a compulſive Way, unleſs it be by Authority from the Emperor.

JOHN XXII pretends that the Power of Excommunication is a compulſive Power; and that the Power of Excommunication being granted to the Church by Jeſus Chriſt, the Church has therefore a compulſive Power. To prove that Excommunication is compulſive, he argues, that the major Excommunication not only deprives the Perſon excomumnicated of the Sacraments, but excludes him alſo from the Communion of Believers. Now, adds he, the Imperial Laws ſay that it is reckon'd worſe to converſe with Men, and be depriv'd of their Suffrage, than to be totally ſeparated from Mankind; therefore Excommunication is worſe than temporal Puniſhment, from whence it follows that the Church has a compulſive Power.

As a farther Proof that the Power of the Church is compulſive, he mentions the Power which Peter exerted with reſpect to Ananias; and that Paſſage of St. Paul to the Corinthians, Shall I come unto you with a Rod? and that other Paſſage, The Weapons of our Warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God, to the pulling down of ſtrong Holds.

* THIS Tome contains a great many Pieces which may be of vaſt uſe for illuſtrating the ſeveral Events of the Reign of Edward III, one of the moſt conſiderable in the Engliſh Hiſtory. But as the numerous Acts are not all of equal Importance, I ſhall confine my ſelf to ſome of thoſe which may ſerve to illuſtrate any Fact that is obſcure or doubtful in it ſelf, or diſguis'd by Hiſtorians.

KING Edward's Affairs with France, being as it were the Center to which all his Negotiations tended, it is neceſſary to begin with this Article, as being of the greateſt Importance, and that on which all the others do in ſome meaſure depend.

King Edward's Affairs with France from the Beginning of 1338, to the end of 1356.

Anno 1338.

THO' Edward was ſeveral Years preparing for a War againſt Philip of Valois; and tho' he diſcovered his Deſign of wreſting the Crown from him laſt Year, (viz 1337.) yet he was not able to put himſelf at the Head of his Army 'till the Month of September, 1339. As it was his Intention to attack Philip by Flanders, ſo he made it his chief Care to fortify his League by Alliances with the Princes of Germany and the Netherlands. The Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, the Dukes of Brabant and Gueldre, the Earl of Hainault, the Flemings, who were then govern'd by Jacob van Arteveldt, and the German Princes their Neighbours, were thoſe whoſe Alliance was likely to be of the greateſt Service to him in his Enterprize. He had already made ſome Treaties with ſeveral of them, as we have mention'd elſewhere. And now it was neceſſary that he ſhould go himſelf into the Netherlands to confirm all thoſe Alliances, and to take juſt Meaſures with his ſaid Confederates for the Execution of his Deſign. He ſet out therefore from England in July 1338, for Antwerp, where he ſtay'd above a Year to ſettle all his Affairs. But ſoon after his Arrival, he went to Cologn to confer with the Emperor, who gave him the Title of Vicar of the Empire *. We have already taken notice that the Earl of Hainault wiſh'd that Edward was inveſted with that Dignity; and undoubtedly the King himſelf was of opinion, that it would be ſerviceable to him for engaging ſeveral German Princes in the League.

Anno 1339.

THESE Affairs having employ'd him 'till September 1339, it was not 'till that Month that he put himſelf at the Head of his Troops, to enter into the Territories of France. We find by one of the Acts of this Tome, that on the 26th of that Month he was at Marchienne, between St. Amand and Doway, from whence he advanc'd into the Cambreſis, where he heard that Philip de Valois was drawing near with a numerous Army. Notwithſtanding their Superiority Edward paſs'd over the Schelde to meet them, ſo that the two Armies were quickly near enough to engage. Philip even ſent Edward a Challenge, which was accepted on the Spot, and the Day and Place actually ſettled for deciding the Quarrel by a general Combat; but Philip retir'd on a ſudden without offering to ſtrike a Blow. They ſay he was intimidated by Letters from Robert King of Naples, a great Aſtrologer, who told him he would have bad Succeſs. Be it as it will, Edward ſeeing no Proſpect of coming to a Battel, retir'd on his part into Hainault. Thus ended this firſt Campaign without any Bloodſhed.

Philip challenges, and runs away.

Anno 1340.

EDWARD ſpent the reſt of this Year at Antwerp, where important Affairs detain'd him till the Month of Februry 1340. That which took up moſt of his time, was the Negotiation which he had on foot to bring the Towns of Flanders into the League. In the Year 1331 he had made a Treaty with 'em, by which they were only engag'd to obſerve an Exact Neutrality; but at laſt he gain'd the Flemings on his ſide, upon condition that he would take the Title of King of France, becauſe Philip's Emiſſaries had inſpir'd them with ſuch a Scruple that they look'd upon it as a high Crime to bear Arms againſt the Sovereign Lord of Flanders; and they thought they ſhould be skreen'd from this Reproach by recognizing Edward in that Quality. Ever after, Edward took the Title of King of France, and caus'd his Arms to be quarter'd with thoſe of France and England †. It is not ſtrange that Edward was prevail'd on to take this Edward aſſumes the Title and Arms of King of France.

* THIS Interview was truly glorious and magnificent; two Thrones being erected in the open Market-place, one for the Emperor, the other for the King; the Emperor took his Place firſt, and King Edward ſat down by him. There were for Aſſiſtants, 4 great Dukes, 3 Archbiſhops, and 6 Biſhops, 37 Earls, and according to the Eſtimation of the Heralds 17000 Barons, Banerets, Knights and Eſquires. The Emperor having his Scepter in his Right Hand, and the Globe in his Left, and a Knight of Almain holding over his Head a naked Sword, his Imperial Majeſty did then and there declare the Diſloyalty, Falſhood, and Villainy of the King of France; and thereupon defy'd him, and pronounc'd, that he and his Adherents had forfeited the Protection and Favour of the Empire. And then he conſtituted King Edward his Deputy, or Vicar General of the Empire; granting unto him full and abſolute Power over all on this ſide as far as Cologne; whereof he gave him his Imperial Charter, in ſight of all that were preſent. Mr. Barnes, to whom we are oblig'd for this Account, mentions a Report of ſome, that at the firſt Meeting, the Emperor took it ill that King Edward refus'd to ſubmit himſelf to the Kiſs of his Feet, (as it ſeems Kings were wont to do to the Emperors) but our Edward gallantly anſwer'd, "That he himſelf was a King Sacred and Anointed, and "had Life and Limbs in his Power, being accountable to none but God, as ſupreme and independant of all "others; being alſo Lord of Sea and Land, and wearing no leſs than an Imperial Crown; wherefore he "ought not to abaſe himſelf to any mortal Potentate whatever. Which Anſwer was accepted."

† EITHER at this time, or ſoon after, the King ſet at the Foot of his Shield, beneath the Arms of France and England, thus quarter'd, this French Motto, which is continu'd to this Day, DIEU ET MON DROIT, i.e. GOD AND MY RIGHT, declaring thereby his Confidence to be only in God and the Equity of his Cauſe. See Mr. Barnes.

Title, since he ceas'd to give it to Philip, after he had manifested his Design to prosecute his own Claim to the Crown, as we shall see hereafter.

THE time that Edward spent at Home, 'till the next Campaign, was employ'd in Preparations for the War; borrowing Money on all hands, and taking Precautions to maintain his Allies in the League, and his Subjects of Guyenne in their Allegiance. After having taken all these Measures, he sail'd from England on the 22d of June for the Netherlands, carrying with him a Fleet of 300 Sail. Two Days after his Departure he met the French Fleet in the way to Sluys, consisting of 500 Sail, waiting to intercept him in his Passage: Notwithstanding the Enemy's Superiority he began a Battel with 'em, which lasted all Day, and in which the French Fleet was so entirely ruin'd, that only 30 Ships escap'd. This Fight happen'd on the 24th of June, 1340 †.

p. 191.

English Fleet beats the French before Sluys.

AFTER this Victory, Edward put himself at the Head of his Army, which was 130,000 Men strong, of whom he detach'd 50,000 under Robert of Artois to St. Omer, while himself went with the rest to besiege Tournay. The Success of this Campaign was far short of answering such great Preparations. Robert of Artois, after having receiv'd a Shock near St. Omer, saw his whole Army dispers'd, which consisted chiefly of the Militia of Flanders; while Philip of Valois, who was advanc'd near Tournay, gave such Interruption to the Siege, that Edward was three Months before the Place without any prospect of taking it; nor was it even possible for him to give Battel, tho' he sent a * Cartel of Defiance to Philip, because he would not accept it. As Edward saw no probability of making himself Master of Tournay, and as he could not raise the Siege without Disgrace, he was extricated out of this Difficulty by Joan Countess Dowager of Hainault, his Mother-in-law, and Sister of Philip of Valois, who coming out of a Convent to which she was retir'd, negotiated with such Success, that she made the two Kings consent to a Truce in which all their Allies were comprehended. The said Truce was to last 'till the 25th of June next following.

Siege of Tournay.

Truce with France.

Edward, after such mighty Preparations for War, was very much mortify'd when he saw he was oblig'd to make a Truce which broke all his Measures, and render'd all the Expence he had been at 'till then entirely fruitless. He had the more reason to lament the ill success of this Campaign, because he saw himself on the point of losing all his Allies. The Duke of Brabant had already withdrawn his Troops, during the Siege of Tournay; the Flemings seem'd to be sorry that they had enter'd into the Alliance; and the Emperor, being disgusted that the Truce of Tournay was made without his Privity, threaten'd to abandon'd the Confederates, which he did; and his Defection drew that of the German Princes along with it. To this add a Consideration which fretted Edward as much as any one thing, viz. How to raise Money to pay off his Debts, and a Supply to enable him to renew the War when the Truce was expir'd. He had enter'd on this War by the Advice of the Archbishop of Canterbury, his Prime Minister, and upon the Promises he had made to him that nothing should be wanting. Nevertheless he was no sooner engag'd in the Siege of Tournay, but the Archbishop, being sway'd, as it is thought, by Pope Benedict XII, who was very partial to France, not only fail'd to send the Money which he had promis'd him, but also oppos'd the raising of a Subsidy which had been granted to the King by Parliament. This Breach of Promise oblig'd Edward to engage in considerable Loans, and to pay great Interest for Money, which disabled him from making due Preparations for renewing the War.

EDWARD III.

Edward's Allies begin to fall off.

Edward suffers by the Archbishop of Canterbury's Breach of Promise.

IN 1341, when he return'd to England, he took the Archbishop of Canterbury to task, whom he accus'd of having maliciously thwarted the Execution of his Designs. Mean time, as he stood in need of the Clergy, he was afraid to push that Prelate to the utmost; so that he came off with making some Submissions, after he had in vain try'd to set the People at variance with the King. In these Straits Edward took care to get the Truce prolong'd to the 24th of June, 1342. He sadly wanted so much time to set his Affairs in order, which were very much unsettled by the want of Money, and the Infidelity of his Allies. It is very probable that this Truce would have been succeeded with a final Peace, if the Death of the Duke of Bretagne, which happen'd at this Juncture, had not been attended with such Consequences as flush'd Edward with Hopes that he should be able to attack Philip on that side with better Success. As England was very much interested in the Quarrel that happen'd on account of the Succeſſion of the Duke of Bretagne, it is neceſſary juſt to explain the Origin of this Quarrel, and the Occaſion which Edward had to meddle in it.

ARTHUR II, Duke of Bretagne, had Children by two Wives; by the firſt, John II, who ſucceeded him, Guy, who was Earl of Pentebria, and Peter, who left no Iſſue; and by the ſecond, John, who was Earl of Montfort in France by Right of his Mother. Guy, the ſecond Son of Arthur's firſt Wife, died in 1331, and left but one Daughter nam'd Jane, whom John II, her Uncle, gave in Marriage to Charles of Blois. This John II dying in April 1341, Bretagne was diſputed between John Earl of Montfort, and Charles of Blois; the former maintaining that the ſaid Dutchy ought to revert to him, as the neareſt Heir of his Brother John II; and Charles of Blois inſiſting upon the Prerogative which gave Jane his Wife the ſame Right as Guy her Father would have had if he had been living. This Affair being carry'd into France, and referr'd to the Court of Peers, Bretagne was awarded to Charles of Blois, who was Nephew to Philip of Valois. John of Montfort pretending that Injuſtice had been done him, had recourſe to Edward's Protection; and after having done him Homage he went into Bretagne, where he made ſome Progreſs; but his Happineſs did not laſt long, for at the Approach of John Duke of Normandy, whom his Father King Philip had charg'd with the Execution of the Arret paſs'd in favour of Charles of Blois, the Earl of Montfort was oblig'd to retire to Nantes, where he was immediately beſieg'd, taken, carry'd to Paris, and committed to the great Tower of the Louvre.

Earl of Montfort pays Homage to Edward for Bretagne.

He is taken, and committed to Priſon.

NEVERTHELESS his Impriſonment did not put an end to the Affair: Margaret of Flanders, his Wife, who manag'd Affairs for her impriſon'd Husband, renew'd an Alliance with Edward in the Name of her Son, but four Years of Age, and promiſed to deliver up all the Places of Bretagne to him, which were at her Diſpoſal. In conſequence of this new Treaty, Edward ſent Troops to Bretagne under the Command of the Earl of Northampton, to take poſſeſſion of the ſaid Dutchy. Not long after, he ſent Robert of Artois thither, who when he had made himſelf Maſter of Vannes, was beſieg'd there, and dy'd of the Wounds he receiv'd in the Defence of the Place, which was carry'd by Storm.

Edward ſends Troops to Bretagne.

The Earl of Northampton having not Forces enough to maintain himſelf in Bretagne, Edward reſolv'd to go thither himſelf with powerful Succours; and arriving in the Dutchy in the Year 1342, he there caus'd four Places to be beſieg'd at once. But at the Approach of the Duke of Normandy, who advanc'd at the Head of a numerous Army, Edward was oblig'd to muſter all his Forces in one Body, which when all was done was ſtill inferior to the French Army; therefore he choſe to intrench himſelf, which he did in ſuch a manner, that the Duke did not once dare to attack him. In fine, after both Armies had ſpent great part of the Winter, as it were in ſight of each other, with great Inconvenienc to both, two of the Pope's Legates mediated a general Truce, in which all the Allies and Adherents of the two Kings were comprehended.

Another Truce with France. p. 357.

This Truce, which was ſign'd the 20th of February 1343, at London, was to laſt 'till Michaelmas 1346. It was likewiſe agreed that the two Kings ſhould ſend their Plenipotentiaries to Avignon, to negotiate a Peace there before the Pope as a private Perſon, which Negotiation was to begin upon ſuch a Day, and to laſt ſo long: That the Pope ſhould ſend a Nuncio to Bretagne, to ſee to the Obſervation of the Truce: That the City of Vannes ſhould be put into the Nuncio's Hands, to keep it in the Pope's Name 'till the end of the Truce; and that John of Montfort ſhould be ſet at liberty.

Anno 1343.

THO' King Edward appointed his Plenipotentiaries for the Peace, by a Commiſſion dated the 20th of May 1343 [a], and gave them their Inſtructions, and their full Powers, yet an unthought-of Accident retarded their Departure. Nichol de Fliſco, who was Edward's Envoy at the Pope's Court, being taken from his Houſe in the Night-time, and carry'd into France, Edward was reſolved to have ſatisfaction for this Affront before he ſent away his Ambaſſadors, as appears by his Letter to the Pope, dated July the 6th, 1343, at Clarendon; and at the ſame time demanded a Paſſport to protect them from the like Acts of Violence. But the Pope having not yet taken one Step to puniſh thoſe who had carry'd off the King's Envoy, and being moreover unwilling to grant a Paſſport, contrary to the uſual Form, the Engliſh Plenipotentiaries ſtay'd in their Iſland; which was the reaſon that the Term fix'd for the Treaty was often prolong'd.

gotiation before he had Satisfaction as well for the Seizure of his Envoy, as the extraordinary ſafe Conduct which he demanded for his Ambaſſadors. To this was added another Cauſe of Complaint, viz. for the detaining of John Earl of Montfort, whom Philip ſtill kept in Priſon, contrary to an expreſs Article of the Truce, on pretence that the ſaid Prince could not find Sureties in France. Yet it is probable that all theſe Obſtacles would have been remov'd, had it not been for another Accident, which was the Occaſion of the Breach of the Truce. Oliver de Cliſſon, a Lord of Bretagne, and ten other Lords and Gentlemen of that Province, or Normandy, having been arreſted in Bretagne by Order of the King of France, were conducted to Paris, where the ſaid Prince caus'd them to be beheaded without any Form of Law. The French Hiſtorians pretend that thoſe Lords were Friends and Partiſans of Charles de Blois, and that they went voluntarily to Paris to aſſiſt at a Tournament: But we ſhall find by the Sequel that their Account has not one Word of Truth in it, and that on the contrary they had declar'd for John Earl of Montfort, and were apprehended in Bretagne. Be this as it will, Edward demanded Satisfaction for this Violation of the Truce, and ſent Ambaſſadors to the Pope for that very Purpoſe. This Affair ſpun out the remainder of this Year and part of the next, without the Pope's giving or procuring Edward the Satisfaction he demanded. On the contrary, it appears from ſeveral Acts in this Collection, that he preſs'd him to make Peace without including his Allies, and that he endeavour'd to render him reſponſible for the Violation of the Truce, by laying all the Blame of it upon him. In fine, after Edward had waited a whole Year for the Satisfaction which he demanded of Philip, perceiving there was no likelihood of obtaining it, he, by a Declaration dated the 24th of April 1345 [h], notify'd that the Truce was broke. But as this was what he did not expect, he could not be in a Condition to renew the War 'till towards the middle of the Year 1346.

Anno 1346. King of France ſends his Son into Guyenne.

THIS Delay had like to have coſt him dear, becauſe Philip took that Opportunity to ſend his Son, the Duke of Normandy, into Guyenne, with an Army of 100,000 Men, who threatened to drive the Engliſh entirely out of the Province. But it was owing to Edward's good Fortune, that the Progreſs which the Duke made fell ſhort of what might be expected from ſo great an Armament; for he only took a few paltry Towns along the Garonne, and then laid ſiege to Aiguillon, where the brave Reſiſtance of the Beſieged made him loſe a great deal of Time. Mean while Edward, who ſaw Guyenne in great Danger, reſolv'd to go thither himſelf with ſome Succours. With this View he embark'd the ſecond of July 1346, with an Army of about 30,000 Men, among whom were 4000 Men of Arms. As impatient as he was to go and relieve his Subjects in Guyenne, it was not poſſible for him to execute his Deſign, the contrary Winds having drove him back twice upon his own Coaſt; and at laſt, ſeeing that he could not purſue his Voyage to Guyenne, he reſolv'd, by the Advice of Godfrey of Harcourt, a Norman Lord, who had fled to him for Refuge, to make a Deſcent into Normandy. Purſuant to this Reſolution he caus'd his Troops to land at La Hogue in the Contantin; and as Philip's Forces were a great way off at that time, he had leiſure to ravage Normandy without any Oppoſition, but from the Count d'Eu, Conſtable of France, who offering to ſtop his Progreſs with the Militia of the Country, was routed and taken Priſoner. After this Edward advanc'd to Poiſſy, from whence he ſent a Challenge to Philip to fight him under the Walls of the Louvre. Upon the very firſt Advice of Edward's landing, Philip us'd extraordinary Diligence to aſſemble an Army, which very ſoon amounted to above 100,000 Men; and with this Army he form'd a Deſign to ſhut up the Engliſh between the Seine and the Oyſe, in order to cut off their Retreat. Edward perceiving this at laſt, though late, reſolv'd to retire into the County of Ponthieu, but found great Difficulties in the Undertaking for want of a Paſſage over the Soame: However he was fortunate enough to diſcover and force the Paſs of Blanquetaque, tho' guarded by 12,000 Men under the Command of Gondemar du Fay; and that very Night after he had paſs'd his Army over the River, he went and encamp'd at Creſſy, where he was reſolv'd to ſtay for Philip, who next Day came up with him; and upon the 26th of Auguſt 1346, happen'd the famous Battel of Creſſy, where Philip was entirely routed, after the loſs of 30,000 Men, 1200 Knights, the Earl of Alençon his Brother, the King of Bohemia his Ally, and 15 Princes, or Noblemen, of the greateſt Quality in the Kingdom. It may be ſaid that Edward's eldeſt Son the Prince of Wales, who was but 15 Years of Age, gain'd this Victory, the King his Father ſtanding off at a diſtance with a Body of Reſerves, to have ſupported him in caſe of need, without offering to ſtrike a Blow, that he might Siege of Calais.

AFTER this great Victory Edward caus'd Calais to be inveſted on the 5th of September, and continu'd the Siege eleven Months, ſo as that Philip, who advanc'd about the end of that Term at the Head of an Army of 150,000 Men, could not find an Opportunity to attack him in his Intrenchments, much leſs to bring him out to a pitch'd Battel.

Anno 1347. David King of Scotland taken Priſoner.

IN 1347, while Edward was employ'd in the Siege of Calais, he receiv'd News that David King of Scotland, who had enter'd England with 60,000 Men, was defeated and taken Priſoner. At length, on the firſt of Auguſt 1347, Edward made himſelf Maſter of Calais, and turning out all the Inhabitants put an Engliſh Colony into the Place.

Pope mediates a Truce.

Two Months after the taking of Calais, the Pope's Legates mediated a Truce from the 28th of September to the end of June

Anno 1348. 1348; after which Edward return'd to England in Triumph. In this Truce as well as in the former it was agreed, that the two Kings ſhould ſend their Ambaſſadors to Avignon, there to negotiate a Peace in the preſence of the Pope as Mediator. But the ſame Difficulties which occur'd before, with relation to the ſending of the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, ſtill ſubſiſting, there was a Neceſſity for frequent Prolongations of the Term fix'd for the Negotiation, and by Conſequence the Truce was ſeveral Times renew'd: A terrible Plague with which France was afflicted in 1348, and England 1349, did undoubtedly contribute not a little to the cooling of the Paſſion of both Kings to renew the War, ſo that the Truce was prolong'd, Time after Time, to the 1ſt of Auguſt 1350.

Anno 1349. Plagues both in France and England.

Anno 1350. Death of Philip of France.

KING Philip dying the 22d of that Month, his Succeſſor John was mightily for renewing the Truce, and found no great Difficulty in obtaining it, the Plague having made ſuch a Havock in England, that it had carry'd off almoſt half the People. Therefore the ſaid Truce was farther prolong'd to the 1ſt of Auguſt, 1351, and a Treaty reſolv'd on. But as Avignon was too far diſtant from England, and Edward moreover not well pleas'd with the Pope, the two Kings agreed that a Peace ſhould be negotiated in ſome Place which was nearer at hand to both. For this end they ſent their Ambaſſadors in 1351, the one to Calais, and the other to Guiſnes; and between thoſe two Towns Tents were erected, under which the Plenipotentiaries of both Parties conferr'd together, in order to ſettle the Preliminaries of a good Peace.

THE firſt Thing they agreed upon was to prolong the Truce to the 12th of September, 1352; but this being too ſhort a Anno 1352. Term to adjuſt all the Differences, it was farther prolong'd to the 1ſt of Auguſt, 1353, and finally to the 1ſt of April, Anno 1353. 1354.

DURING this laſt Prorogation King John ſeem'd inclinable at length to conclude a Peace on condition of yielding up Guyenne, and the Counties of Artois and Guiſnes, with the City and Territories of Calais, in full Sovereignty to Edward. This is very clear from the Engliſh Hiſtorians, tho' Mezeray makes no mention of it. Mean time, as ſeveral Acts in this Volume of the Fœdera make it manifeſt, that Edward thought the Peace as good as made; and as it is hardly to be ſuppos'd he would have come into it without finding ſome Advantage in it; what the Engliſh Hiſtorians have advanc'd on this Point ſeems to be out of all manner of Diſpute.

A material Omiſſion in the French Hiſtorian Mezeray.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Diſproportion there was between Edward's firſt Pretenſions, and the Offers now made to him, he accepted the latter. There remain'd nothing to be done, but to conclude this Treaty in a ſolemn manner; for which end the two Kings thought they cou'd not do better than to get it confirm'd by the Pope, whom they empower'd to bind both of them by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures to the Obſervation of the ſaid Treaty, and the ſame was to be ſign'd in his Preſence. Purſuant to theſe Conventions Edward ſent his Ambaſſadors to Avignon with very ample Powers, dated at Weſtminſter the 28th of Auguſt, 1354, to ſign the Treaty, and p. 794. Anno 1354.

* MR. Barnes, who gives the Detail of this glorious Fight and complete Victory, mentions one or two Particulars which deſerve to be taken notice of in this place. He remarks it as a ſignal Inſtance of the Divine Favour to Edward's Arms, that not one of the Engliſh Nobility fell in the Action, and that only three of their Knights and one Eſquire were kill'd. He ſays, that the French King brought with him from St. Dennis the great and holy Standard of France, which being by the French held as ſacred as if it came down from Heaven, was originally only us'd in the Wars againſt the Infidels: That Philip, being ſecure of the Victory, and reſolv'd to make an end of the War at one Blow, notify'd, by erecting this hallowed Banner in the Field of Battel, that all the Engliſh ſhou'd be put to the Sword, except only King Edward and his Son the Prince of Wales: And that King Edward hearing of this cruel Reſolution, caus'd alſo his Burning Dragon to be erected, which ſignify'd as little Mercy to be ſhew'd to Frenchmen. From hence our Author very judiciouſly apologizes for Edward's keeping at a diſtance all the time of the Battel, becauſe if the Victory ſhould have declar'd againſt him all wou'd have been utterly loſt; and to thoſe Declarations our Author aſcribes it that ſo many of the French were put to the Sword, and not one of 'em taken Priſoner. Mr. Barnes adds, that in this Battel the Prince of Wales took and won the Arms of the King of Bohemia (being the Oſtrich Feathers with the Motto ICH DIEN, i. e. I SERVE) which have ever ſince been worn by all the Princes of Wales, eldeſt Sons to the Kings of England. He obſerves, that ever after this Victory the French call'd this Heroic Prince of Wales, Edward the Noir, or the Black Prince.

FOEDERA Tom. V.

to submit himself to the Pope's Jurisdiction, with respect to the Observation of it. But the Prospect of this Peace soon vanish'd, because John's Ambassadors refus'd to confirm before the Pope what had been agreed on between Guisnes and Calais.

War with France breaks out again.

THIS Refusal occasion'd a fresh Rupture: For notwithstanding all the Pope's Instances with Edward to renew the Negotiation, he would hear no more Talk of Peace; but having taken a Resolution to begin the War again with Vigour, he gave the Government of Guyenne to his Son the Prince of Wales, and sent him into that Province to strike the first Blow, while himself made Preparations for a second Invasion of France elsewhere.

Anno 1356. Edward the Black Prince ravages Languedoc, &c.

THE Prince of Wales, then but 25 Years of Age, arriving in Guyenne, put himself at the Head of a small Army, and therewith ravag'd Languedoc, where he took Carcassonne and Narbonne, and carry'd off a great Booty, which he plac'd for Security in Bourdeaux. After having refresh'd himself a little in that City, he set out from thence with an Army of 12,000 Men, of whom only 3000 were Natives of England; travers'd the Countries of Perigord and Limousin; and entring into Berry, went and shew'd himself at the Gates of Bourges, where he heard that King John was advancing at the Head of 60,000 Men. This News obliging him to think of a Retreat, he was inclinable to take a Compass, and retire into Guyenne through Poictou; but John made such haste that he came up with him at last at Maupertuis near Poictiers, where Prince Edward was oblig'd to intrench himself in a Post embarrass'd with Vines and Hedges, which gave him great Advantage. Tho' it had been easy for John to have starv'd this little Army, shut up as it was in an Enemy's Country, yet his Impatience to be reveng'd for the Ravages which the English had committed in France, did not permit him to stay so long, and he resolv'd to attack the Prince in his Intrenchments: But he had the Misfortune to be entirely defeated by this handful of English, and to fall himself into the Enemy's Hands, with his fourth Son Philip (afterwards call'd the Hardy) about 15 Years of Age, and a great many other Lords of the best Quality in the Kingdom *. In this Battel, which was so fatal to France, there were only 6000 French Men kill'd; but in that number were 800 Gentlemen, besides the Duke of Bourbon Prince of the Blood, the Duke of Athens Constable of France, the Marshal de Nesle, and above 50 other great Lords. After this glorious Victory the Prince of Wales quietly led his Prisoners to Bourdeaux, and sent the great News to the King his Father, who order'd Thanksgivings to God for eight Days together in all the Churches of England. With this Victory end the Acts of this Tome relating to France; we shall see what were the Consequences of this famous Battel, in our Account of the next Tome.

Battel of Poictiers.

EDWARD III.

WHAT I have hitherto given is in general the Subject of the Acts of the fifth Tome which relate to France. It is time now to glance over the most important of them; and as it is not possible to mention all without running into too great a length, I shall only point out some of them, and insist upon none but such as may serve to illustrate any Passage of the English History. And for the Reader's Conveniency I shall range them according to the Dates of the Years, that in case of need he may have recourse to what is mention'd in the foregoing Account under those Years.

An Account of the Acts in the fifth Tome of the Fœdera, relating to the Affairs with France.

2. EDWARD's Letter to the Emperor, praying him to grant the Title of King to the Dauphin of Vienne, dated [k] March 3, 1338. Probably the Dauphin Edward's Letter to the Emperor, for granting the Title of King to the Dauphin of Vienne, p. 10.

* THIS Battel was fought the 19th of September 1356. The French had 50,000 Horse, and as many Foot; and the English but 8 or 9000 Men in all, according to the Report of the Lord Ribeumont, who was sent by King John to view Prince Edward's Army before the Battel: And the English are said to have taken more French Prisoners, than they had Men to guard 'em. Mr. Barnes gives an ample Account of the Battel for which we have not room, but cannot omit an Observation of his upon the Sur-name of this French King's young Son and Fellow Prisoner Philip, which most Authors have deriv'd from his Courage and Valour in War; but Mr. Barnes thinks this the most probable Account of any that he had seen, viz. That when his Father, then a Prisoner in England, was dining one Day with King Edward at his Table, this young Prince Philip was with others of the French Nobility appointed to wait; and that a young Nobleman of England, who likewise attended, serving King Edward first, and then King John, this Philip gave him a Box o'th' Ear, saying, What, dare you serve the King of England first when the King of France is at the Table? The offended Nobleman thereupon drew his Dagger, but King Edward forbad him to strike; and commending the noble Spirit of the young Prince, said to him in French, Vous estes Philippe le Hardi, i. e. Thou art Philip the Hardy, or Bold.

† IT may be a Question which is most chargeable, such kind of Truces, or some Campaigns? For Mr. Barnes says, that these Christian Peace-makers cost the Church of England 50 Marks a Day all the time they stay'd here, which was from the middle of December 1337, to the 21st of March following.

Tho' it was ſcarce two Years that he had perform'd his Homage to Philip, and had not hitherto made any Diſcovery of his Pretenſions; yet in this Act he calls Philip the Pretended King of France. For a Proof of this he is pleaſed to quote the very Terms of his Grant; as if the Expreſſions of it could poſſibly weaken the Force of the Supply againſt Edward. This Letter is dated [u] the Ides of November, 1338.

* WHAT theſe Taxes were we may partly gueſs by the Account which Mr. Barnes gives, who tells us that the Laiety granted to the King the one half of their Wools throughout the whole Realm for the next Summer; which he receiv'd graciouſly; and of the Clergy he alſo levied the whole, cauſing them to pay nine Marks of every Sack of the beſt Wool; but after the rate of one half he took, in whoſe Hands ſoever it was found, as well Merchants as others, according to the foreſaid Grant: So that of the Abbey of Leiceſter only, as Knighton, one of that Houſe, witneſſes, he had no leſs than 18 Sacks. After this he took a Fifteenth of all the Commonalty of his Realm in Wool, the Price of every Stone, rated at 14 Pounds per Stone, at two Shillings. And yet in November laſt he had ſent the Biſhop of Lincoln, and the Earls of Northampton and Suffolk with 10,000 Sacks of Wool into Brabant to make Retainers in High-Germany; and there at the ſame time they ſold all their Wool, every Sack for 40 l. which amounted in all to 400,000 l. Beſides all this, he is ſaid about this time to have ſeiz'd on the Wealth of the Cluniacks and Ciſtercians, Aliens, and of the Lombards, and all the Triennial Tythes, which were firſt intended for the Holy War.

[d] Dated at Antwerp, January 4, 1340.

* IT was part of the Convention, according to our truſty Hiſtorian Mr. Barnes, that Edward ſhould take upon him the Arms as well as Title of King of France, which he did, and thereupon receiv'd the Homage of the Flemings. Our Author ſhews that tho' this Prince afterwards, perhaps to gratify the French Nation, or becauſe that was the more ancient and greater Monarchy, plac'd the Flowers-de-Lis, in the dexter and more honourable Quarter, yet it was not ſo at their firſt intermingling. And he confirms his Opinion from what King Philip ſaid upon this occaſion to ſome Engliſh Agents employ'd at his Court. "Our Couſin, ſays he, doth "wrongfully quarter the Arms of England and France, which notwithſtanding doth not ſo much diſpleaſe us, "becauſe indeed he is deſcended (tho' by the weaker Sex) of our Kin; and therefore as being a Batcheler, "we could eaſily be content to allow him part of the Arms of Fra[illegible]; but whereas in his Seals and Letters "Patent, he ſtyles himſelf King of England, and of France, in the one, and ſets the Quarter of his Arms with "Leopards before the Quarter charg'd with Lillies in the other, this is that which we diſdain exceedingly; "for thereby it ſhould ſeem he prefers that inconſiderable Iſle of England before the mighty Kingdom of "France." To this Complaint, Sir John Shoreditch made Anſwer, "That it was the Cuſtom of England, "to ſet the Title and Arms of their Progenitors before thoſe of a Right deriv'd from the Mother. And "thus, ſaid he, doth my Lord the King of England prefer his paternal Coat, both out of Duty and Rea-"ſon." But it appears they were alter'd ſoon after, even as they ſtand now, only that when Charles VI of France, with deſign to ſhew a difference, chang'd the Semée Flowers-de-Lis into Three, our King Henry V alſo did the like, and ſo it hath continu'd ever ſince.

not be thought to neglect the Providence of God, and that he might conform himſelf to his Will and Pleaſure, he had reſolv'd to take upon him the Government of the Kingdom of France, which was devolv'd to him by the Death of Charles the Fair, and which, during his Minority, Philip had ſeiz'd unjuſtly, and with Violence. He alſo promis'd to govern the ſaid Realm according to the Laws and Cuſtoms in uſe at the time of his Predeceſſor St. Louis.

22. ANOTHER Declaration ſetting forth all the Overtures and Advances he had made from Time to Time to Philip, and the ſeveral Injuries he had receiv'd from him [g].

23. A MEMORANDUM of the Day of Edward's Return to England, viz. the 21ſt of February, 1340.

24. A LETTER to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſummoning him to come to the Parliament, and about his taking the new Title of King of France, dated at Harwich, the 21ſt of February, as aforeſaid. Non mirantes ex hoc quod ſtylum noſtrum conſuetum mutavimus, & regem Franciæ nos facimus nominari; nam diverſæ ſubſunt cauſæ, per quas hoc facere neceſſario nos oportet, & quas vobis, ac aliis prælatis & magnatibus, necnon communitatibus ejuſdem regni Angliæ, ad dictum parlamentum plenius exponemus, &c. i. e. Wonder not that we have alter'd our uſual Style, and that we have taken the Title of King of France; ſince various are the Reaſons for which it neceſſarily behov'd us to do it, and which we ſhall explain more at large to you and the other Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and alſo to the Commons of our ſaid Realm of England, at the ſaid Parliament.

25. A LETTER from Benedict XII. exhorting Edward to quit the Title of King of France [h]. Nuper excellentiæ regis literis, ſays the Pope, noſtro apoſtulatui præſentatis, & contentis in ipſis plenius intellectis, novus in eis deſcriptus titulus, & impreſſio ſigilli Franciæ armis & Angliæ ſculpti, ut prima facie videbatur, ſtuporis & admirationis magnam nobis materiam miniſtrarunt. i. e. Upon certain of your Excellency's Letters lately preſented to our Apoſtleſhip, and upon fuller Diſcovery of the Contents thereof, the new Title deſcribed in it, and the Impreſſion of the Seal engraved with the Arms of France and England, no ſooner appeared to our View, but it gave us great Cauſe of Aſtoniſhment and Admiration.—In the remaining Part of the Letter the Pope endeavours by all the Arguments that he could think of, to perſuade the King to lay aſide that Title.

26. THE King's Patent for creating William Marquiſs of Juliers, a Peer of England, by the Style and Title of Earl of Cambridge, with a Penſion of 1000 l. per Annum: Dated [i] May 12, 1340 *. M. of Juliers's Peerage and Penſion. p. 148.

IT appears from ſeveral Acts in this Tome, that Edward had pledg'd his Hereditary Crown, which he calls Hæreditariam & præcellentiorem, to the Archbiſhop of Triers, for 50,000 Florins [k]. He alſo pledged his Queen's Crown, and another leſſer, to ſome Merchants at Cologn [l]. King Edward pawns his Crowns. p. 101, 185, 409, 447.

27. EDWARD's Letter to the Pope, complaining that Nicol. de Fliſco, his Envoy, was carry'd away by Night from Avignon into France. It is dated [m] the 1ſt of June, 1340. He demands Satisfaction for this Affront, and tells the Pope in plain Terms, that he cannot expect to have any Ambaſſadors from him, 'till he has done him Juſtice for that Violation of the Law of Nations †. His Letter to the Pope, complaining of his Envoy's being carry'd into France. p. 188.

28. EDWARD's Letter to his Parliament, acquainting them with the Victory he had gain'd at Sea the 24th of June [n]. He alſo gave them Advice that he was marching to Tournay with 100,000 Men, and that Robert of Artois was advancing at the ſame time to St. Omer with 50,000. His Letter to his Parliament about his Victory at Sea, and the March of his Forces by Land. p. 197.

MEZERAY ſpeaking of the Cartel of Defiance which Edward ſent to King Philip, ſays, that the latter return'd only an Anſwer by word of Mouth, that a Sovereign never accepts any Challenge from his Vaſſal. But that was not Philip's Anſwer ‡. Here follow both the Cartel and the Anſwer. A Miſtake of Mezeray in relation to Philip's Anſwer to King Edward's Challenge.

29. PHILIP of VALOIS,

" WE have long and often, peaceably de- " manded of you by our Ambaſſadors, and Edward's Challenge to Philip of Valois. p. 198.

[g] Dated as above. [h] Dated at Avignon, the third of the Nones of March, 1340. [i] At Weſtminſter.

* HERE Mr. Barnes obſerves a miſtake of the Learned Antiquary Mr. Camden, who ſays in his Britannia, that King Edward III. for the Love he bore to Queen Philippa his Conſort, created the Lord John of Hainault her Uncle, Earl of Cambridge: And that upon his Revolt to the French, he diveſted him thereof, and conferr'd it upon William Marquiſs of Juliers, Siſter's Son to that Queen: whereas the Truth is, that the ſaid Lord John was not now, nor for ſome years after, revolted to the French, as is alſo own'd by the diligent and accurate Sir William Dugdale.

[k] The Convention for this purpoſe is dated the laſt Day of February, 1338. [l] As appears by Letters of Pledge and Redemption, dated at Weſtminſter, the 17th of May, 1340, the 10th of March, 1344, and the 10th of April, 1345. [m] At Clare.

† Mr. Barnes ſays, that while Nichol. de Fleſco, and his Son Andrew were at Avignon, under the Pope's Protection, certain wicked Perſons, to curry Favour with the King of France, about Midnight, on Good Friday Eve, enter'd his Houſe by Violence, broke open his Chamber, and hardly giving him time to put on one thin Garment, hurry'd him and his Son, and one young Gentleman away; and carried them down the Rhoſne to a certain Tower, from whence they convey'd them into France. For which Injury, the Pope not only thundred out the moſt heavy Edicts againſt the Authors and Accomplices of that Crime, but put the whole Kingdom of France under an Interdict; which oblig'd Philip to ſend the Priſoners back to the Pope, who then took off the Interdict, and hang'd all thoſe of his own Family who had a hand in the Matter, before the Doors of the Houſe which they had broke open, not excepting his own Maſter of the Horſe (who kill'd himſelf in Priſon for Anguiſh and Shame) whoſe Body he order'd to be expos'd on a Gibbet, to be devour'd by the Birds of the Air.

[n] It is dated at Bruges the 9th of July, 1340.

‡ MR. Barnes, who charges both Mezeray and du Cheſne with this Abſurdity, thus confutes it. " How know they, " ſays he, what King Philip ſent by Word of Mouth? And how could King Philip imagine that his Word ſhould be " taken in a matter of ſuch conſequence, when all Challenges ought to be confirm'd by Hand and Seal, unleſs made " in the hearing of the Defendant? And how was this an Anſwer to King Edward's Challenge, when King " Philip in his Letter profeſſes he would not anſwer him, becauſe he took not the Letter to be directed to him?" " Truth needs no ſuch pitiful Salvo.

Foedera Tom. V.

" otherwiſe, in the moſt reaſonable manner
" we could deviſe, that you would pleaſe to " reſtore unto us our lawful Inheritance of " France, which you have a long time de-
" tain'd from us, and wrongfully poſſeſs'd.
" And whereas we plainly ſee that you in" tend to perſevere in your injurious Detenti-
" on thereof, without returning us any ſatis-
" factory Anſwer to our Demand; we give " you to underſtand, that we are enter'd into
" the Province of Flanders as Sovereign
" Lord thereof, and are now paſſing thro' the " Country.

" And we farther ſignify to you, that by
" the Help of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and
" our righteous Cauſe, with the Forces of the " ſaid Country, and with our Subjects and " Allies; conſidering the Right we have to
" that Inheritance you wrongfully detain

" We are now approaching towards you,

" ful Challenge, if you alſo will draw near.

" And foraſmuch as ſo great an Army as " we bring with us on our part, ſuppoſing
" you alſo on your part to do the like, can" not ſubſiſt long in the Field without great
" Deſtruction, both of the People and Coun" try; which thing all good Chriſtians ought " to avoid, eſpecially Princes, and others
" who are the Governours of the People: We " are deſirous that,

" By as ſhort a Diſpatch as may be, and to " prevent the Mortality of Chriſtians, ſince the " Quarrel apparently belongs to you and me,

" The Controverſy between us may be " decided by our own Perſons, Body to
" Body; to which thing we offer our ſelves,
" for the Reaſons aforeſaid, and according to " the good Opinion we have of your great
" Nobility, Senſe and Wiſdom.

" And in caſe you ſhall not vouchſafe this " way; that then, the Diſputes may be end" ed by the Battel of one Hundred of the " moſt ſufficient Perſons of your Party, and
" as many of my Liege Subjects.

" And if you will not admit, either of the

" And we would have all the World know " that we offer you the Conditions above-
" mention'd, not out of any Pride or Malice,
" but for the Cauſes aforeſaid, to the intent
" that the Will of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be" ing declar'd between us two, Peace may " grow more and more among Chriſtians; and " that thereby the Enemies of God may be
" reſiſted, and Chriſtianity enfranchis'd.

30. PHILIP's Anſwer.

Edward III.

" PHILIP by the Grace of God, King
" of France, to Edward King of England.
" We have ſeen your Letters brought to our " Court, and ſent on your part to one Philip
" of Valois; wherein are contain'd certain
" Requeſts which you make to the ſaid Phi- " lip of Valois. P. 199.

" And,

" Because the ſaid Letters came not unto " us, and the ſaid Requeſts were not made " unto us, as it clearly appears by the Tenour
" of the ſaid Letters;

" We do not return you any Anſwer to
" the Premiſſes: Nevertheleſs, foraſmuch as " we have underſtood by the ſaid Letters, and " otherwiſe, that you are enter'd into our " Kingdom, and have invaded our People,
" more thro' Preſumption than Reaſon; and " not conſidering the Duty which a Liege
" Man oweth unto his Lord:

" For you are enter'd contrary to your " Liege Homage, when you acknowledg'd
" our ſelf, as Reaſon is, King of France,
" and promis'd the faithful Obedience, which
" a Liege Man ought to promiſe to his Lord;
" as more plainly doth appear from your Let" ters Patent, ſeal'd with your Great Seal,
" which we have in our Cuſtody, and which
" you ought to have always before your Eyes.

" Our Intention is, as ſoon as we think fit,
" to drive you out of our Kingdom, for the " Honour of us, and our Realm, and the Pro" fit of our People: And this to do, we have " firm Hope in Jeſus Chriſt, from whom
" we derive all our Power.

" For by your Enterprize, proceeding more " from Preſumption than Reaſon, the Holy " Voyage beyond Sea hath been hinder'd, a " great number of Chriſtians put to Death,
" the Divine Service diminiſh'd, and Holy " Church leſs reverenc'd.

" And as touching that which is noted,
" that you expect to be aſſiſted by the Flem-
" ings; we firmly truſt that the good Peo" ple and Commons of that Country, will ſo
" behave towards our Couſin, the Earl of " Flanders, their Lord, that it may not be to " their Diſhonour: and that to us, their So" vereign Lord, they will preſerve their Ho" nour and Loyalty.

" And as for what Miſtakes they have hi" therto committed, that has been occaſion'd
" by the evil Counſels of ſuch Perſons who " neither had any Regard to the publick
" Welfare, nor to the Honour of their Coun" try, but only to their own private Advantage.

His Letter to the Pope on the Violation of the Truce of Bretagne. p. 453.

58. EDWARD's Letter to the Pope concerning the Violation of the Truce of Bretagne, by the beheading of certain Noblemen of that Country at Paris: It is dated [m] May the 26th, 1345. In this Letter, which is very long, Edward makes a brief Recapitulation of all that had paſs'd from the beginning of the War, to the Concluſion of the Truce in Bretagne; after which he adds, Et cum ſic, ſpe Pacis arridente, ſub dictarum Treugarum fiducia redeuntes in Angliam, dimiſſis paucis Miniſtris noſtris in Britannia, pro regimine dictarum Partium, & Coadjutorum noſtrorum ibidem, ordinaſſemus Nuncios noſtros ad Sanctitatis veſtræ præſentiam, pro Tractatu Pacis, prout conditum fuerat tranſmittendos; ſupervenerunt nobis nova certa non leviter pungentia mentem noſtram, de morte, (videlicet) quorundam Nobilium, nobis Adhærentium, captorum in Britannia, & de ſpeciali præcepto dicti Philippi, Pariſiis ignominioſe morti contra formam dictarum Treugarum tyrannicæ traditorum; nec non de ſtrage, & depopulatione magna Fidelium, & locorum noſtrorum in Britannia, Vaſconia, & alibi, ac Tractatibus ſubdolis & occultis cum Alligatis & Subditis noſtris, habitis, quos ſic a nobis auferre & ſibi attrahere nitebatur; ac aliis, de facili non numerandis, injuriis & flagitiis contra dictas Treugas, per partem præfati Philippi, tam in terra quam in mari factis, & attemptatis, per quæ dictæ Treugæ noſcuntur, per partem dicti Philippi, notorie diſſolutæ. He adds a little lower, Ut taceamus de exceſſibus per Nuncium Sanctitatis veſtræ, pridem pro conſervatione Treugarum prædictarum miſſum in Britanniam, perpetratis, qui quod ſedaſſe debuit diſſidium, propenſius excitavit, non Conſervatorem Treugarum, ſed partem contra Nos & Noſtros potius ſe oſtendens; ſuper quo Sanctitas veſtra (ſalva pace ſua) remedium non adhibuit, licet ſuper hoc fuiſſet, ut decuit, requiſita.

A Miſtake of Mezeray, and other Hiſtorians, about the Impriſonment of certain Lords in Bretagne.

THIS Letter plainly diſcovers a Miſtake in Mezeray and other French Hiſtorians, who aſſert that the Lords of Bretagne, that were beheaded at Paris, were of the Party of Charles of Blois, and that they were actually apprehended at Paris, whither they went voluntarily to aſſiſt at a Tournament; for on the contrary it is evident, that they were of John Earl of Montfort's Party, and that they were apprehended in Bretagne. Quorundam Nobilium, ſays Edward, nobis Adhærentium, captorum in Bri- tannia, i. e. Certain Noblemen our Adherents who were taken in Bretagne. This Error, whether a wilful one or not, is of the more Importance, because the Death of those Noblemen being the principal Foundation of the Breach of the Truce, if what those Historians advance were true, Edward could not be justify'd for having unseasonably broke the Truce: For what reason could he possibly have had to take offence at the Death of any Lords of the contrary Party, even tho' as Argentre, an Historian of Bretagne, affirms, they had maintain'd a Correspondence with him? Was it not lawful for Philip and Charles of Blois to punish their own Subjects? But if those Lords were of John of Montfort's Party; and if they were apprehended in Bretagne during the Truce, how can Philip be excus'd for such a Breach of it?

John of Montfort's Escape.

It seems that Philip was willing to give Edward some Satisfaction, by releasing John of Montfort from the Tower of the Louvre, and leaving him in Paris upon his Parole: But John of Montfort did not think himself bound to keep his Parole; and therefore escaping out of Paris, he went to find out Edward, to whom he perform'd new Homage in these Terms: "I own you rightful King of France; "and to you as my Liege-Lord and natural "King of France, I perform my Homage for "the Duchy of Bretagne, which I claim to "hold from you my Lord, and become your "Liege-man in Life, and Member, and earthly "Honour, to live and die against all your Ene-"mies." It was perform'd [n] the 20th of May, 1345.

61. A Bull of Pope Clement VI, in answer to Edward's Letter of the 6th of May. This is a remarkable Bull, in that it makes Edward only blameable for the Breach of the Truce. This put me upon examining the principal Articles of the Charge, because on such Inquiry depends the Illustration of this Fact, which the Historians have left in great Obscurity. At the same time this may serve as one among numerous Examples, to shew the vast Service that is done to Truth by the Acts printed in the Fœdera.

Pope's Letter to Edward taxing him with the Breach of the Truce. P. 465.

PORRO, says the Pope, quia illi qui dictas tuas nobis missas Literas dictitarunt, rei veritatem forsitan ignorabant, multa posuerunt in eis, & aliqua tacuerunt, in quibus erraverunt notabiliter, factum taliter recitando: i. e. Moreover, because they who dictated your Letters to us, perhaps not knowing the Truth, have inserted many things, and omitted others in which they have err'd remarkably, by reciting the Fact after such a manner.

Now the Proofs which the Pope brings to convince Edward, that he was the Infractor of the Truce, are these;

1. He upbraids him for not executing the Conventions, by which he engag'd to send Ambassadors to him, one of whom was to be a Prince of the Blood Royal; both which Articles, says he, Philip has perform'd.

In answer to this Objection it may be observ'd, that amongst the Ambassadors nominated by Edward, were Henry of Lancaster Earl of Derby his Cousin, and Hugh Spenser Son to one of his Cousin-Germans. The Nomination of these Ambassadors is prov'd by the full Power which was given them [q]. It is true, that before this solemn Embassy was sent away, he dispatch'd other Ambassadors to the Pope, to complain of some Infractions of the Truce, and of the carrying off of Flisco, as also to demand an effectual safe Conduct. From hence the Pope takes occasion to object, that not one of the Ambassadors sent to him was a Prince of the Royal Family. But who does not see that this Objection is perfectly captious, since those Ambassadors were not sent to treat of Peace? On the other hand, if Edward did not send his Plenipotentiaries, it was because no Satisfaction was given him, as to the carrying off of his Envoy, and that the Pope had even absolv'd those who committed that Violence without his Participation. In the second place, John of Montfort was detain'd in Prison, contrary to the Conventions of the Truce. And finally, the Pope refus'd to grant the English Plenipotentiaries their safe Conduct, in the Form wherein Edward demanded it. Therefore the Pope could blame none but himself for the Delay of the English Ambassadors, 'till the time that the Lords of Bretagne were put to death.

Edward III.

Vindication of Edward's Conduct.

p. 381.

2. As to the Execution of those Lords, the Pope excuses it thus. He says, that when he wrote about it to the King of France, Philip return'd for Answer, that he had caus'd them to be put to death for diverse Crimes which they had committed, and particularly for having broke the Truce of Bretagne: That besides, those very Gentlemen had affirm'd, that they had no manner of Confederacy with Edward, but only with John of Montfort; and that the said Earl, then a Prisoner at Paris, affirm'd on his part, that he had made no Alliance with Edward. But nothing is more evident than the Weakness of this Excuse. Could Philip be ignorant that the Truce was made in Bretagne upon account of the War which Edward carry'd into that Province in favour of John of Montfort? Besides, there's no manner of probability that Montfort should declare he had made no Alliance with Edward, since it was by vertue of the said Alliance that his Liberty was stipulated in the Articles of the Truce, and to that alone in all likelihood he ow'd his Life; for had it not been for Edward's Protection he would have been expos'd to the Severity of the Laws, for having taken up Arms against his Sovereign. He was not so weak therefore to deprive himself of that Protection, by declaring that he had made no Alliance with his Protector. It is also worthy of Remark, that Philip own'd that the Lords who had been beheaded were of John of Montfort's Party; and that he did not disown their being apprehended in Bretagne, as Edward affirm'd in his Letter to the Pope. It is therefore evident, that since all the Allies and Adherents of the two Kings were included in the Truce, Philip was the Man that broke it, by causing the Lords of the contrary Party to be taken up in Bretagne, and put to death at Paris.

FOEDERA Tom. V.

3. THE Pope ſays to Edward, that as he complain'd of certain Infractions of the Truce, Philip made the like Complaint on his part. In this it is poſſible that both Parties were to blame.

4. As to Edward's Complaint that Charles of Blois broke the Truce, and that Philip aſſiſted him; the Pope makes anſwer, that the King of France had aſſur'd him, that he gave that Prince no manner of Aſſiſtance. He adds, that Charles of Blois repairing in Perſon to Avignon, had declar'd in his Preſence, that he was not included in the Treaty, that he was not once nam'd in it, and that he was not ſo much as requir'd to ſign it. But this again is an evaſive Anſwer, becauſe the Truce made in Bretagne between the two Kings, included all their Subjects and Allies, as may be ſeen in this Tome of the Fœdera [r], tho' they were not therein nominated, and that none but the Ambaſſadors of the two Kings ſign'd the Treaty. And if, under pretence that Charles of Blois had not ſign'd the Truce, and was not therein mention'd, it was lawful for him to continue the War in Bretagne, it was equally lawful for Montfort's Party to have done the ſame: Conſequently this Truce, which had been chiefly made for the ſake of Bretagne, would have been a mere Deluſion.

Order for proclaiming the three Years Truce with France. p. 357.

5. As to Edward's Complaints to the Pope about his Nuncio, Clement contents himſelf with denying the Fact, and with barely ſaying that he would have puniſh'd his Nuncio, if he had obſerv'd the leaſt Partiality in his Conduct.

6. IT is not ſo eaſy, indeed, to excuſe Edward upon the Pope's Complaint that the Engliſh had by force made themſelves Maſters of the City of Vannes, after having turn'd out the Pope's Troops, who ought to have kept it 'till the Expiration of the Truce. This perhaps might be by way of Repriſal for ſome Place which had been taken by Charles of Blois. By the way, this may ſerve to let us into the Secret how Vannes came into the Hands of John of Montfort, which is a Fact whereof the Hiſtorian of Bretagne was ignorant.

THESE were the Arguments on which Clement laid the greateſt Streſs, in order to convince Edward that it was he who firſt broke the Truce. He did not mention one Word in this Bull about the carrying off of Fliſco, and it is probable he had nothing to ſay to excuſe it. Edward therefore might juſtly ſay to the Pope upon this Article as well as the foregoing, that thoſe who had dictated his Bull had paſs'd over ſome important Articles in Silence, and diſguis'd the Truth of others. Several other Obſervations might be made upon this Bull, which is dated the 12th of the Calends of Auguſt, only I am afraid of running out into too tedious a Diſcuſſion of it; and am of Opinion that what has been ſaid may be ſufficient to ſhew which of the two Kings was chargeable with the Breach of the Truce.

63. A PROCLAMATION, or Manifeſto dated [u] the 15th of March, 1346, juſtifying the War againſt Philip of Valois. What is very remarkable in this Proclamation is Edward's ſaying, that immediately upon the Death of Charles the Fair, he conſulted the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Civilians of his Kingdom; and that by their Advice he ſent Ambaſſadors into France to demand the Crown. He adds, that they could not obtain Audience; and that after having left their Proteſts, they were oblig'd to retire for fear of their Lives. EDWARD's Affairs with Scotland.

Anno 1338.

WHEN we clos'd our Account of the fourth Tome of the Fœdera, we left Scotland in a very unhappy State. Edward being Master of the chief Places reign'd there, while Edward Baliol had the Title indeed of King, but no more than the Shadow of Sovereignty, so long as King David was a Refugee at the Court of France, which sought rather to prolong the War in Scotland, than to put an end to it by any powerful Succours. After the time that Edward had made known his Designs against France, Philip of Valois would have been very glad if he could have made a powerful Diversion in Scotland; but it was too late, for then he had enough to do to oppose a League form'd against him, while Edward amus'd him with the false Hopes of Peace, as was observ'd in the Account of the preceding Tome. For this Reason the Succours with which he was able to furnish the Scots, were not very considerable. Mean time Robert Stuart, who was Regent in Scotland for King David, perceiving that Edward would have Work enough cut out for him in Flanders, flatter'd himself with the Hopes of making his Advantage of this Diversion; and therefore, after having assembled some Troops, as soon as he heard that Edward was gone beyond Sea, he renew'd the Hostilities in Scotland. The little Opposition he met with from Baliol, with whom Edward had left but few Forces, and some little Success which attended his Arms at the beginning, giving him a fair Opportunity to augment his Army, he resolv'd to besiege Perth, which he did accordingly next Year, viz. 1339, just about the time that Edward began his first Campaign in Flanders. The taking of this Place, which cost him a Siege of three Months, having oblig'd Baliol to retire towards the Frontiers of England, the Regent improv'd his Advantages, and attack'd the strong Town of Sterling, which he took by Composition, after he had likewise made himself Master of Edinburgh by a Stratagem.

EDWARD III.

EDWARD being too busy in his Preparations for the Campaign which he was to make in Flanders in the Year 1340, to have any Thoughts of Scotland, Steuart took that Opportunity to make an Incursion into Northumberland, from whence he carry'd away a great Booty. Afterwards, while Edward was before Tournay, the Regent of Scotland made himself Master of Roxborough, and in short, of all other Places which the English held in Scotland, so that Berwick only remain'd in their Hands.

Anno 1340.

THE Scots being expresly included in the Truce which was made before Tournay in the Year 1341, as soon as it was expir'd, Edward resolv'd to go once more and ravage Scotland, while the Truce which he had prolong'd with France still subsisted. With this View he went to Newcastle, where he waited in vain for his Fleet which was to bring Provisions for his Army. A violent Storm which dispers'd that Fleet having broke his Measures, he was oblig'd to grant the Scots a Truce, on condition that they would submit to his Authority if King David did not return to Scotland by a certain time with an Army strong enough to give Battel. Buchanan says, that David was already in Scotland incognito, and that he likewise made an Incursion into Northumberland. Be this as it will, Edward, whose Head was full of the Affair of Bretagne, mention'd in the preceding Article, granted a new Truce to King David, and then retir'd.

Edward's Truces with the Scots.

Anno 1342.

IT was during this Truce, towards the latter end of the Year 1342, that Edward went to carry the War into Bretagne, where in February, 1343, he made a Truce which was to last 'till Michaelmass 1346, and in which Scotland was included. It was observ'd in the foregoing Article, that this Truce was broke so far as related to France, in the Year 1345, and that Edward made a Descent in Normandy in 1346.

Anno 1346.

King David invades England.

WHILE Edward was that Year ravaging Normandy, and the Neighbourhood of Paris, David broke the Truce on his part, by sending Forces to make an Incursion into England, while himself was preparing to give a more powerful Diversion. This evidently appears from an act in the Fœdera, which I shall mention hereafter.

EDWARD laying siege to Calais after the Battel of Cressy, Philip who was not in a Condition to come soon enough to raise it, engag'd King David to make a powerful Diversion in England, in hopes that Edward would be oblig'd to hasten home to the Relief of his own Subjects. By this time David could not but be very well prepar'd to receive him, because he had been in England six Weeks after the Battel of Cressy, at the Head of 60,000 Men, and was even advanc'd as far as Durham. The Diligence of the English to oppose this Invasion was so great, that by the Care of the Archbishop of York, and some Lords in the North, they were soon in a Condition to give the Scots Battel; which they did near Durham, where the Scots Army was entirely routed, with the Loss of 15,000 Men, and King David himself taken Prisoner.

He is routed and taken Prisoner.

THE

FOEDERA Tom. V.

THE Loſs which the Scots ſuffer'd, together with the Impriſonment of their King, would have put them out of a Capacity to ſtop the Engliſh Arms, if France had not taken care to get them included in the Truce of Calais, and in the frequent prolongations thereof to the Year 1354, as was obſerv'd in the preceding Article. During theſe Truces, Endeavours were us'd for procuring King David his Liberty by ſeveral Negotiations, which after having laſted many Years, were at length conſummated in a Treaty made in the Year 1354, by which Edward engag'd to ſet David at full Liberty for a Ranſon of 90000 Marks Sterling, payable in nine Years; for which David was oblig'd to give good Sureties. This happen'd at the very Juncture when Edward made ſure of concluding a Peace with King John, according to the Articles agreed on, betwixt Guiſnes and Calais: But as John had no deſign to confirm thoſe Articles, he engag'd the Scots to renew the Hoſtilities, by ſending 40000 Crowns to be diſtributed, as Buchanan ſays, among the leading Men in Scotland: Therefore juſt as David was going to be ſet at liberty, Stuart took Berwick by Surprize, and ſet fire to it [a]. This unexpected Rupture forcing Edward to take other Meaſures, he caus'd David to be more cloſely confin'd in the Caſtle of Odiham, and march'd towards the Frontiers of both Kingdoms to recover Berwick; which was no difficult matter for him to do, becauſe the Scots had abandon'd it.

EDWARD's Expedition did not end with Berwick, but he likewiſe made himſelf Maſter of Edinburgh and Roxburgh, and ravag'd ſome of the Counties of Scotland without mercy; and if it had not been for a Breach of the Treaty, then begun with France, 'tis very likely that Edward would have made himſelf Maſter of all Scotland. At leaſt, there is no doubt but he intended it, when 'tis conſider'd, that at that time he began his Negotiations with Baliol, whereby the latter was to make over to Edward all his Right to that Kingdom, as appears by ſome Acts in this Tome. The Negotiations for this purpoſe, which probably were interrupted by the Preparations that Edward was oblig'd to make for renewing the War againſt France, were begun again in the Year 1356. Till then Edward made uſe of Baliol's Name in the War with Scotland; but at length he took off the Mask, and determin'd to act in his own Name. For this end, he got Baliol to yield him the Kingdom of Scotland, with all its Dependencies, on the Payment of a yearly Penſion of 2000*l.* Sterling, which he gave him as a Compenſation for that imaginary Crown. And with this the Acts of the fifth Tome relating to Scotland conclude: We will juſt run thro the chief of them.

Other Foreign Affairs.

DURING the nineteen Years to which the Acts of this Tome relate, Edward had a multitude of Negotiations with ſeveral Princes, eſpecially with reſpect to his grand Affair, I mean the War with France. But as it would run me too great a length to account for all theſe Negotiations, I ſhall but juſt mention the Princes and others with whom he had to treat during that Term; to the end that ſuch as ſhall happen to want recourſe to any of thoſe Articles, may conſult the Fœdera it ſelf.

Summary of Edward's Negotiations.

HERE are Negotiations therefore with the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, the Towns of Flanders, the Duke of Gueldre, the Marquis of Juliers, and the Duke of Brabant, particularly the latter, about a Marriage which was propos'd between Edward, eldeſt Son to the King, and a Daughter of that Duke. It ſeems that the Pope refus'd a Diſpenſation for this Marriage, tho' it was often deſir'd of him.

Diſpute betwixt his Queen and her Siſter.

THERE's alſo a Treaty with the Earl of Hainault, Edward's Brother-in-law. After that Earl's Death, there was a Difference between his two Siſters, the eldeſt of which, Margaret, was Widow to the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, and Philippa the youngeſt had marry'd Edward III. They both laid claim to the Succeſſion of Hainault, Holland, and Zealand, as appears by ſeveral Acts in this 5th Tome.

HERE we alſo find certain Negotiations with Alphonſo IX. King of Caſtile, chiefly relating to the Marriage of Joan, Edward's eldeſt Daughter, with Peter, afterwards ſurnamed the Cruel, who was Alphonſo's eldeſt Son. The Match being at laſt concluded, after tedious Negotiations, that Princeſs died at Bourdeaux in her way to her Spouſe.

Marriage of his Daughter.

IN this Tome we likewiſe find ſome Acts which make mention of a certain Spaniſh Fleet that committed great Diſorders in the Channel, and which Edward went in Perſon to attack. The Advantage, he gain'd in the Action, procur'd a Truce of 20 Years with the Spaniards[g].

HERE are Treaties alſo with the Kings of Arragon, Portugal and Majorca, Philip of Navarre, Brother to Charles the Bad; the Duke of Auſtria, the Marquis of Brandenburgh, the Emperor Charles IV. the Count of Geneva, the Dauphin of Viennois, Godfrey of Harcourt, and ſeveral Lords of Guyenne, and particularly with the Lord de le Bret or d'Albret.

THERE are alſo ſeveral Acts in this Tome which relate to Bretagne, and to the Alliance with John of Montfort; and a Treaty made with Charles of Blois, who having been taken Priſoner at the Battle of Rien in 1347, was brought to England, where he ſtay'd till 1356, when he obtain'd his Liberty for a Ranſom of 700000 Crowns, payable at ſundry Terms, of which Edward forgave him one half, on condition that he would pay the other punctually at the Terms agreed on[h].

HERE are moreover ſeveral Propoſals for the Marriage of Edward's Children; all which Articles furniſh Matter for an infinite number of Acts, which it wou'd be too tedious to give an account of.

Domeſtick Affairs.

ENGLAND having enjoy'd a profound Peace during theſe 19 Years, there happen'd no Event at home of any conſequence. Therefore all the Contents of this Article may be rang'd under ſome looſe Acts, of which theſe that follow are the moſt material.

8. AN Act for reverſing the Attainder of John Maltravers, becauſe contrary to the Laws of the Kingdom he had never been heard in his own defence; dated December the 28th, 1347[f].

'TIS very probable that this was the ſame Maltravers who was charg'd with the Murder of Edward II. for 'tis ſaid in this Act, that he came to wait on the King at Sluys in Flanders. But this Reverſal was only a matter of mere Form, becauſe Edward granted it on condition that he ſhould appear in Court when ſummon'd.

Order not to depart the Kingdom on account of the Plague. P. 668.

THE Plague which ravag'd England during the Year 1349, gave occaſion for ſeveral Acts, of which there are theſe two remarkable.

THE firſt is a Prohibition to leave the Kingdom upon account of the Peſtilence; dated December the 1ſt, 1349[i].

Order relating to Servants in time of the Plague. P. 693.

THE ſecond is an Order whereby both Men and Women, who had no Eſtates, or no Profeſſion to maintain themſelves, were oblig'd to enter into Service, for the Wages common to the places where they liv'd, on pain of being impriſon'd till they could find Sureties for their Obedience. What gave occaſion to the Order was this: The Plague having carry'd off moſt of the Domeſticks in the Kingdom, it was a hard matter to get any; and thoſe that were inclin'd to go to work, or Service, took that Opportunity to exact upon their Maſters.

Affairs with the Court of Rome, or relating to Religion.

BUT what is matter of Grief is, that the Slips of this very Vine are degenerated into a wild Vine, and the Boars out of the Wood do waſte it, and every wild Beaſt devours it, while by the Impoſitions and Proviſions of the Apoſtolick See (which now grow more inſupportable than ever) its own Subſtance, contrary to the pious Intent and Order of the Donors, is detain'd in the hands of the unworthy, and eſpecially Foreigners; and its Dignities and fat Benefices are conferr'd upon Strangers, who for the moſt part are Perſons whom we ſuſpect, and who neither reſide on the ſaid Benefices, nor know the Face nor underſtand the Voice of the Flock to them committed; but wholly neglecting the Cure of Souls, like Hirelings, only ſeek temporal Gain; and ſo the Worſhip of Chriſt is impair'd, the Cure of Souls neglected, Hoſpitality withdrawn, the Rights of the Church loſt, the Houſes of the Clergy dilapidated, the Devotion of the Laity decay'd, the Clergy of the ſaid Kingdom, who are Men of great Learning and honeſt Converſation, and are able to perform the Cure of Souls effectually, and would alſo be fit for Ours and the publick Service, forſake their Studies, becauſe the Hopes of any reaſonable Preferment are thus taken away, which we know is not pleaſing to the Divine Will.——We therefore by this their Repreſentation plainly beholding the Depreſſion of the Church of England, and the Diſinheriſon of our Crown, with all the foreſaid Evils, which, if longer diſſembled, would probably very much increaſe, do now refer them unto you, who are the Succeſſor of the Prince of the Apoſtles, who receiv'd Command from Chriſt to feed, not to ſhear the Lord's Sheep, and to ſtrengthen, not to oppreſs his Brethren, heartily intreating that, &c.

EDWARD III.

THE [k] fixth Tome of the Fœdera contains sixteen Years of the Reign of Edward III. viz. from the beginning of the Year 1357, to the end of 1372. Forasmuch as Edward's Affairs with France are the principal Subject of this Tome, I shall insist chiefly on this Article, the rest containing little remarkable.

I. The Affairs betwixt Edward and France.

Truce with France, and King John brought Prisoner to London.

IMMEDIATELY after the glorious Victory which Edward the Son gain'd near Poictiers, the said Prince repair'd to Bourdeaux, whither the Pope sent a Cardinal to him, to negotiate a Truce in favour of France. A Truce being accordingly concluded for two Years, the Prince of Wales set out in the Month of April 1357, to conduct King John to London, where [l] Edward receiv'd the Captive King with as much Honour as if he had come purely to pay him a Visit.

His Son takes the Title of Regent.

NEVERTHELESS the Imprisonment of this Prince occasioned such Troubles in France, that the Dauphin his Son, who took the Title of Regent, had no hopes of procuring his Father's Liberty. He had an Enemy, in the King of Navarre, who knew so well how to improve that fatal Conjuncture in order to sow Discord in the State, that it was not possible for the Regent to make Preparations for renewing the War, as soon as the Truce should be expir'd. King John, who was thorowly inform'd of all those Disorders, and saw plainly that there was nothing to expect from the Sword, hoped to procure his Liberty himself, by negotiating a Treaty of Peace with Edward. This Treaty, which cou'd not but be very advantageous to England, considering the Situation of Affairs, having been sent to France, the General Assembly of the States refus'd to ratify [k] We come now to the Sixth Tome of the Fœdera, which we shall introduce, as we have done the two former Tomes, with such part of Mr. Rymer's Dedication of it to Queen Anne, as opens a farther View of the glorious Reign of King Edward III.

May it please your Majesty,

" After the many Leagues and Alliances in former Tomes, in the last (that was presented to your Majesty) " appear'd the Operations of War, and a wonderful Success in Battles.

" In this Book TWO CAPTIVE KINGS (whom God had given into the hands of your most noble Pro- " genitor Edward III.) are ransom'd and set at liberty.

" Thereupon ensu'd (that commonly call'd) THE GREAT PEACE; a Treaty the most solemn, and the " most memorable that ever had been form'd between two contending Nations.

" This furthermore contains, besides the Peace with France, one Exploit of War on the other side of the Py- " reneans, one decisive Blow at Nazara.

" In short, your Majesty, with this Tome, gives to the World a Partition of France, and the Conquest of " Spain, &c."

[l] He was met in Southwark by above 1000 of the chief Citizens of London on horseback: The Captive being mounted on a noble white Courser, in token of Sovereignty, and the Conqueror riding by his side on a little black Hobby, as if he shunn'd all Suspicion of a Triumph. He was receiv'd by the Lord-Mayor of London, &c. in all their Formalities, with the City-Pageants; and in the Streets thro' which he pass'd to Westminster, the Citizens hung out all their Plate, Tapestry, and Armour, so that the like had never been seen before in the Memory of Man. King Edward received him on a Royal Throne in Westminster-Hall, from whence he rose hastily and caress'd him. He the same Day treated the French King, his Son Philip, and the rest of the noble Captives at a Princely Rate; and 'till the Palace of the Savoy was ready for him, he lodg'd him in his own Court. See Barnes's History, p. 526.

ratify it, and promis'd the Dauphin to enable him to obtain Terms more advantageous, but were not as good as their Word.

He is sent to a Castle in Lincolnshire.

EDWARD consequently despairing of such a Peace as he wish'd for, resolv'd to take up the Cudgels again; and as he thought that John meant nothing but to amuse him in the late Negotiation, he treated him with less Regard, and caus'd him to be shut up in the Castle of Sommerton. Mean time he made Preparations to carry the War into the very Heart of France, not doubting but he should be a vast Gainer by the Confusion which then reign'd in that Kingdom. He numerous Host he made himself Master of many places in Normandy, where he put his Army into Winter Quarters; and in the Month of March 1360, he advanc'd towards Champagne with a design to take in Rheims, where 'tis said he resolv'd to be crown'd.

In Burgundy.

But missing his Aim, he caus'd the Gates of Sens to be open'd to him; and then turning towards Burgundy, he threaten'd that Province with entire Desolation. The Duke of Burgundy, who was not in a Condition to oppose him, resolv'd to capitulate upon the best Terms he could, in order to save his Dominions from being pillag'd; and obtain'd a particular Truce for three Years, on condition of paying down 200000 Florins, and furnishing the English Army with Provisions.

As Edward quitted Burgundy, he marched towards the Isle of France with a Design to draw the Regent to a Battle: But that Prince was too wise to hazard the safety of France so rashly, and therefore lay close in Paris, so that all Edward's Bravadoes could not fetch him out. The Siege of Paris seeming an Enterprize too difficult for the King of England, he turn'd back towards la Beausse, with a design to go and refresh his Army on the Banks of the Loire. While he was encamp'd near Great Storm of Thunder and Hail.

Chartres, a terrible Storm arose, with Thunder and Hail of a prodigious bigness, which kill'd 3000 Horses, and above 1000 of his Soldiers. This extraordinary Event, which seem'd to denote the Wrath of Heaven, struck this Prince with such a Terror, that turning towards the Steeple of the Church of Chartres, he fell on his knees, and made a Vow to give Peace to France upon equitable Terms. With this Resolution he sent his Son the Prince of Wales to Bretigny, whither the Dauphin likewise repair'd; and in that very place those two Princes, after a Negotiation which lasted not above a Week, concluded a Treaty of Peace, which in all appearance was much the same with what had been agreed on at London the Year before.

Treaty of Bretigny.

BY the Treaty of Bretigny, the Crown of France yielded to the King of England a great number of Provinces in full Sovereignty, and, as it were, made a Partition of the Kingdom with the English. Besides this, King John engag'd to pay three Millions of Crowns of Gold for his Ransom, and to deliver up several Hostages, of whom five should be Princes of the Blood. In pursuance of this Treaty, King John was conducted to Calais, where he was set at liberty, after he had ratified the Treaty, and given all the other Securities that Edward was pleas'd to demand of him.

King John ransom'd and releas'd.

WHEN he was arriv'd at St. Omer, he ratified every thing that he had done at Calais, swore to the Peace again, and made his eldest Son Charles, his other Sons, and twenty of the best Noblemen in the Kingdom take the same Oath. In fine, he did every thing that he cou'd to shew that what he had done was voluntary, altho' he was a Prisoner. And he made a greater Discovery of his Sincerity afterwards, by punctually executing the Treaty of Bretigny, two Articles excepted: The first related to the County of Gavre in Gascoigne, and to the Territory of Belville in Poictou, about which some Dispute arose: The second was with respect to his Ransom, which it was not possible for him to pay at the Terms prescrib'd, because of the ill State of his Kingdom.

MEAN time, the Non-Execution of these two Articles was the reason that Edward detain'd the Hostages in England. Among these there had been four that were call'd Lords of the Flower de Lis, viz. the Duke of Orleans, Brother to the King of France, the Dukes of Anjou and Berry, the King's Sons, and the Duke of Bourbon. As these Princes were quite weary of England, Edward was willing to set them at liberty, on condition that the County of Gavre and the Territory of Belville, which occasion'd his Quarrel with King John, should be deliver'd up to him. But just as they were at the point of executing this agreement, which was ratified by the King of France, the Princes who were to be deliver'd being already conducted to Calais, the Duke of Anjou retir'd without leave, and never return'd more: His ill Example was follow'd by four other Hostages of an inferior Rank; and by their Escape the Measures which had been concerted for the Liberty of the other Princes, were entirely broke.

'TIS hard to guess the reason why John, who had acted so sincerely in the execution of the Treaty, did not oblige the Prince his Son to return into England, or why he did not send Prince Philip his fourth Son thither, or at least some other Hostages, to supply the place of the Duke of Anjou. Whatever Cause it was, his taking a Resolution soon after to return to England, made some do him the honour to say, that it was to throw himself again into Prison, in order to make Reparation for his Son's Crime, and to shew that

that he was not consenting to his Escape. But of this there's not the least shadow of Probability, because by the Treaty he was only oblig'd to send back the Duke of Anjou, or to give the King of England some Satisfaction by sending him other Hostages in the Duke's room. Besides, he had already executed the most important Articles of the Treaty, nothing remaining to be determin'd but the Affair of Gavre and Belville, and the residue of his Ransom Money, of which he had already pay'd near a Million. Consequently, there was not the least necessity for his surrendering himself again a Prisoner to discharge his Faith. 'Tis still more ridiculous to assert, as some have done, that his Love for a Lady at the Court of England made him return to London; for can it be imagin'd that a Prince, of 50 Years of Age, should abandon a Kingdom in so bad a Condition as his was in then, to follow the Impulse of a foolish Passion[a]? They who tell us that he had a mind to settle with Edward the Expedition of a Croisado, of which the Pope had declar'd him General, seem to have more reason for what they say, tho' even this is at most but Conjecture. Whatever was the Motive of it, 'tis certain that he return'd to London, and that there he died some Months after, viz. on the 8th of April 1364.

King John returns to London, and dies there.

IN September following, the famous Quarrel between the Families of Blois and Montfort was decided by the Battle of Avray, where Charles of Blois was kill'd. This Battel was follow'd with the Treaty of Guerande, which put John of Montfort in Possession of Bretagne.

Battle of Avray, and Treaty of Guerande.

AFTER the Peace of Bretigny, Edward had in 1362. erected the Dutchy of Guyenne into a Principality, with which he had invested Edward his eldest Son. This Prince was gone to keep his Court at Bourdeaux, where he led an unactive Life, very unsuitable to his warlike Temper, the Peace giving him no manner of Opportunity to exercise his Valour. But in 1366, he was call'd out of this State of Inactivity by Peter surnam'd the Cruel, King of Castile, who having been drove out of his Dominions by Henry Count of Trastemare, his Bastard Brother, went to Bayonne to implore the Assistance of the Prince of Wales. As France naturally favour'd Henry, whom she had plac'd upon the Throne of Castile, this was a sufficient Reason to induce the English Prince to espouse the Interest of Peter. Therefore he assembled a powerful Army in his Principality; and after having made a Treaty with the King of Navarre, who gave him passage into his Dominions, he repair'd to the Frontiers of Castile, where he met Henry, who was advanc'd to dispute his Entrance into that Kingdom. It was hard by the little Town of Najara that these two Princes fought a bloody Battle, in which the Castilians were intirely defeated. The Prince of Wales's Victory was follow'd with the Restoration of Peter, who instead of making an Acknowledgment for so great a piece of Service, suffer'd the best part of that Army, which had fought for him so valiantly, to perish with Hunger and Misery. This perfidious Action oblig'd the Prince of Wales to quit Castile, where he had contracted a Distemper he never got rid of, in order to return to Guyenne with the rest of his Troops, who had reason to repent of their Expedition, glorious as it was.

The Black Prince made Prince of Guyenne.

He restores Peter King of Castile to his Dominions by the Victory at Najara.

Peter's base Ingratitude.

AS soon as the Prince came to Bourdeaux, he disbanded his Army without paying it, having taken no Measures to find the Money, because he had depended upon the Faith of Peter, who had engag'd to bear the whole Expence of the War. The Troops, when thus disbanded without their Pay, thought they had Authority to get it where they could: Therefore they divided themselves into several little Bands, under the Conduct of some Officers of Reputation, and committed a multitude of Ravages in Guyenne. The Prince of Wales, who was not in a condition to satisfy them, and who could not prevail on himself to push Soldiers who had serv'd him so well to the utmost extremity, only intreated them to commit their Ravages elsewhere. Whether it was in respect to this Prince, or whether those Troops thought they could get more Booty in other Parts, they fell into the next adjacent Provinces of France, where they committed extravagant Outrages. Charles V. then upon the Throne, complain'd of it as a Breach of the Treaty; but he was answer'd that they were Persons unauthoriz'd, and that he might fall upon them in what manner he pleas'd, without England's taking their part. Mean time, to give him yet greater Satisfaction, Edward publish'd a Proclamation recalling all those Vagabonds, declaring them, in case of Refusal, Traitors and Rebels, and confiscating all their Estates. Tho', after such a Declaration, Prince of Wales forc'd to disband his Soldiers without Pay, who thereupon ravage all Guyenne.

Edward's Proclamation against them.

[a] Mr. Barnes takes notice that many of our Writers indiscreetly surmise, as if one occasion of King John's coming to England at this time, was for Love of the Countess of Salisbury: Which Opinion, saith he, the noble Lord Orrery hath authoriz'd with his excellent Pen, in his Play call'd The Black Prince. But he wou'd have it consider'd, that my Lord wrote a Poem for Delight, and not a History for the Establishment of Truth. Therefore he cannot pardon Sir Richard Baker, and others of his Character: For, says he, if they mean by the Countess of Salisbury, the first Earl of Montague's Lady, who was Catherine, Daughter of the Lord Grandison, she had been dead above 12 Years: If they refer to the fair Lady of Kent, she was married two Years before to Prince Edward, and was now with him in Aquitain, of which King John cou'd not be ignorant: And if they be forc'd to own the Lady Elizabeth, Daughter to the Lord Mohun, who was Wife to the second Earl of Montague, and the only Countess of Salisbury at this time; he defies them to bring the least Shadow of Authority for it. And upon the whole Mr. Barnes professes a great Resentment to see the Honour not only of a noble Lady, but also of two Kings, John and Edward, who are both said to have been in love with her, thus shamefully traduced by Men of no Industry, or else of no Honesty.

ration, it was the buſineſs of France to find Ways and Means to get rid of thoſe Plunderers, yet the Prince of Wales was afraid leſt the Affair ſhould end in a War, of which he might be charg'd as the Author. To prevent this Inconvenience, he ſtudy'd Methods to ſatisfy thoſe Troops, by impoſing a Tax upon his Dominions, call'd Fouage, or Smoke-Money, becauſe it was laid upon every Hearth or Chimney. This Expedient bid fair for Succeſs, if after the Peace of Bretigny, the King his Father had not unhappily revok'd ſeveral Grants which he had made to the principal Lords of Guyenne, at a time when his Affairs requir'd him to make ſure of the Fidelity of the Gaſcons. This Revocation ſo incens'd thoſe Noblemen, that they reſolv'd to be reveng'd; and the new King of France was not wanting to excite them underhand. We ſhall find hereafter that this Prince had already form'd a Deſign to break the Peace, to have an occaſion to recover thoſe Provinces which France had loſt ſince the Treaty of Bretigny. The Nobility of Guyenne, who found themſelves ſupported by the King of France, incited their Vaſſals and Tenants to complain to them of the Chimney Tax newly impos'd; and having receiv'd their Complaints, they carry'd them to the Prince, by whom they were but ill receiv'd. Upon his Refuſal to redreſs this pretended Abuſe, they apply'd to the King of France, ſuppoſing that he was ſtill Sovereign of Guyenne, notwithſtanding his Renunciation of that Sovereignty; and begg'd him to grant them Letters of Appeal. Charles maintain'd them for a time at Paris, till his Affairs were ready; and at length granted them what they deſir'd. In conſequence of this Appeal, he caus'd the Prince of Wales to be cited before the Court of Peers, to vindicate himſelf againſt the Complaints of his Subjects. The Prince making anſwer that he wou'd not fail to appear at the head of 60000 Men, Charles caus'd War to be declar'd againſt Edward by a Footman, becauſe the Prince had taken ſome pretext to arreſt thoſe who had brought him the Citation.

He impoſes a Chimney-Tax

His Subjects complain of it.

Charles ſummons him to the Court of Peers.

Declares War againſt him.

As we find but few Circumſtances of this War in our Collection of the publick Acts in the Fœdera, I ſhall content my ſelf with barely relating the ſucceſs of it, which was very fatal to England. Immediately after the Declaration of the War, Edward ſaw himſelf robb'd of the County of Ponthieu, and heard at the ſame time that the greateſt part of Guyenne was revolted. As he found himſelf under an indiſpenſable Neceſſity to renew the War, he reſum'd the Title of King of France, which he had drop'd ever ſince the Treaty of Bretigny, but the Title procur'd him no manner of advantage. Bertrand du Gueſclin, Conſtable of France, made great Progreſs in Guyenne, and the neighbouring Provinces; inſomuch that the Prince of Wales, whoſe Illneſs was turn'd into a perfect Dropſy, cou'd not oppoſe his Arms. On the contrary, after having ſeverely puniſh'd the City of Limoges for its Rebellion, he was oblig'd to return into England for the recovery of his Health, leaving John Duke of Lancaſter, his Brother, in his place.

EDWARD III.

NOT long after, the Duke marry'd the eldeſt Daughter of Peter the Cruel, and immediately took the Title of King of Caſtile. This Enterprize oblig'd the Baſtard Henry to unite himſelf more cloſely with France, and to give the Conſtable powerful Aſſiſtance by Sea to beſiege Rochel. Edward did what he cou'd to relieve the place by a Fleet commanded by the Earl of Pembroke, which was beat by the Spaniards, and Rochel was taken. Afterwards, Du Gueſclin advanc'd into Poictou, and laid ſiege to Thouars, to which all the Nobility of the Province was retir'd. That Town being in no condition to hold out long, the Noblemen of Poictou capitulated, and promiſed to own the King of France for their Sovereign, if the King of England, or one of his Sons, did not come into Poictou before Michaelmas, with an Army ſtrong enough to give Battle. Edward hearing of this Capitulation, order'd a Fleet to be fitted out, on which he embark'd about the end of Auguſt, to ſave that Province; but the contrary Winds conſtantly oppoſing his Paſſage for above a Month, Thouars was taken from him, with all the reſt of Poictou.

Rochel beſieg'd and taken.

All Poicton reduc'd.

IN one word, this War was ſo fatal to the Engliſh, that they had nothing left of all the Conqueſts they had made in France, but the ſingle Town of Calais. Affairs being come to this paſs, the King of France conſented to a Truce, which was concluded on the 11th of February 1375, and afterwards prolong'd to the 1ſt of April 1377. Edward died the 21ſt of June this ſame Year, three Months after the expiration of the Truce.

NOTWITHSTANDING the length of this Treaty, which contains 40 Articles, 'tis abſolutely neceſſary to make an Extract of it, becauſe it ſerves as a Foundation for moſt of the Acts of this ſixth Tome, and many of the next: And it may be ſaid, that 'tis almoſt impoſſible to underſtand the Hiſtory of that time fully without the knowledge of this Treaty.

Alſo the ſaid King and his eldeſt Son ſhall command by their Letters-Patent all Prelates, Counts, Viſcounts, Barons, Nobles, and Citizens, to obey the King of England and his Heirs, and ſhall diſcharge them of all Homages, Fealties, Oaths, Obligations, Subjections, and Promiſes made by any of them to the Kings and Crown of France.

EDWARD III.

XL. THAT the two Kings shall agree together at Calais about the Hostages who are to be deliver'd to the King of England.

THUS we have given the Substance of the famous Treaty of Bretigny, which is the principal Act of this sixth Tome of the Fœdera. We proceed now to the other Acts, which are for the most part depending upon the said Treaty.

1. A MEMORANDUM of Edward's Return to England, viz. May the 18th, 1360. Edward's Return to England.

2. AN Order to conduct King John to Calais; dated June the 17th, 1360[a]. But he did not arrive there till the 8th of July following, as appears by the Letter he wrote to the Inhabitants of Rochel[b]. King John conducted to Calais. P. 198.

3. PRIVILEGES granted by Edward to Rochel; dated October the 22d[c], 1360. P. 217.

ALL the time betwixt John's Arrival at Calais, and the 24th of October, was spent in preparing all the necessary Acts for confirming the Treaty of Bretigny. King John not only ratify'd the Treaty in general, but likewise made particular Acts for the Ratification of each Article of the Treaty, as well in his own Name, as in that of the Dauphin who was gone to Boulogne. All these Acts, which were Confirmations, Ratifications, Renunciations, Mandates, &c. being ready, Edward repair'd to Calais, where the two Kings sign'd those particular Acts, and solemnly swore to the Observation of the Treaty, on the 24th of October 1360. Treaty of Bretigny ratified. P. 219, &c.

TO all these Acts was added one, being an Obligation enter'd into by King John and the Dauphin, that on the failure of restoring one or two Castles on the part of Edward, they would nevertheless execute the Treaty. Particular Obligation of King John and the Dauphin. P. 276.

EDWARD was willing to comply with the King of France's Request, that his Son Philip, who was taken at the Battle of Poictiers, might be one of the ten Hostages that he was to carry along with him from Calais. Edward releases King John's Son. P. 285.

HERE is a particular Obligation which Edward enter'd into, with respect to his Treatment of the Hostages. His Obligation as to Hostages. P. 283.

AND the Renunciation of all Acts of Violence on the part of both Kings, their Sons, and the greatest Noblemen of both Kingdoms, in case of non-performance of the Treaty. All Hostilities renounc'd. P. 269, &c.

ALL these Acts, which are most of them dated the 24th of October 1360, are to be found from P. 217, to P. 294. of this Tome, together with the Dauphin's Confirmations; dated from Boulogne. The others that follow are,

II. Some Reflections upon the Treaty of Bretigny, and the Violation of it by France, for the fuller underſtanding of the Acts contain'd in this ſixth Tome of the Fœdera.

Remarks on the Treaty of Bretigny, and the Breach of it.

EVERY body that is not well vers'd in the Hiſtory of England would be apt to think, after having run over this Treaty, that Edward improv'd his Advantages beyond all reaſon, and without any mercy; for to conſider the Treaty alone, it appears that he was not content with raviſhing a great number of Provinces from France, but that he likewiſe depriv'd her of the Sovereignty of thoſe ſame Countries, without giving her any other Equivalent than a few rambling Places, which he had lately conquer'd in ſeveral Provinces. Yet 'tis certain that this Treaty, far from being unreaſonable, was on the contrary exceeding moderate, whether we conſider the State in which the Fortune of War had plac'd Edward, or whether we have regard only to his Rights, and to Juſtice it ſelf. EDWARD III.

WE have already ſeen what Pretenſions Edward had to the Crown of France; Pretenſions, which far from being ſo frivolous as the French Authors would have it thought, had a very good foundation, if they are conſider'd on the foot of Equity, independent on State-Policy, and on his Advantages in France. Be this as it will, at the time that Edward demanded the Conditions ſtipulated by the Treaty, he ſaw himſelf juſt in reach of the Mark which he had all along in view from the very beginning of the War; I mean the Crown of France, which he intended to wreſt from that Prince, whom he look'd upon as an Uſurper of his Eſtate; for he had King John Priſoner in England. The Scots, whoſe King was alſo in his hands, were in no manner of condition to give him the leaſt Uneaſineſs. France was in ſuch confuſion by the Diſcords which prevail'd in the Kingdom, and by the Cabals of the King of Navarre, a ſworn Enemy to the Royal Family, that it was not poſſible for the Dauphin to raiſe an Army fit to defend the Kingdom. Moreover, Edward was got into the very Heart of France with an Army of 100,000 Men, which nothing could ſtand before. He had alſo made himſelf Maſter of a great number of Places in Normandy, Touraine, Anjou, Maine, Poictou, Auvergne, Berry, Burgundy, Champaigne, Picardy, &c. and had carry'd his Conqueſts into the Iſle of France as far as the Gates of Paris. What was it then that cou'd incline him to put up with ſo ſmall a part of the Kingdom of France, at a time too when he had ſo much reaſon to expect the whole? Certainly it can be aſcrib'd to nothing but his Moderation, and to the Vow which he had enter'd into, to make Peace upon equitable Terms. This Moderation of his was the more remarkable, becauſe we ſeldom ſee Conquerors ſtop ſhort on a ſudden, and confine themſelves without Force, or ſome apparent Cauſe, to a ſmall part of their Pretenſions, when they are juſt on the point of ſeeing the entire Accompliſhment of their Deſigns. Thus much for the Condition that Edward was in at the time of the Concluſion of this famous Treaty. We proceed now to his Rights.

Edward's Circumſtances at the Concluſion of the Treaty.

WHEN Henry II. one of his Predeceſſors, came to the Crown of England, he was in quiet poſſeſſion, by Hereditary Right, of Normandy, Anjou, Touraine and Maine; and by his Marriage with Eleanor of Aquitain, he was in poſſeſſion of Guyenne and Poictou, and all their Dependencies. This is a Fact which cannot be diſputed. France, contenting it ſelf with the Reſervation of the direct direct Sovereignty of those Provinces, never troubled herself to dispute the possession of them, either by that Prince, or by his Son Richard who succeeded him. John Lackland, Richard's Brother and Successor, took possession of the same Provinces, without the least Obstruction from Philip Augustus, who then reign'd in France, and was sensible that he had no other Right to it but that of Sovereignty. But afterwards John being accus'd of having put his Nephew Arthur Duke of Bretagne to death, upon this bare Accusation, Philip, without causing the Witnesses to be heard, and without the necessary Forms of proceeding in an Affair of such Importance, caus'd John to be condemn'd, and all the Lands which he held in France to be confiscated. It was in pursuance of this Arret pass'd by default of Appearance, that Philip Augustus put himself in possession of Normandy, Maine, and part of Anjou, while it was impossible for King John to recover what was so taken from him.

Edward's Rights.

Fœdera Tom. VI.

HENRY III. John's Son and Successor, a Prince of a very mean Genius, and not qualified for War, made an Effort to recover those Provinces; but by so doing he only drew St. Lewis's Arms upon those Parts which yet remain'd in his possession; so that he robb'd him of the rest of Anjou, Poictou, and part of Guyenne.

We observ'd in our Account of the second Tome of the Fœdera how Edward I. lost Guyenne by the Treachery of Philip the Fair. 'Tis true, that this Province was at last restor'd to him, but not without leaving a part of it in the hands of the King of France.

EDWARD II. lost the Agenois by means of the Affair of Sardos, of which mention was made in that Reign. France not only took this part of Guyenne from him, but also made him pay the Charges of that preposterous War. And afterwards, when she granted him leave to transfer Guyenne to his Son Edward, she did not consent to the Bargain till she had exacted a Sum of 60,000 Livres from him: so ready was France to take all Advantages against England, that Opportunity presented.

We may see by this short Dissertation, in which there's nothing aggravated, with what Injustice those Provinces, which lawfully belong'd to the Kings of England, were seiz'd by France, which had no other Right to them than what Power had given her. The Countries we have been speaking of, did not come to the Crown of England by Conquest, or by Treaties made at the Point of the Sword, but by a lawful Succession from Father to Son, time out of mind. As to the Earldom of Ponthieu, it devolv'd to Edward by the Right of his Mother Eleanor; and the King of France himself gave him the first Investiture of it, tho' there was some Injustice too in the case, because he demanded of Edward that he should in the first place relinquish all his claim to Normandy.

Edward III.

Now let the Treaty of Bretigny be examin'd upon that Footing, and it will appear that Edward III. by this Treaty only reclaim'd those Provinces which France had unjustly torn from his Ancestors, by mere Force of Arms. For all those Countries which France yielded to the King of England, if we except Guisnes and Calais, were Dependencies on Guyenne and Poictou, and had been quietly possess'd by Edward's Ancestors. 'Tis true, that this Prince demanded Calais, and the Earldom of Guisnes, with the Sovereignty of all the Provinces which France deliver'd up to him, into the bargain; but in requital thereof he left him Normandy, Anjou, Touraine, and Maine, with the Homage of Bretagne, to which he had as good a Right as to the former, and which, as well as all the rest, was part of the Inheritance of his Ancestors. He likewise yielded him all the Conquests which he had made in several Provinces of France; and what was more than all, he drop'd his Pretensions to the Crown.

As to King John's Ransom, I know not whether it can be properly call'd an excessive Sum for so great a Prince, whom the Fortune of War had cast into the hands of his Enemy: such Examples are so rare to be met with, that 'tis a difficult matter to ascertain the Ransom of a Captive King, in proportion to the Extent of his Dominions, by the Rules of Justice and Equity.

As to the Hostages that Edward demanded for his Security, can any one think it strange that he took such Precautions at that Juncture, to oblige the French to the Execution of a Treaty which was so much to their disadvantage? It was plain, that those Securities were no more than necessary, because they were not strong enough to guard against the Treachery of Charles V. nor against the Baseness of some of the most considerable Hostages, who made no scruple to violate the publick Faith, and even to serve against that very Prince to whom they had engag'd themselves both by Parole of Honour, and by solemn Oaths.

Inquiry into the Breach of the Treaty of Bretigny.

These are the Reflections which I thought necessary, in order to give the Reader a just Idea of the Treaty of Bretigny; in which one cannot but perceive a Moderation which is not common to Princes flush'd with Victory. We proceed now to take notice of the Breach of this Treaty, and at whose door it lay. But that we may not be too precipitant in passing Judgment upon this matter, 'tis necessary to know first of all, what was the State of Affairs between France and England at the time of the said Rupture.

King John, whose strict Adherence to his Engagements can be never enough commended, had put Edward in possession of

of all the Countries which he had engag'd to deliver up to him, except the County of Gavre ſituate in Armagnac, and the Territory of Belville in Poictou, about which there aroſe ſome Diſpute. As to the firſt, I know nothing of it; but as to Belville, I find in one of the Acts of this Tome of the Fœdera, that Edward claim'd that ſome other Lands which depended on the ſaid Fief, ſhould be deliver'd to him, which King John did not agree to. As to the Hoſtages, they had all been deliver'd up except two Burghers of Tholouſe, Perſons not conſiderable enough to be the Subject of any great Contention. Tho' John nicely kept his Word in thoſe Articles of the Treaty which related to the Provinces yielded to England, he found it impoſſible for him to be as punctual in the Payments of his Ranſom. After the Payment of the firſt 600,000 Crowns before his departure from Calais, the reſt came in but very ſlowly; for of the three Millions which, according to Agreement, ought to have been paid at the end of the Year 1366, there was but a Million and about two hundred thouſand Crowns paid in 1369, when the War was declar'd. 'Tis very probable that Edward was ſo generous as to admit of the Excuſes made to him from time to time, on default of Payment, the rather becauſe he had always Hoſtages in his hands who were anſwerable to him for what was due.

AMONG theſe Hoſtages, were five Princes of the Blood of France, viz. the Dukes of Orleans, Anjou, Berry, and Bourbon, and the Count of Alenſon. There being nothing wanting towards the entire Execution of the Treaty, but the two Lordſhips of Gavre and Belville, and the Payment of the reſt of the three Millions, Edward probably was ſcrupulous of keeping ſo many Princes as Hoſtages for ſuch a trifle. Therefore, of his own accord, he propos'd the abſolute Releaſe of the four firſt, and of the Lords of Brenne, Grandpre, Montmorency, Clare, Hengeeſt, and Andreſel, the laſt of whom was of the number of the Priſoners, with a Proviſo that the County of Gavre and the Territory of Belville ſhou'd be deliver'd up to him, in the Condition that he demanded them; that Meſle, Chiſay, Chivray, Villeneufve, and ſome other Territories in Poictou and Saintonge, ſhould be pledg'd to him for Security of the Execution; and that if before the Feaſt of All-Saints, he was not put in poſſeſſion of Gavre and Belville, the Lordſhips ſo pledg'd to him ſhould be confiſcated to his Profit; and the four Princes and the other ſix Lords, be oblig'd to ſurrender themſelves again as Hoſtages. The French Princes having accepted theſe Terms, King John confirm'd the Treaty, on condition that for the Lords of Grandpre, Clare and Andreſel, Edward would releaſe the Earl of Alenſon, the Dauphin of Auvergne, and the Lord of Coucy; but Edward refuſing to conſent to this Exchange, John ratify'd the Agreement as it ſtood at firſt.

EDWARD III.

WHEN the Ratification of the King of France was arriv'd, theſe ten Lords were conducted to Calais, and left at full liberty not only to walk about the Town, but alſo to go where they pleas'd for three Days, provided they return'd to lie at Calais the fourth Night. Probably there aroſe ſome Difficulty with reſpect to the Territories that were to be given in pledge, and that this was what detain'd the French Lords at Calais longer than they expected. However it was, the Duke of Anjou, who no doubt was afraid of being oblig'd to return again to England, abus'd the Liberty which had been granted him of going out of Calais, and never return'd more: And the Counts de Brenne and Grandpre, and the Lords of Clare and Derval following his ill Example, eſcap'd as well as he; after which there was no more talk of the Execution of the Treaty for the Liberty of the others. Soon after, King John returning to England, either to excuſe the Duke of Anjou, or for ſome other Reaſon, died there in the Month of April 1364 *.

HIS Son Charles V. aſcending the Throne of France, the Face of Affairs was changed; and if Edward had not blindly believ'd that this Prince was as honeſt as his Father, he might have eaſily perceiv'd that he had ſome ill Deſign. Charles gave him no Satisfaction as to the Eſcape of the Hoſtages, tho' he earneſtly demanded it, nor as to the two Burghers of Tolouſe, nor the two other Hoſtages which he requir'd in the place of the Lords of Eſtampes and Hengeeſt, who had died in England. He never troubled himſelf to pay the reſt of King John's Ranſom; and if he remitted him any part, it was but a ſmall matter, and only to amuſe him. Four Years run on after this manner in fruitleſs Negotiations upon the Affair of Belville, which was never decided, tho' referr'd to Arbitration; becauſe, in all appearance, Charles did not care whether it was or no.

ONE

* Mr. Barnes ſays he arriv'd at Dover the 4th of January 1364, and died the 8th of April following at the Savoy, then one of the faireſt Manſions in England, where he was lodg'd with thoſe Hoſtages that were of the Royal Blood, and often made and receiv'd Viſits to and from the Kings of England, Scotland, Denmark and Cyprus. Stow tells us in his Survey of London, that theſe five Kings were all feaſted at one time, together with the chief Hoſtages of France, King Edward's Sons, and many of the chief Nobility of England, by Sir Henry Picard Wine-Merchant, who ſome Years before had been Lord Mayor of London. Mr. Barnes quotes Knighton and Walſingham to prove, that King John on his Death-bed ſent for King Edward, and confeſs'd to him, that from his firſt coming into England he had Confederates in London, &c. who ſecretly collected the fineſt Gold of the Kingdom, made it into Plates, and put it into Barrels hoop'd with Iron to ſend to France, with Bows and Arrows, and a great quantity of other Arms; and that he had unjuſtly withheld the Crown of France from him, until the Peace of Bretigny: for all which he heartily begg'd the King's Pardon, and for which Edward entirely forgave him, and caus'd all the Gold and Arms to be ſeiz'd, and ſeverely puniſh'd thoſe Engliſhmen who had offended, among whom were many Lombard Merchants, who were clapp'd up in the Tower till they had compounded as the King pleas'd.

FOEDERA Tom. VI.

ONE cannot help ſuſpecting, that the Hoſtages in England were appriz'd of the Deſign of the King of France to break the Peace, becauſe ſeveral Pieces in this Tome ſhew that it was chiefly about that time they made the greateſt ſtruggle to obtain Furloughs, on various Pretences, or to compound with Edward for their entire Liberty.

THE Duke of Orleans obtain'd Liberty for himſelf and the Lord of Andreſel, by granting ſome Lands in Poictou to Thomas of Woodſtock, Edward's Son.

THE Duke of Bourbon, and the Dauphin of Auvergne, had leave to go to France, upon the Security of the Duke of Berry; and their Furlough being prolong'd, the Duke of Bourbon made an Agreement with Edward for 12,000 Crowns, which Edward paid to him who took the Duke Priſoner at the Battle of Poictiers.

THE Duke of Berry having obtain'd a Furlough to go to Paris, never return'd.

THE Count de St. Pol obtain'd the ſame Permiſſion, on leaving his two Sons as Security for his Return.

THE Count de Harcourt, who had a limited Furlough, upon his Parole of Honour, excus'd himſelf from keeping to his Engagement, tho' Edward recall'd him ſeveral times.

MONTMORENCY, Boucherche, and Maulevrier did the ſame; but 'tis probable they gave the King ſome Satisfaction afterwards.

CHARLES of Artois retir'd without taking leave.

ENGUERRAND de Coucy, by what means I know not, procured his entire Liberty.

GUY of Blois, who had obtain'd a limited Furlough, never return'd more to England, having made his Accommodation while he was abroad.

THE Dauphin of Auvergne obtain'd a Furlough, on condition of paying 10,000 Crowns, in caſe he did not return by ſuch a time.

THE Earl of Luxemburg, the Lords of Eſtampes and Hengeeſt, died in England; and Charles never ſent any other Hoſtages to ſupply their place. Add to theſe the ten Hoſtages that John carry'd with him from Calais, who probably were the chief; and we ſhall find that at the time of the Breach of the Peace, there were none leſt of any conſequence in Edward's hands.

ALL this appears from divers Acts in this Tome: From whence it may eaſily be conjectur'd, that the King of France could not be much diſturb'd about thoſe Hoſtages that ſtill remain'd in England; conſequently he was no longer concern'd for the Execution of the Treaty, after he had withdrawn his Brothers, and the chief of the Nobility. On the other hand, the Diſtemper of the Prince of Wales growing every day more dangerous, Charles, who ſaw that this Prince was not in a Capacity to do any thing, thought he ought to make his advantage of this Opportunity, while Edward, who was in a State of perfect Security, could not imagine that France was in a Condition to renew the War. Charles being reſolved upon it, made ſeveral Alliances with the Princes of Germany, and particularly with the King of Caſtile, before he diſcover'd his Deſign. He obtain'd great Sums of the Eſtates of the Realm, who, to be ſure, were not ignorant of his Intentions, tho' thoſe Sums were granted upon other Pretences. When his Affairs were almoſt arrived to the Maturity he wiſh'd for, he complain'd bitterly of the Ravages committed by the Engliſh Troops in France. We have ſeen that Edward gave him all the Satisfaction poſſible in the like Caſe. But as Charles was bent upon picking a Quarrel with him, he ſhew'd that he was not ſatisfy'd, and pretended that Edward actually made War againſt him. In order to give the more Colour for the Rupture which he intended, he complain'd that the Engliſh had not evacuated all the Caſtles that were to be reſtored to him: But as no Hiſtorian has ſpecify'd what thoſe Caſtles were, there is reaſon to believe that his complaint was trifling. In the mean while happen'd the Clamour againſt the Tax the Prince of Wales had eſtabliſh'd in Guienne; which Clamour was probably fomented and ſupported by the King of France. Be this as it will, tho' Charles had no Right to meddle in the Affairs of that Principality, the Sovereignty of which the King his Father and himſelf too had expreſſly renounc'd, he took occaſion from thence to ſummon the Prince of Wales before the Court of Peers; and upon his Refuſal to appear, order'd all the Lands which the Engliſh held in France to be confiſcated.

EDWARD III.

HAVING thus examin'd the State of Affairs betwixt the two Crowns, nothing now remains but to judge whether France had good Reaſon to break the Peace. Edward had Subjects of Complaint, which were very real and ſubſtantial. Gavre and Belville were yet in the hands of the King of France. Near two thirds of King John's Ranſom were ſtill unpaid, and the chief Hoſtages were either eſcap'd, or were not return'd according to the Terms of their Furloughs, or had compounded for very ſmall Sums in proportion to the two Millions of Crowns of Gold which remain'd due to him. Mean time Charles, pretended that the Treaty of Bretigny was void, becauſe ſome Caſtles, of which no Hiſtorian has given us the Names, were not reſtor'd; becauſe Edward had not hinder'd his Subjects from ravaging France, tho' he had diſowned them; and finally, becauſe the Prince of Wales had refus'd to appear as a Vaſſal, tho' it was certain that France had renounc'd the Sovereignty of Guienne.

FROISSARD ſays, that Charles having cauſed the Treaty of Bretigny to be examin'd in Council, they dwelt chiefly upon that Article whereby the two Kings renounc'd all Hoſtilities in caſe of non-performance of the Treaty. He adds, that 'twas upon this Conſideration that Charles was adviſed to found his Declaration of War, becauſe it was pretended that Edward had not ceaſed to make War againſt France ever ſince the Peace of Bretigny. It were to be wiſh'd that this Hiſtorian had been a little more explicit, and had ſhewn upon what Particular the Complaint was founded. If it was upon the Ravages committed by the Prince of Wales's disbanded Troops, it ſeems that ſince France her ſelf could not get rid of them, it was yet more difficult for the Prince of Wales, or the King his Father, to reduce thoſe Vagabond Troops to their Obedience, becauſe they were in a foreign Country.

MEZERAY, who was very ſenſible of the Iniquity of this Rupture on the part of Charles, paſſes very ſlightly over it, and ſpeaks of it in ſuch a manner as demonſtrates that Policy had a greater ſhare in it than Equity. This is what he ſays of it in his Extract of the Year 1369. "Edward believed himſelf abſolute Sovereign of Guienne after the Peace of Bretigny; but as on his part he had not drawn off the Gariſons, and had moreover committed divers Hoſtilities, the King pretended the Treaty was null and void, and that therefore the ſaid Prince ſtill remain'd a Vaſſal of the Crown. It was upon that foot that he ſent a Declaration of War to him; and that afterwards in an Aſſembly of his Parliament on the Eve of Aſcenſion, he then ſitting on his Bed of Juſtice, paſs'd an Arret, which for thoſe Rebellions, Outrages, and Diſobediences, confiſcated all the Lands the Engliſh held in France." Let the Reader compare the Terms of Rebellion and Diſobedience with the Articles of the Treaty of Bretigny, wherein both King John and his Son Charles renounc'd all manner of Sovereignty to the Provinces which they yielded up to Edward, and then let him judge whether the Parliament had the leaſt Colour to make uſe of ſuch Expreſſions againſt a Prince, who ſince the laſt Peace did not poſſeſs ſo much as a ſingle Village in the Kingdom of France, for which he was a Vaſſal to that Crown.

THIS Rupture, which was made ſo expreſſly for the purpoſe, and which reſtor'd France to her former State, was one of the principal Reaſons for aſſigning the Surname of Wiſe to Charles V. But I would fain know what Name would have been given him if the War had miſcarry'd, as might have been the Caſe. Could he be ſure of the Conſequences? And may it not be ſaid, that if France had happened to have been plung'd again in the Abyſs from whence ſhe was but juſt extricated, ſhe would have had none to blame but her King? For the reſt, tho' this Prince had very fortunate Succeſs, yet to him, as the firſt Cauſe, ought to be aſcribed all thoſe Miſeries that France ſuffer'd in the Reign of Charles VI. his Son and Succeſſor, during which the Engliſh took a ſweet Revenge. EDWARD III.

III. The Affairs of Scotland.

UNDER this Article there are few remarkable Circumſtances. It was obſerv'd in our Account of the fifth Tome, that by the Treaty which was concluded for the Liberty of King David, he had engag'd to pay 90,000 Marks Sterling for his Ranſom. This Treaty, which remain'd without Execution, was renew'd in the Year 1357. but with this Difference, that the King of Scotland ſhould be oblig'd to pay 10,000 Marks more. This laſt Treaty is dated October 3, 1357[a].

A GREAT many Acts follow it, by which the Prelates, the Temporal Lords, and all the good Towns of Scotland, engag'd to pay the Ranſom of their King. Ingagements for the King of Scots Ranſom. P. 46, 56, 59, 61.

HERE is a remarkable Brief from Pope Innocent VI. to the King of Scotland, in which he declares that he cannot conſent that the Clergy of Scotland ſhould be bound for him[b]. The other principal Acts relating to Scotland are, Pope won't conſent for the Scots Clergy to be bound for David. P. 59.

1. A PASSPORT for King David going into England[c]. David's Paſſport. P. 361.

2. EDWARD's full Powers to treat of a final Peace with Scotland[d]. Treaty with him. P. 375.

IT appears by a Memorial[e] that Edward try'd to perſuade the Scots to declare him King David's Succeſſor, in caſe that Prince died without Children; and that he made them large Promiſes to bring them into it: but this Project did not ſucceed. Edward's view to the Crown of Scotland. P. 426.

3. A PROLONGATION of the Truce for four Years, dated [f] June the 12th, 1365. Truces with Scotland. P. 464, 468.

4. ANOTHER Prolongation of the Truce for fourteen Years[g]. P. 632.

DAVID dying in 1371[h], Robert Stuart his Succeſſor, who was his Nephew, being Son of his eldeſt Siſter, no ſooner got into the Throne, but he made an Alliance with France, dated October the 28th, 1371[i]. David's Death and his Succeſſor's Treaty with France. P. 696.

THIS is all that is of any great Conſequence in this ſixth Tome of the Fœdera, with reſpect to Scotland.

Protection for Clockmakers. Ibid.

V. Affairs relating to Religion or the Popes.

THE old Differences still subsisted betwixt England and the Court of Rome about the Collation to Benefices, the foreign and non-resident Clergy, the Benefices of Royal Collation which the Pope usurp'd from time to time, the Temporality of the Bishopricks which the Pope pretended to confer by his Bulls, and the Provisions which he gave to Benefices before they were vacant, whereby he depriv'd Patrons of their Rights. These were the Subjects of the greatest part of the Acts in this Tome, relating to Religion; but as they are the same with those mention'd in the former Months, 'tis needless to insist long upon them here. I shall therefore only take notice of some Acts, which shew that neither the King nor the Pope receding from their Pretensions, those Differences remain'd undetermin'd, each Party taking hold of every fair Opportunity that offer'd to maintain their Rights.

1. AN Order from the King to the Lord Mayor of London to imprison all Persons in the City carrying the Pope's Bulls; dated October the 10th, 1357[l].

Order against the Bulls. P. 65.

2. AN Order to pay to those Cardinals, who were sent to treat of Peace, the Procurations which were due to them upon the Bishoprick of Ely, which was then in the King's hands; dated November the 7th, 1357[m].

Payment of the Procurations. P. 63.

WHEN the King wanted any Favour from the Court of Rome, he caus'd those Procurations to be paid; but at other times he stopp'd Payment.

3. A BULL of Innocent VI. whereby he consents to the Execution of the Treaty of Peace concluded at Bretigny, tho' it contains Articles prejudicial to the Holy See[n]. This had a special View to the 39th Article of the said Treaty.

Restitution to the foreign Priors. P. 311.

[a] Dated at Sandwich, October the 16th, 1359.

[b] Mr. Barnes, who says she died the 22d of August, was certainly mistaken in the time of her Interment, which he says was on the 27th of September following, in the midst of the Choir of the Gray-Friars, now called Christ-Church; whereas there is an Order in this Volume of the Fœdera, p. 110. and dated at Westminster, November the 20th, for cleaning the Streets without Bishopsgate and Aldgate, against the Arrival of her Corpse in London. As to her Imprisonment, tho' tedious, Mr. Barnes tells us it was easy and respectful; that she had Freedom enough under the Eye of her Keeper, and an Allowance of 4000 l. per Annum, that the King paid her a Visit at least once a Year, and gave her many Princely Recreations. As to her Guilt in the Murder of her Husband, our Author is of opinion, that upon her first coming with an armed Force into England, she had no Design against the King her Husband, but only against the Spencers; but that Mortimer and others, who were already obnoxious to the Law on account of their Treason, artfully drove her on so far for their own Security, that she was not able to retire; and that when the King was depos'd, they so terrified her with making her believe, that if ever he came to the Crown he would burn her, that she complied with the Design for his Destruction.

[c] At Westminster. [d] Ditto. [e] At Dover-Castle. [f] At Westminster.

[g] Dated at Westminster, May the 10th, 1368. [h] Mr. Barnes says he died, not without Suspicion of Poison, upon the 17th of October, the same Year that he was married.

[i] Dated May the 4th, 1368, at Westminster. [k] At Westminster. [l] Ditto.

[m] The Bull is dated at Villeneufve, in the Diocese of Avignon, the 2d of the Calends of July, 1360.

9. AN Order to the Archbishops of Armagh and Dublin to agree about carrying of the Cross, and to permit each other to bear it reciprocally in their several Provinces, after the Example of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York; otherwise he orders them to come to Court to decide the Difference there: 'tis dated June the 9th, 1365[b].

Order for imprisoning a Heretick. P. 651.

10. A PERMISSION to the Bishop of London to imprison a Heretick; dated March the 20th, 1370[c].

The most important Acts of the four last Years of King Edward, viz. from 1373, to his Death, which happen'd in June 1377, are inserted in the beginning of the Seventh Tome of the Fœdera; the chief which relate to the Affairs of France are,

FOEDERA Tom. VII.

Duke of Lancaster goes to France. P. 7.

1. AN Order for the Embarkment of John Duke of Lancaster, King of Castile, with design to go and make War in France[d].

And the Earl of Cambridge. P. 48.

2. THE like Order for the Earl of Cambridge, who went over for the same purpose; 'tis dated[e] November the 18th, 1373.

Truces with France. P. 53. P. 68. P. 100.

3. A TRUCE with France till Easter; dated February the 11th, 1375.

4. THE Prolongation of the Truce to the 30th of June, 1376[f].

5. ANOTHER Prolongation of it to the 1st of April, 1377[g].

Treaty with her. P. 110. P. 143.

6. A FULL Power to make a Peace with France[h]; dated June the 12th, 1376.

7. THE like full Power, dated[i] April the 26th, 1377.

As to the Articles of Religion, or his Affairs with the Pope, we have only these three Acts:

Pope's Letter to the King. P. 115.

I. POPE Gregory's Letter to Edward, acquainting him of his Intention to go and hold his Court at Rome[k].

Accommodation of their Disputes. P. 136.

II. A COMPOSITION of the Differences betwixt the King and the Pope, by which Edward engag'd himself to confer no Benefice that was vacant and unprovided, before the 15th of February, in the 50th Year of his Reign, but without drawing the same into Consequence for the future[l].

THE Pope enter'd into several Engagements on his part; but he did it in a manner so general, and with so many Restrictions, that it was plain he did not intend to cramp himself by any Engagements of this nature.

1. HE promis'd for the future to be more moderate in his collating to Benefices in England.

2. THAT he would grant a convenient time for Elections, and that he would not fail to admit the Person elected, provided he was fit to serve the Church.

3. THAT he would give Benefices to those that were in a Capacity to reside on them.

4. AS to the Complaint which had been made to him, that a great number of foreign Ecclesiasticks possess'd Benefices in England; he answer'd, that he had confer'd but one to any such Person, except to Cardinals.

5. AS to the Representation made to him, that the Cardinals had more Revenue in England than in France, tho' France was three times bigger than England; he made answer, that for the future it should be more moderate.

6. THAT he could not recede from the first Fruits; but that he hoped to find a way to moderate them.

7. THAT as to Reversions and Provisions, he would not for the future be so ready to grant them, but without any Restriction of his Power.

John Wickliff sent Ambassador to the Pope. P. 41.

III. A FULL Power to treat with the Pope's Nuncios; dated at London, July the 26th, 1374. by which it appears that John Wickliff, who made such a noise afterwards, was one of the Ambassadors whom the King sent this Year to the Pope.

The chief Acts in the beginning of this seventh Tome, relating to Domestic Affairs, in the Remainder of Edward's Reign, are,

Commission to John of Gaunt. P. 13.

1. A COMMISSION appointing his Son, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, and King of Castile, to be the King's Lieutenant beyond Sea[m].

Edward's Grant to Alice Perreres. P. 28.

2. EDWARD's Grant to Alice Perreres of some Jewels which had belong'd to his deceas'd Queen Philippa. This is the only Act we find here that gives any Indication of the Affection which Edward conceiv'd for this Lady in his old Age. She is by some Authors call'd Alice Piercy, by others Piers or Pierce; but in this Grant, which is dated[n] August the 8th, 1373, she is call'd Perreres, which probably was her true Name[o].

[b] At Westminster. [c] Ditto. [d] 'Tis dated at Westminster, April the 28th, 1373.
[e] At Westminster. [f] Dated at Bruges, June the 27th, 1375.
[g] Ditto, March the 12th, 1376. [h] Dated at Westminster. [i] At Westminster.
[k] 'Tis dated at Villeneufve, in the Diocese of Avignon, the 5th of the Nones of July, 1376.
[l] The Instrument is dated at Westminster, February the 15th, 1377, in the 51st Year of his Reign.
[m] 'Tis dated at Westminster, June the 12th, 1373. [n] At Woodstock.
[o] Mr. Barnes, who calls her Alice Perrers, quotes Stow's Survey of London, to prove that she was a Person of such extraordinary Beauty, that about the Year 1374 she was made Lady of the Sun, and rode from the Tower of London thro' Cheapside, accompanied with many Lords, Knights, and Ladies; every Lady leading a Lord or a Knight by his Horse's Bridle, 'till they came to Smithfield, where presently began a solemn Just or Tournament, which held for seven Days together. But tho' it appears from a Record mention'd by Sir Robert Cotton, that this Lady was in such Credit with King Edward III. that she sat at his Bed's-Head, when others were fain to stand at the Chamber-Door; and that she mov'd those things to him, which they of the Privy-Chamber durst not; yet Mr. Barnes will by no means allow what is asserted by very many Writers, that she was King Edward's Concubine,

3. A MEMORANDUM of the Day the Twenty-firſt of June[a], Anno Dom. 1377[b]. EDWARD III.

The

cubine, becauſe of the Improbability, that he who was ſo chaſte in the Flower of his Years, ſhould burn with Luſt in the very Impotence of Age; and that ſo noble a Baron as the Lord William Windſor ſhould afterwards take her in Marriage, if ſhe had been thought ſo lewd at that time, as ſhe has been repreſented ſince.

[a] And of his Reign the 51ſt, at his Mannor of Shene in Surrey.

We cannot well diſmiſs this great and glorious Reign, without giving a Summary of Edward's Character and Succeſſes, from his Hiſtorian Mr. Barnes.

He was a Prince, ſays Mr. Barnes, the ſooneſt a Man, and the longeſt that held ſo, of any we meet with; his Stature not exceeding the uſual Bigneſs of Men, but of the middle ſort, that is, juſt ſix Foot high; his Limbs neat and well-made, his Body ſtrong, his Shape exact, his Viſage ſomething long, but exceeding comely, graceful, and angelical; his Noſe, long, ſtrait and manly; his Eyes ſparkling and majeſtic, but with ſo much Sweetneſs, that it was reckon'd a good Omen to behold his Face, tho' only in a Dream. Fortunate he was beyond meaſure, eſpecially 'till the ſix latter Years of his Reign: wiſe and provident in Council; well-learned in the Laws, in Hiſtory, Humanity, in Divinity. He underſtood Latin, French, Spaniſh, Italian, and High and Low Dutch, beſides his native Language. He was of quick Apprehenſion, judicious and skilful in Nature, elegant in Speech, ſweet, familiar, and affable in Behaviour; ſtern to the Obſtinate, but calm and meek to the Humble; magnanimous and courageous above all the Princes of his Days; apt for War, but a Lover of Peace; never puffed up with Proſperity, nor diſmayed at Adverſity. He was of an exalted, glorious, and truly Royal Spirit, which never entertain'd any thing vulgar or trivial, as may appear by the moſt excellent Laws which he made, by thoſe two famous Jubilees he kept, and by the moſt noble Order of the Garter, which he firſt deviſed and founded. His Recreations were Hawking, Hunting and Fiſhing; but chiefly he lov'd the martial Exerciſe of Juſts and Tournaments. In his Buildings he was curious, ſplendid and magnificent; in beſtowing of Graces and Donations free and frequent; and to the Ingenious and Deſerving always kind and liberal; devout to God, bountiful to the Clergy, gracious to his People, charitable to the Poor, true to his Word, loving to his Friends, terrible to his Enemies. And becauſe he was ſo ſtrictly obſervant of his Faith and Honour, and withal ſo valiant, politick, and fortunate, his Subjects imagin'd that to live under him was to reign in Triumphs; and his Renown ran abroad even to barbarous and foreign Nations; and all thought themſelves happy and ſecure, if they were either under his Protection, or any way Confederate with him. The Turks and Saracens fear'd him; the oppreſs'd Chriſtian Princes humbly implor'd his Aſſiſtance; the Germans he had at his Command during the time of his Lieutenancy under Lewis of Bavaria, and might have had them entirely, had he accepted their Proffer of the Empire: The Flemings were his Confederates; the Italians he oblig'd to him by the Bond of Affinity; the French, Spaniards and Scots he ſubdued by Force of Arms; he won Calais, recover'd Aquitain, Normandy and Ponthieu; and took John King of France, and David King of Scots, his Priſoners; being the firſt of Engliſh Kings that bore the Arms and Title of France. In ſhort, he had the moſt Virtues, and the feweſt Vices of any Prince that ever I read of; he was valiant, juſt, merciful, temperate, and wiſe; the beſt King, the beſt Captain, the beſt Law-giver, the beſt Friend, the beſt Father, and the beſt Husband in his Days. And after all this, adds Mr. Barnes, his very Enemies will be found to ſay much more of him.

To this we ſhall join the Teſtimony of a Perſon of Honour, viz. Sir Robert Howard, in his Compariſon of the Reigns of the three firſt Edwards and Richard II.

Edward III. ſays Sir Robert, by the Virtues and Methods of his Grandfather, reſtor'd what his Father had loſt. He obſerves, that he came to the Crown, after it had been ſhaken by the Errors of his Father: That like Edward I. he was a Man earlier than others, and victorious before others us'd to attempt Victory; ſo that before he was King, he ſhew'd how fit he was to be ſo. That tho' he was able to judge, yet he was never unwilling to hear the Judgment of others: That he was deliberate in reſolving, and firm in his Reſolutions; unſhaken in Dangers, and ſteddy and equal in Safety: That his Promiſes were Mankind's Security, and Truth his Wiſdom: That his great Virtues and Courage made the Nation expect Succeſs from all his Actions: That he grew fierce by Oppoſition, and gentle by Submiſſion: That he ſeldom denied pardon to thoſe who implor'd it, nor ſuffered any abuſed Mercy to paſs unrevenged: That he was mighty enough to conquer Enemies, and powerful enough to forgive thoſe he conquer'd: That he was equally victorious both to himſelf and others; and that thoſe, who ſubmitted to him, prov'd always more fortunate than thoſe who reſiſted: That in his greateſt Hazards he requir'd none to attempt more than he did in his own Perſon; and in the greateſt Proſperity and Safety preſcrib'd no more Virtue and Temperance than he gave Examples for: That he knew how to gain Power, and how to uſe it: That he who might have the eaſieſt attempted to break Laws, made the beſt: That he knew how to gain, and how to preſerve the Love and Confidence he rais'd in his Subject's Hearts, by requiting the firſt, and never abuſing the laſt: That his great Taxes and Supplies, however large they might appear in themſelves, would not ſeem ſo vaſt when compar'd with his Victories, the Conqueſt of Wales, Scotland and France being not ſuch light Victories to be obtain'd with ſmall Aſſiſtance; and that what the Nation gave him was juſtly beſtow'd for what it was given, and faithfully laid out for their Honour and Intereſt: That he not only return'd Security and Benefit for his Subjects Gifts, by Conqueſts abroad, but by excellent Laws at home: That what Edward I. began well, Edward III. gave perfection to: That this brave Prince was not more juſt in making good Laws, than ſevere in the due Execution of them; and never ſhewed ſo much Severity as againſt thoſe that abuſed the Truſt of Juſtice; as if he had been more offended at the Enemies of Mankind, than at his own: That he mingled his own Intereſts with his Subjects, and never refus'd to hear the Wrongs of thoſe that aſſiſted him to revenge his Injuries on others: That both Edward I. and Edward III. were equally valiant, and equally ſucceſsful; and both died uncheck'd by Fortune, only Edward I. died himſelf, and Edward III. outliv'd himſelf. But the Death of his Glorious Son, the Black Prince, join'd with the weight of old Age, might juſtly make that Sun ſet clouded.

Froiſſard ſays, that when Charles of France heard of the Death of his Enemy King Edward, he gave this Teſtimony of him, viz. That he had reign'd moſt nobly and valiantly, and well deſerv'd to be added to the Number of the ancient Worthies. And ſoon after, he aſſembled all the Nobles and Prelates of his Realm, and with them ſolemnly perform'd his Obſequies. We ſhall ſhut up his Character with the Latin Epitaph on his Tomb in Weſtminſter-Abbey, according to the Rhyme of thoſe Days.

PUGNA PRO PATRIA.
M.CCC.LXXVII.

The Inſtitution of the moſt noble Order of the Garter, being univerſally allowed to be one of the Glories of this Reign, deſerves to be mention'd before we paſs to the next. However uncertain the Original or Foundation of it may appear, from the various Accounts given of it by Mr. Aſhmole and other learned Antiquaries, which we ſhall not undertake to reconcile in this place, 'tis certain that it was inſtituted by King Edward III. in the Year 1349, and as Mr. Aſhmole ſays, on the 23d of April, the Anniverſary of St. George, call'd the Patron of England, and of this Order in particular. As to the common Opinion that it was inſtituted by this King in Memory of his taking up the Counteſs of Salisbury's Garter, which dropp'd off her Leg at a Ball; and that the Motto Honi ſoit qui mal y penſe, was taken from the Anſwer he made to that Lady, when ſhe was ſurpris'd to ſee him ſtoop down to her Feet; Mr. Rapin and the beſt Hiſtorians decry it, and reckon it a Diſhonour to an Order which has ſhone throughout ſo many Ages with ſuch Splendor, to aſcribe its Original to an Act of ſo much Levity. To omit the mention of other Opinions, which ſtand unſupported by any ſufficient Proofs, this is indiſputably true, that King Edward's main Deſign was to engage all that had then, or were hereafter to have the Honour of being admitted into that Society, to diſtinguiſh themſelves by their Courage and Virtue: That no Order of the like nature has ſo nicely obſerv'd the Rules of its Inſtitution: That it is more ancient than even thoſe of the Golden Fleece or the Holy Ghoſt: That it has always kept up its old number of Companions, which is twenty-ſix, including the Sovereign of the Order, who is always the King or Queen of England. And the Foreign Kings and Emperors to the number of near forty, as well as many other Sovereign Princes, who have been admitted into this Illuſtrious Order, ſhew the Eſteem that all Europe has had for it.

Biſhop Nicholſon, who makes the Improvement of the Regulation of the Coin another of the Glories of this Reign, takes notice of King Edward's Groats, coin'd after he took the Title of France, bearing his Head crown'd, and inſcrib'd, Edward. D. Gra. Rex Angl. & Franc. D. Hyb. and on the reverſe, Poſui Deum Adjutorem meum, (a Motto continued by all his Succeſſors down to the Union of the two Kingdoms) and the Biſhop infers by the numbers of them daily diſcovered, eſpecially on the Frontiers of both Kingdoms, that they were miſtaken who obſerv'd, that his Victories and Expeditions in France, &c. drain'd almoſt all the Money out of the Kingdom. The Biſhop gives the Form of one of his Grants to the Abbots and Monks of Reading for the Coining of Half-pence and Farthings, and ſmall Pieces of Sterling Money; from whence he conjectures, that the Abbots, or other great Men in thoſe Days, were only permitted to coin ſmall Pieces, uſeful in Exchange, as our Kings to this day grant Patents for Copper Halfpence and Farthings; and that the Sovereign reſerv'd the ſole Power of coining the larger Money to himſelf, by his own immediate Officers.

The Reign of RICHARD II.*

Foedera Tom. VII.

RICHARD II. Son to the famous Prince of Wales, ſucceeded his Grandfather King Edward III. June the 21ſt, 1377, when he was but eleven Years of Age, and reign'd to the end of September 1399.

Richard II.

THIS Seventh Tome of the Fœdera, and a ſmall part of the Eighth, contain the Acts which relate to the Events that happen'd in the Reign of this Prince. Of all the Tomes I have run thro', this ſeems to me to have the feweſt Pieces in it which are capable of illuſtrating any part of the Hiſtory of that Time. There's but a ſmall number of thoſe which regard the principal Events; whereas on the contrary, there's a multitude relating to Matters of an independent nature, of which I could not poſſibly make an Abridgment without running into too great a length. I ſhall confine myſelf therefore to the ſix chief Articles, which concern France, Great-Britain, Scotland, Caſtile, Domeſtick Affairs, and the Church; there being few remarkable Events in the whole courſe of this Reign, but what are contain'd under one or other of thoſe Articles.

I. The Affairs of France.

THE Truce which Edward III. had made with France expir'd in April 1377, near three Months before his Death, at a time when the Engliſh had not made the leaſt Preparation to renew the War; whereas on the contrary, France was eager to improve the Opportunity of the Weakneſs of a dying Enemy, and of a Minority, which in all probability would be attended with Conſequences fatal to England. However, Charles V. did not renew the Hoſtilities till towards the end of June, five or ſix Days after Edward's Death. Then it was that the French made a Deſcent upon England and the Iſle of Wight, and committed great Ravages, becauſe of the little Oppoſition they met with from the Engliſh.

French invade England.

NEXT Year (1378) the King of Navarre, who had great Domains in Normandy, deliver'd up Cherbourg to the Engliſh; but tho' this Acquiſition gave them as fair an Inlet into Normandy, as they had before in Picardy, by the means of Calais, yet they made no advantage of it.

Cherbourg deliver'd to the Engliſh.

IN 1380 they made an Effort to ſupport the Duke of Bretagne, but they fail'd of the Succeſs which they expected.

CHARLES V. dying in that Year, and Charles VI. his Succeſſor, being a Minor when he aſcended the Throne, the War was carry'd on but faintly on the part of France, and more weakly ſtill on the ſide of England, which was but in an indifferent plight.

Death of Charles V. and Acceſſion of Charles VI.

IN 1383 the French made another Decent upon England; but not long after, the two Crowns concluded a Truce of ten Months, which was next Year prolong'd for a ſhort ſpace.

Another Deſcent, and a Truce.

THE ſaid Truce expiring in 1385, the King of France ſent a powerful Reinforcement to the King of Scotland, to make a Diverſion in the Northern Counties of England, Deſign of France againſt England.

* "A Reign, which, ſays Mr. Rymer in his Dedication of the Seventh Tome of the Fœdera to Queen Anne, "affords but little Matter that may ſhine in Hiſtory, and cannot boaſt of any one great and diſtinguiſh'd Captain, "any one memorable Battle, nor one important Siege; no Proceeding to St. Paul's, no Te Deum for Victory.

"Beyond the Pyreneans, John Duke of Lancaſter, without fighting, made a Compoſition with his Adverſary, "and took an Equivalent for the Crown of Spain.

"Beyond the Alps, Sir John Hawkwood gave Law to the Italian Princes, and taught them the Myſtery of "commanding Armies.

"But on this ſide the Mountains continued a wavering, hazy, undetermin'd Face of things, neither Peace nor War.

"Prorogations of Truces, Abſtinences, Sufferances, Patiences, Tolerances were the Language and the Amuſe-"ment of the Times; and all the while were kept on foot Treaties for a Perpetual Peace:

"Treaties hitherto fruitleſs, illuſory and unpracticable."

FOEDERA Tom. VII.

land, while he was preparing a Fleet to ravage the Southern Coasts. The Court of England was so alarm'd at the Preparations of France, that they assembled all the Militia of the Kingdom, and muster'd an Army of 300,000 Men; which Precaution so terrify'd the French, that they dropp'd their Projects, and left the Scots alone to bear the whole Expence of the War.

IN 1386, the Duke of Lancaster, Richard's Uncle, having carry'd an Army of 20,000 Men into Castile, France resolv'd to lay hold of that Opportunity to conquer England, and for that end prepar'd an Army of 60,000 Men, and a Fleet of 900 Ships. But 'tis pretended that the Duke of Berry, who was Uncle to Charles VI. baulk'd the Expedition by an affected Delay. However that was, those Troops were not embark'd, the Transports design'd to carry them were scatter'd by a Tempest, and some of them actually taken by the English.

THE great Expence laid out upon this Armament was such, that the King of France was not able to do much afterwards. Richard on his part was equally unable to prosecute the War. Consequently in 1389, the two Kings concluded a Truce for three Years, which in 1391, was prolong'd for another Year.

Truce.

RICHARD's Disinclination to Arms, and the excessive Charge he was at in other respects, to no purpose, hinder'd him from thinking seriously on a War. On the other hand, Charles VI. being seiz'd in 1392, with a Distemper which very often depriv'd him of the Use of Reason, the Court of France fell into so many Divisions, that instead of putting themselves in a posture to make an advantage of the Enemy's Supineness, they only aim'd at each other's Ruin; which was the reason that nothing considerable happen'd from the time the Hostilities were renew'd, till the Year 1395, that the two Crowns agreed upon a Truce for 28 Years, which was seal'd by the Marriage of Richard with Isabel, Charles VI's Daughter.

Another.

Richard's Marriage.

IT may easily be suppos'd that there are not very many important Pieces upon this Article, in the Tome before us: all that we find in it being only Orders to guard the Coasts, Passports for Ambassadors, and Treaties of Truce, which were often renew'd.

Lord of Coucy sends back the Order of the Garter. P. 172.

THE following is a Letter which the Lord Coucy, Son-in-law to Edward III. wrote to Richard, when he sent him back the Order of the Garter; whereby we may guess at their manner of Writing in those Days.

i. e. Most Honoured and most Potent Lord,

YOUR Majesty very well knows the Alliance which by the Grace and Goodness of the most potent and good King, my most honoured and most dread Lord and Father, the King lately deceas'd (on whose Soul may God have Mercy) was pleas'd that I should make with him, and also with you; for which, most honoured Lord, I thank you with all my heart.

IT happens now that there is a War betwixt the King of France, my natural and sovereign Lord, on the one part, and you on the other; which gives me more Uneasiness than any one thing in the World.

For I am both commanded and requir'd to serve him, and to discharge my Duty as I am bound to him, whom you well know I ought not to disobey, but to serve to the utmost of my power.

AND most honoured and most potent Lord, that nothing whatsoever may be said by way of Reflection against me or my Honour, I advertise you hereof, and renounce whatsoever Fidelity and Homage I owe to you.

AND, most honoured Lord, whereas my most dread Lord and Father, above-mention'd, Richard's Letter to the Duke of Lancaſter. P. 407.

THERE is a Letter from Richard II. to his Uncle the Duke of Lancaſter, impowering him, if he thinks fit, to propoſe to the King of France, in his Name, to put an end to their Diſpute, by ſingle Combat betwixt them two alone, or each ſeconded by his three Uncles, or elſe by a general Battle. The Letter is dated[a] September the 8th, 1383.

RICHARD was then 17 Years of Age, and Charles but 15; conſequently there was no likelihood that the Challenge would be accepted, or that the Duke of Lancaſter, whom the King left to his liberty to propoſe it or not, would engage him in ſuch a Duel.

Truces with France. P. 622.

THERE follow'd a Treaty of Truce concluded at Lenlingham, between Ardres and Calais, from June the 18th, 1389, to October 1392. And,

II. Affairs of Bretagne.

Duke of Bretagne baniſh'd, but recall'd.

THE Duke of Bretagne had always eſpous'd the intereſt of his Father-in-law, King Edward III. which was enough to incenſe the King of France againſt him; who, by the Connivance of the Lords of Bretagne, turn'd him out of his Dominions, and compell'd him to take refuge in Flanders. The Duke of Lancaſter willing to try if he could reſtore him, went and laid ſiege to St. Malo, but was oblig'd to raiſe it. Charles V. being yet more enrag'd againſt him after this Enterpriſe, caus'd him to be ſummon'd before the Court of Peers; and for his non-appearance got an Arret paſs'd for reuniting Bretagne to the Crown of France. Then the Bretons perceiving that he was for making that Dutchy his own, recall'd their Duke, who to ſupport himſelf made a Treaty with the Engliſh, by which he gave them Breſt. In purſuance of this Treaty, the Earl of Buckingham, Richard's Uncle, was ſent into Bretagne with an Army of 8000 Men, whom he put aſhore at Calais, in order to march by Land. While he was upon the Road, King Charles V. died, leaving his Succeſſor at no more than 12 Years of Age. This ſeeming a favourable Conjuncture for the Duke of Bretagne, he made a ſeparate Peace with France, and ſent home his Forces. The Engliſh nevertheleſs kept Breſt 'till 1397. that Richard reſtor'd it to the Duke for a ſmall Sum of Money.

Breſt reſtor'd.

OF the numerous Acts which relate to Bretagne, the two of moſt importance are, Treaty about it. P. 190.

1. A TREATY by which the Duke of Bretagne engages to give Breſt to the Engliſh, on condition that the ſaid Place be reſtor'd to him, when the War is made an end of, either by a Peace or by a long Truce; 'tis dated[b] April the 5th, 1378.

Betwixt Richard and the Duke of Bretagne. P. 236.

2. A TREATY of Alliance, offenſive and defenſive, betwixt the King of England and the Duke of Bretagne, by which the two Princes engage to make neither Peace nor Truce without each other's conſent; dated[c] March the 1ſt, 1380.

THIS Treaty was broke in a few Months after by the Duke.

HERE are many other Acts in this Seventh Tome of the Fœdera, relating to the Earl of Buckingham's Expedition, and to the Town of Breſt.

III. Affairs of Scotland.

King of Scotland takes Roxburgh.

THE Truce which Edward III. had made with Scotland was to continue till the Year 1384. but it was ill obſerv'd by both Nations, who reproach'd each other for breaking it. This was a fair Pretext for Robert Stuart, King of Scotland, who as ſoon as King Edward III. was dead, ſurpris'd and took Roxburgh.

And Berwick.

IN 1378, he alſo ſeiz'd the Caſtle of Berwick, which was preſently retaken by the Earl of Northumberland.

Negotiations for a Truce with Scotland.

IN 1380, the Duke of Lancaſter, who had got the Engliſh Council to paſs a Reſolution for ſending Succours to the King of Portugal againſt Caſtile, thought it neceſſary, before thoſe Troops were ſent away, to confirm the Truce with Scotland. For this end he went himſelf to the Frontiers, but he met with vaſt Difficulties in the Negotiation of that Affair. The Scots aſſerted that the Engliſh were the firſt that broke the Truce; and if they had a mind to renew it, they muſt come to new Terms: but to this the Engliſh would not conſent, and only demanded a Confirmation of the Truce. 'Till this Difference could be made up, the Duke of Lancaſter obtain'd an Engagement, that inſtead of confirming the Truce, reciprocal Securities ſhould be given on both ſides, that no Hoſtilities ſhould be committed for three Years. It was very happy for England that this Affair was determin'd before they had the News in Scotland of the Inſurrection in Kent, of which by and by.

Truce concluded with France.

IN 1383, Robert made an Incurſion into the North parts of England, while the French ravag'd the Southern Coaſts. But not long after, France and England agreed upon a Truce, in which room was left for the King of Scotland, in caſe he had a mind to come into it. Mean time, he delay'd ſo long to return an Anſwer, that the Duke of Lancaſter enter'd Scotland; and Robert finding himſelf no longer ſupported by the French, he deſir'd to be included in the Truce, which was granted.

IN 1385, while the King of France was preparing to conquer England, the King of Scotland made a ſecond Incurſion into the Northern Frontiers; and France miſcarrying in her Deſign, as has been already obſerv'd, Richard march'd into Scotland, and ravag'd the Neighbourhood of Edinburgh. If he had been wiſe enough to have improv'd his Advantages, he might have conquer'd that Kingdom; but being ſoon weary of the War, he retir'd, leaving his Work imperfect.

AFTER that time, the Scots were included in all the Truces which were made betwixt France and England.

THERE'S a great number of Acts in this Tome relating to Scotland, ſome of which may be of uſe to ſuch as write the Hiſtory of that part of Great-Britain, eſpecially on account of the Dates; but I have not met with any remarkable enough to be particularly inſiſted on in this Abridgment.

AMONG thoſe Acts there are ſome in Engliſh, as they then wrote and pronounc'd it in *Scotland.

IV. Affairs of Caſtile.

IT was obſerv'd in our Account of the Sixth Tome of the Fœdera, that Peter, ſurnam'd the Cruel, King of Caſtile, had been reſtor'd to his Kingdom by the Prince of Wales, who afterwards left him in diſguſt. When he was gone, Peter was again attack'd by his Baſtard Brother Henry, who routed him, and kill'd him with his own Hands, in the Tent of Du Gueſclin the French General, where they happen'd to meet. After the Defeat and Death of Peter, Henry was recogniz'd King of Caſtile.

King of Caſtile kill'd in Battel.

PETER had left two Daughters Conſtantia and Catherine, who retir'd to Bayonne, where, notwithſtanding their Father's Ingratitude, the Prince of Wales was pleas'd to give them ſhelter. And when that Prince quitted Guyenne upon account of his Illneſs, he left his Brothers there, viz. the Duke of Lancaſter and the Earl of Cambridge, who ſoon after married both thoſe Caſtilian Princeſſes. The Duke of Lancaſter, who had the eldeſt to his ſhare, immediately aſſuming the Title of King of Caſtile, it occaſion'd the Baſtard Henry's cloſe Union with France; and from that time there was always open War betwixt England and Caſtile.

Marriage of his Daughters.

* Tho' Mr. Rapin, who wrote his Abridgment abroad, and deſign'd it chiefly for the uſe of Foreigners, did not judge it neceſſary to inſert any Example of this kind, the Tranſlator has thought fit to exhibit one of theſe Acts in this place, as ſuppoſing there are Readers on both ſides the Tweed, to whom an Act that contains ſo many obſolete Engliſh Terms, and ſuch ſtrange Spelling, will be at leaſt entertaining, if not uſeful.

'Tis call'd Indentura ſuper Prorogatione Treugarum Scotiæ; and runs thus.

RICHARD II.

Quarrel between the Kings of Portugal and Castile.

DURING the Reign of Richard, a Rupture which happen'd betwixt Ferdinand King of Portugal, and the King of Castile, oblig'd Ferdinand to apply to England for Assistance; and on that condition he offer'd his only Daughter Beatrix in Marriage with the eldest Son of the Earl of Cambridge, and to have him declared his Presumptive Heir. This Offer being accepted, the Earl of Cambridge was sent with an Army into Portugal: But Ferdinand having obtain'd all that he aim'd at by it, which was to make a more advantageous Peace with the King of Castile, he gave his Daughter to his Son the Castilian Prince, and sent the English back again.

King of Portugal puts a Trick upon the English.

Another Quarrel.

IN 1363, or thereabouts, a new Quarrel broke out betwixt Castile and Portugal: for Ferdinand dying without any Child besides Beatrix, the Wife of John King of Castile, who had now succeeded his Father Henry, John pretended that the Crown of Portugal was devolved to his Wife Beatrix; but the Portuguese plac'd John upon the Throne, who was Bastard Brother to their last King. This occasion'd a War, which did not prove so fortunate for the King of Castile as he hoped; yet being resolv'd not to recede from his Pretensions, he sued to France for Succours, while the new King of Portugal on the other hand made an Alliance with the King of England, and with the Duke of Lancaster, whom he own'd for King of Castile. Richard, who had no great Affection for the Duke his Uncle, was very glad of an Opportunity to be rid of him on so fair a Pretence, by giving him the Command of 20,000 Men, to go and assert his Rights to Castile. The Duke landed at Corunna, and in the very first Campaign took Compostella, and many other places. During the Winter, he made a Match betwixt Catherine his eldest Daughter by his first Wife Blanche of Lancaster, and the King of Portugal. Without dwelling upon the Particulars of this War, it shall suffice to say that it was concluded by a Treaty. The Duke marry'd Constantia, his Daughter by his second Wife Constantia of Castile, to Henry Son to the King of Castile, and resign'd his Pretensions to that Crown. The King on his part promised to pay the Duke the Sum of 600,000 Livres, and a yearly Pension of 40,000 Livres, during the Life of the Duke and his Duchess.

King of Portugal marries the Duke of Lancaster's Daughter.

The Duke's Resignation of his Pretensions to Castile.

THERE'S a great Number of Acts in this Tome relating to Castile; but I pass over the Majority, and shall only take notice of some which are of most importance.

King of Portugal's Engagement to the Earl of Cambridge's Son. P. 262.

1. THE Engagement enter'd into by Ferdinand King of Portugal, and his Queen Eleanor, for procuring the Supply which they desir'd of England. It appears by this Act that they positively engag'd to give their Daughter Beatrix to the eldest Son of the Earl of Cambridge, and to secure the Crown of Portugal to that young Prince after their Decease; 'tis dated July the 5th, 1380[a].

Agreement betwixt the Kings of France and Castile. P. 285.

2. THE renewing of the Alliance betwixt France and John King of Castile, wherein it is stipulated that in case the Duke of Lancaster be taken Prisoner by the French, he shall be deliver'd up to the King of Castile; dated December the 18th, 1383.

Negotiations with the King of Castile. P. 386.

3. A FULL Power granted by Richard to his Ambassadors to treat with John Son to Henry King of Castile; dated April the 1st, 1383[b]. From thence it appears, that the King of Castile was afraid of the Succours which Portugal was like to have from the English. And the very next Act shews, that he had made some Advances towards an Accommodation with the English.

Betwixt King Richard and the Duke of Lancaster. P. 495.

4. CONVENTIONS between Richard II. and the Duke Lancaster as King of Castile, by which the Duke engages to make no Peace with the King of Castile, till the latter obliges himself to pay Richard 200,000 Doublons of Gold, for the Damages done to the English, as he had already offer'd once before; dated February the 7th, 1386[c].

Bull against the Anti-Pope and the pretended King of Castile. P. 507.

5. AN Order for publishing a Bull of Pope Urban VI. in England, which granted Indulgences to those who should assist the Duke of Lancaster[d] in his Expedition against John the pretended King of Castile, and the Adherent of the Anti-Pope Robert of Geneva (Clement VII.)[e].

Alliance perpetual with Portugal. P. 515. P. 524.

6. TREATY of perpetual Alliance betwixt England and Portugal[f]; May the 9th, 1386.

7. CONVENTIONS agreed upon as to the Succours which England was to send to the King of Portugal, dated as above.

Negotiations with Spain. P. 587.

[d] Walsingham, a Benedictin Monk belonging in these Days to the Abbey of St. Albans, says, the Duke had got as large Indulgences as were granted to the Bishop of Norwich in 1382, for his Croisado against the said Anti-Pope; but he observes that the frequency of granting such Pardons and Relaxations had now render'd them vile and contemptible, so that scarce any body regarded them, or would give 2 d. towards this last Croisado, tho' they were so extravagantly fond of the former: which is a Lesson, that a Cheat, tho' ever so religious, is not to be play'd over twice in one Age.

Cambridge administer'd the Government from the 21st of June 1377, to Michaelmas following, when the Parliament assembled. During that Interval, the French committed great Ravages in England, and the Scots seiz'd Roxburgh. All these Misfortunes were imputed to the Negligence of the Duke of Lancaster, who was a Person not at all belov'd, because he had abus'd the Confidence repos'd in him by the King his Father, in the latter Years of his Reign. And for this reason the Parliament excluded him from any Share in the Administration, and appointed twelve Lords to be the King's Governors during his Minority.

Duke of Lancaster's Conduct censur'd.

THE same Day that Richard was crown'd he created his Uncle Thomas of Woodstock, the only Son of King Edward who had not yet a Title, Earl of Buckingham.

Thomas of Woodstock created Earl of Buckingham.

IN 1380, the Parliament abolish'd the Authority of the King's twelve Governors, and committed the sole Care of his Education to the Earl of Warwick.

AND at the same time they establish'd fourteen Commissioners to inspect the King's Revenues, and to examine for what Uses they had been employ'd since his Accession to the Crown.

Commissioners of the King's Revenues appointed.

IN November that same Year the King call'd another Parliament, which granted him a Subsidy of twelve Pence a head upon every Person above fifteen years of Age, not excepting the Monks.

A Poll-Tax granted him.

IN 1381, the levying of this Poll-Tax caus'd a terrible Insurrection. One of the Collectors demanding Payment from a Tyler's Daughter at Deptford in Kent, the Father, who was commonly call'd Wat Tyler, asserted that his Daughter was under fifteen Years of Age; and the Collector offering Incivility to her, in order to be satisfied of the Truth, Wat Tyler knock'd him on the head with his Lathing Hammer; for which Murder, those that were present applauded him, and promis'd to stand by him. At the same time the Spirit of Rebellion not only infected that Town, but spread thro' both the Counties of Kent and Essex. The common People rendezvous'd from all Parts; and in a few days there were above 100,000 Men, who acknowledg'd Wat Tyler for their Chief. The Rebels, when they saw themselves so numerous, march'd directly to London, where the Populace open'd the Gates to them; and after committing terrible Outrages, [a] they made themselve Masters of the Tower. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Treasurer, being retir'd thither for Safety, were sacrific'd to the Fury of this insolent Multitude, who instantly caus'd them to be beheaded; for the Rebels were so enrag'd against the Nobility, and Gentlemen of the Long-Robe, that they spar'd none that they could lay their hands on [b]. The Duke of Lancaster was also one of the principal Objects of their Fury, because the Ravages which the French had committed in Kent, were imputed solely to his Negligence [c].

Insurrection thereupon by Wat Tyler, &c.

AFTER they had exercis'd their Barbarity about the Tower, a Detachment of them, to the Number of 60,000, march'd into the City [d], and spread such Terror even to the King's Council, that as good a Charter was offer'd them for the Security of their Privileges, as they could have wish'd for, together with a general Amnesty for all that had taken Arms. The Offer was accepted, and the Detachment return'd home, after having obtain'd all that they desir'd. Wat Tyler, who lay near the Tower with about 40,000 Men, not seeming so well dispos'd to consent to those Terms; the King, who was advanc'd as far as Smithfield, sent to desire a Conference with him, which he was pleas'd to grant; and accordingly march'd thither at the head of his Forces [e], and talk'd with the King in the Square, both sitting on horse-back. The Demands he made were so extravagant, that the King knew not what Answer to make him [f]. Mean time the Rebel who had his drawn Sword in his Hand, Wat Tyler's Insolence and Death.

[a] Their Leaders giving out that they did not come for the sake of Plunder, would not suffer their Men to carry off the least thing; so that when one of them was going to pocket a piece of Plate, they threw him into the Fire, wherein they consum'd all the Spoils of the Houses they had plunder'd. In this Disorder London look'd like a City taken by Storm; the Archbishop's Palace, St. John's-House by Smithfield, and the Temple, were consum'd, together with Lancaster-House, the Houses of the Judges, Lords, and chief Citizens, in order to fulfil the Oath which the Rebels had taken, to destroy every thing that carried but an Appearance of Grandeur or Distinction. The Flemings, who were said to be the Projectors, as well as Farmers of the Poll-Tax, were so hated by them, that they were haled out of the very Churches, to which they fled for Refuge, and murder'd on the spot.

[b] There was a general Complaint against the Nobility for their Oppression, and against the Lawyers for their Extortion; and the Monks being subject to the Capitation Tax, as well as others, 'tis affirm'd by the Writers of that time, that they were indefatigable in fomenting the Sedition. As the Rebels march'd to London, they set all the Prisoners at liberty; of which Number was John Straw, a Priest of Maidstone, who exasperated the People against their Superiors, by his levelling Sermons wherever he came, That as all were the Sons of Adam, there ought to be no Distinction or Superiority; and that all things ought to be equally shar'd in common.

[c] They had such an implacable Malice against John Duke of Lancaster, who they suspected aim'd at the Crown, that they burnt his Palace in the Savoy, the finest in England, to Ashes, and bound themselves by Oath never to own any King whose Name was John.

[d] This Detachment, viz. the Rebels of Essex, was headed by John Straw.

[e] He was so insolent, that he told the Knight whom the King sent to desire a Conference with him, That he wou'd come when he thought fit; and when he set out, he march'd with such lingring State, that the King sending the same Knight a second time to hasten him, the Commission had like to have cost him his Life: And when he arriv'd in Smithfield, the same Knight was like to be sacrific'd, because he deliver'd him his Message from the King without alighting from his Horse; which so provok'd the imperious Tyler, that he was going to run him through, if the King had not stepp'd forwards, and call'd out to his Knight to dismount.

[f] He demanded in substance, that all the old Laws should be abolish'd, and the Form of Government alter'd according to his own fanatical Schemes; and that all Warrens, Parks and Chaces should be made common, and free for the Poor as well as the Rich, to fish, fowl, hunt, and the like.

Hand, flouriſh'd it in ſuch a manner, as ſeem'd to menace the King; which Inſolence ſo provok'd Walworth the Lord Mayor of London, that without conſidering to what Danger he might expoſe the King's Perſon, he ſtruck the haughty Rebel ſuch a ſtunning Blow on the Head with his Sword, that he tumbled off his Horſe, and fell down at his Feet. The Rebels were beginning to bend their Bows to revenge his Death, when the King, with a Preſence of Mind beyond any thing that could be expected from a Prince of but fifteen Years of Age, call'd aloud to them with Courage, and bid them fear nothing, for HE would be their General. At the ſame time he put himſelf at the head of them, and march'd with them to St. George's Fields, whither they were immediately follow'd by a thouſand Citizens well arm'd, under the command of Robert Knolles, an Officer of great Reputation; the ſight of which Body ſtruck them with ſuch Terror, that they threw down their Arms, beg'd the King's Mercy, and diſpers'd themſelves[a].

Inſurrection in Suffolk and Cambridge, quaſh'd by the Biſhop of Norwich.

AT the ſame time there were the like Tumults in the Counties of Suffolk and Cambridge[b], where the Rebels kill'd Cavendiſh the Chief Juſtice of England, and the Earl of Suffolk: but the Biſhop of Norwich marching againſt them, at the head of ſome Troops, routed them with a great Slaughter, and put an end to that Inſurrection: After which the King revok'd the Amneſty he had granted, and ſeverely puniſh'd the Criminals, of whom above 1500 were hang'd[c]. During theſe Inſurrections, the Duke of Lancaſter ſtay'd in Scotland, not daring to expoſe himſelf to the Fury of the Engliſh Populace, who, as was ſaid above, had a particular Spite againſt him.

King's Marriage.

Not many Months before this, the King had ſent Ambaſſadors to Nuremburg, who there concluded his Marriage with Anne of Luxemburg, Siſter to the Emperor Wenceſlaus[d]. But the new Queen did not arrive in England till after the Rebellion was over, and till the chief Men concern'd in it had receiv'd their Doom.

IN 1382, Richard being then in the ſeventeenth Year of his Age, began to diſcover ſome Inclinations which were not at all agreeable to the People. Tho' he was not a Prince of the greateſt Abilities, he had a high Opinion of his own Merit; and valued himſelf for ſurpaſſing his Anceſtors in the Expences of his Houſhold. Moreover, he had made choice of certain Favourites, whoſe Avarice was boundleſs, and who inceſſantly prompted him to exerciſe a deſpotick Power over his Subjects. His chief Minions were Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, Michael de la Pole, Son to a Merchant of London, the Archbiſhop of York, one Brambre an Alderman of London, and Judge Treſilian; the latter was a Man ſo abandon'd to Iniquity, that he made no ſcruple to betray the Intereſts of his Country, in order to procure the King an unlimited Authority. Theſe Favourites ſoon made themſelves odious by their Pride and Avarice: and as they were afraid of Oppoſition from the King's Uncles, they made it their buſineſs to miſrepreſent them to him, and often put him upon evil Courſes to deſtroy them.

RICHARD II.

His Character.

His Favourites.

IN 1383, and 1384, they work'd up an Accuſation of the Duke of Lancaſter, for a Conſpiracy againſt the King; but they ſtrove in vain to ruin him.

Duke of Lancaſter charg'd with a Conſpiracy.

IN 1385, Richard went into Scotland, and at his Return confer'd the Title of Duke of York on the Earl of Cambridge, and that of Duke of Gloceſter on the Earl of Buckingham, his Uncles. He created the Earl of Oxford Marquis of Dublin, and ſoon after Duke of Ireland; and Michael de la Pole was made Earl of Suffolk, and Chancellor of England.

IN 1386, Leon King of Armenia, who had been expell'd his Dominions by the Turks, came to England in order to procure a Peace betwixt the King of France and Richard, in hopes that thoſe two Princes would unite their Arms together to reſtore him; but it was not poſſible for him to ſucceed in his Project.

THE ſame Year, the Duke of Lancaſter ſet out on his Expedition for Caſtile, with an

[a] Mr. Rapin, who obſerves in his Hiſtory of England, that there was not one of the Rebels kill'd all this while, beſides him who was their Leader, takes notice with Admiration of ſome extraordinary Circumſtances attending this Inſurrection. 'Tis no ſtrange thing, ſays he, to find People in Arms againſt their Governments, but they ſeldom chuſe ſuch a Man as Wat Tyler was to head them; tho' it is not impoſſible to find ſome ſuch Inſtances in other Hiſtories. 'Tis undoubtedly altogether as rare to find a ſingle Man, like the Mayor of London, to have the Hardineſs to kill a Leader attended by 30,000 of his Men. 'Tis ſtill more ſurpriſing, that King Richard's Courage and Reſolution, ſo uncommon at his Age, ſhould produce ſo happy an Effect: And finally, that ſo numerous a Multitude, who came to glut themſelves with Blood and Slaughter, ſhould be diſpers'd all on a ſudden, by a Panic, at the ſight of a handful of arm'd Citizens. This is what one cannot conſider without Aſtoniſhment, and without aſcribing the Cauſe to Him who holds the Hearts of the People in his hand.

[b] The Rebels in theſe Counties, who were aſſembled to the number of 50,000, were rais'd by John Wraw and John Ball, two ſeditious Prieſts; and beſides the Murders they committed, they burnt all the old Charters in the Monaſtery of St. Edmondsbury, and the Univerſity of Cambridge. They cut off the Head of Sir John Cavendiſh, and ſet it on the Pillory at St. Edmundsbury. At Norwich alſo one Litteſter, an Alehouſe-Keeper, at the head of a pack of Rebels in that County, put all the Judges and Lawyers to death that he could come at, and made the Nobility and Gentry ſerve him on the Knee, or elſe cut off their Heads on the ſpot. But theſe Rebels being at laſt defeated by the Biſhop, as above, and the two Leaders Wraw and Litteſter taken, the former had his Head cut off immediately, and the other was ſent to London.

[c] Judge Treſilian, who was ſent into the Country to puniſh the Rebels, ſhew'd ſo little Mercy, that Mr. Rapin, in his Hiſtory, compares the Cruelties he exerciſ'd during his Commiſſion, to thoſe for which a Judge of the ſame Character was ſo infamous in the Reign of King James II.

[d] This was obſerv'd to be an Alliance of ſome Honour, but of little Profit to the Realm, ſhe being followed by a Multitude of infatiate Bohemians, who by the King's Facility drain'd Abundance of Wealth out of the Kingdom.

RICHARD II.

an Army of 20,000 Men. France, reſolving to improve this Opportunity, made prodigious Preparations to conquer England, while Richard, on his part, aſſembled a powerful Army to defend his Kingdom, and call'd a Parliament in order to obtain a Subſidy. The Parliament laid hold of this Occaſion to demand that his Favourites might be remov'd, and oblig'd to give an account of the Adminiſtration of the Finances. The King refus'd it with Diſdain; and ſuch high Words paſs'd on the Subject, betwixt Him and the Duke of Glouceſter his Uncle, whom the Parliament deputed to him, as involv'd the Duke in the Hatred both of the King and his Favourites. At laſt the King was oblig'd to conſent to every thing the Parliament deſir'd, and baniſh'd the Duke of Ireland and the Earl of Suffolk; but he recall'd them as ſoon as the Parliament broke up.

The Sheriffs check his Views.

IN 1387, the Favourites having regain'd their former Aſcendant, incens'd the young King more and more againſt their Enemies, and particularly againſt the Duke of Glouceſter. Not long after, the Duke of Ireland having put away his Wife Philippa, who was the Daughter of the Lord de Coucy by a Daughter of Edward III. the Duke of Glouceſter ſhew'd that he was not a little affronted; and ſo menac'd the Favourites, that they were reſolv'd to prevent him. To this end, they thought no way would be ſo effectual as to determine the King to render himſelf abſolute, and then they hoped eaſily to get rid of their Enemies. Richard following this Advice, went to Nottingham, where he aſſembled all the Judges and Sheriffs of the Kingdom together, with ſome Inhabitants of London: And when they were come before him, he ask'd the Judges if he had not a Power to ſet aſide the Commiſſioners whom the Parliament had eſtabliſh'd to take care of the Government. The Judges told him, that he might not only annul that Commiſſion, but that he might alſo, by virtue of his Royal Prerogative, aboliſh all the Acts of Parliament; And this Advice they ſet their Hands to[a]. Then the King addreſſing himſelf to the Sheriffs, told them his Deſign to call a Parliament which ſhould be at his devotion; and at the ſame time enjoin'd them not to ſuffer any Deputy to be elected, unleſs he would engage beforehand to come into his Meaſures: He added, that he would raiſe an Army to enable him to puniſh ſuch of his Subjects as offer'd to oppoſe his Will and Pleaſure; and ask'd them what Number of Forces every County was able to furniſh. The Sheriffs made Anſwer, that he commanded them ſuch things as were not in their power to perform; that the Common People would never bear to be depriv'd of the Freedom of Elections; and that as to the Army he propos'd to raiſe, there was not the leaſt likelihood that any body would take Arms to oppreſs thoſe Lords, of whom the People in general had ſo good an Opinion. The Sheriffs Anſwer having convinc'd the King that it would be a difficult matter to bring his Projects to paſs, he deſiſted, and return'd to London.

He returns from Nottingham to London.

A Deſign of this nature, carried on ſo barefacedly, oblig'd the Duke of Glouceſter to make a League with his Nephew the Earl of Derby, the Duke of Lancaſter's Son, with the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and ſome others, who were in the ſame dangerous Situation with himſelf[b]. In a ſhort time, theſe Lords aſſembled an Army of 40,000 Men, with which they march'd directly to London. Richard, on his part, ſent the Duke of Ireland into Wales, to raiſe an Army there; and while this was doing, he endeavour'd to amuſe the Confederates with Propoſals of an Accommodation; and he engag'd his Word and Honour to them, that he would give them Satisfaction in the enſuing Parliament[c], flattering himſelf, that after ſuch a Promiſe they would make no ſcruple to lay down their Arms; but they did not care to do this before they ſaw the Performance. Mean time, hearing that the Duke of Ireland was advancing at the head of an Army, they detach'd the Earl of Derby to fight him. Victory declaring it ſelf for the Confederates, the Duke of Ireland fled, and made his Eſcape to Holland, from whence he went to Louvain, where he died[d]. Some Letters were found at this time, which diſcover'd that Richard had deſir'd Aſſiſtance of the King of France, and that he had engag'd

[a] Mr. Rapin, in his Hiſtory of England, Lib. x. p. 301. ſays, That ſome of the Judges would fain have been excuſed from ſuch a Subſcription, but that they were frighten'd into it by the Menaces of the Favourites; and he adds, that it was given out that one of the Judges, immediately after he had ſign'd, made an open Declaration that never any Action more richly deſerv'd the Gallows than what he had juſt been doing.

[b] Our Author tells us in his Hiſtory, as above, that the Duke of Glouceſter, like a wiſe Man, firſt try'd gentle Remedies, and ſent the Biſhop of London to the King to aſſure him of his Fidelity, and that he was ready to make Oath of his Innocence as to the Facts wherewith he was charg'd; but that the Earl of Suffolk, then preſent, damp'd the King's favourable Inclinations to him, by telling him, that his Majeſty would never be ſafe upon his Throne as long as the Duke of Glouceſter was alive: which Saying ſo provok'd the Biſhop of London, that he could not help telling that Favourite, he wonder'd to hear ſuch Language from him, who, of all Men living, ſhould have been the laſt to accuſe the King's loyal Subjects, ſince he was already condemn'd by Parliament, and only held his Life by the King's Mercy. Our Author adds, that this free Speech of the Biſhop ſo offended the King, that he commanded him to get out of his ſight.

[c] Mr. Rapin tells us in the next Page of his Hiſtory, that the Lords firſt petition'd him on their Knees in Weſtminſter-Hall to puniſh his Miniſters; adding, that his Perſon would be always ſacred to them, and that they only took up Arms for the Welfare of the King and Kingdom, and for Juſtice to thoſe Traitors about his Majeſty's Perſon, of whom they named in particular the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, the Archbiſhop of York, Judge Treſilian, and an Alderman of London, nam'd Brambre, who was of the ſame Cabal. Then the King told them, that Juſtice ſhould be done to every body in the enſuing Parliament.

IN the Month of February 1388, the Parliament aſſembled in a Temper not at all agreeable to the King: They baniſh'd his two principal Favourites, and the Archbiſhop of York, and cauſed Treſilian and Brambre to be hang'd for having ſign'd Advices contrary to the Laws of the Realm, and the Liberties of the Subject; and they concluded their Seſſion with a general Amneſty for all that were engag'd in the late Diſturbances[a].

His Favourites ſome hanged and others baniſhed.

A General Amneſty.

SOME Months after, the King being arrived at the Age of Twenty-one, took the Reins of Government into his own Hands, from which time England was very quiet for ſome Years; though his Subjects were uneaſy to perceive from time to time that the King claim'd to himſelf a Power above the Laws. As he was very fond of Pomp and Magnificence, his Expences far exceeded his Revenues, ſo that he was forced to make uſe of ſeveral illegal Methods to ſupply his Occaſions. He had a mind once to try the Affection of the City of London, by deſiring them to lend him a Thouſand Pounds Sterling: but tho' it was no great Sum, they bluntly denied him[b], which ſo mortify'd him, that not long after, there being a Tumult[c] in the City, occaſion'd by a Baker's Boy, he depriv'd the City of its Privileges, turn'd out the Mayor, eſtabliſh'd a Warden in his room, and remov'd the Courts of Judicature to York; and it afterwards coſt the City no leſs than 10,000 l. to recover its Charter.

QUEEN Anne died in 1394, and the ſame Year Richard ſet out for Ireland, where there had been an Inſurrection; but he return'd on a ſudden next Year, at the Requeſt of the Clergy, who were alarm'd ar a Petition preſented to the Parliament by the Wickliffites, or Lollards, for a Reformation.

AFTER the Duke of Lancaſter was return'd into Caſtile, the King granted him Guyenne in full Sovereignty; but in 1396, at the Requeſt of the Gaſcons, he revok'd the ſaid Grant[d].

Duke of Lancaſter's Sovereignty of Guyenne revok'd.

IN 1397, Richard plainly manifeſted the Deſign which he had form'd to uſurp a Deſpotic Power; for his Revenues not being ſufficient to anſwer his extravagant Expences, he was reſolv'd to eaſe himſelf of the Trouble of asking Supplies ſo often from his Parliament. To this end he borrow'd ſeveral Sums of almoſt all the Corporations, and the richeſt Commoners in his Kingdom. But as theſe Loans, which were far from being voluntary, occaſion'd great Murmurings among the People, he was afraid that the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, who were very popular Men, would make uſe of this Opportunity to ſtir up a Rebellion; therefore he caus'd all three of them to be arreſted, after having firſt taken all the neceſſary Meaſures infallibly to procure their Ruin. The Duke was ſent to Calais, and the two Earls to the Tower, till the Parliament met[e].

RICHARD II.

The King's Extravagance, and Shifts to ſupport it.

He arreſts the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick.

RICHARD had ſo well order'd all Matters before-hand, that he could not fail of having a Parliament at his devotion. He had chang'd all the Sheriffs, and other Magiſtrates of the Towns and Counties, that were not for his Turn, and put others in their places that he could depend on. All the Offices in the Kingdom, that were capable of influencing the People, were put into the hands of Perſons devoted to the King, or elſe of Wretches who only minded their own private Intereſt, and did not in the leaſt care what became of the Public. After he had taken theſe Precautions, he call'd a Parliament, and ſent expreſs Orders to the Towns and Counties, that no Member ſhould be choſe but ſuch as he had put down in a Liſt. And when 'tis conſider'd, that he was ſupported by all thoſe who were poſſeſs'd of the publick Offices, in ſuch places where the Elections were made, no wonder that he was able to bring his Deſign to bear.

THE Parliament being thus pack'd, aſſembled with a Diſpoſition to do every thing that the King could wiſh. They began with revoking the Pardon granted nine Years before to thoſe who had taken Arms againſt the King; and upon this Baſis they proſecuted Proceedings of the King's pack'd Parliament againſt the Duke of Glouceſter, &c.

[a] He obſerves, that the Confederate Lords before this, juſt after their Victory in Oxfordſhire, march'd all their Army into London, and demanded a Conference with King Richard, then in the Tower, who, for fear of being ſtarved there, granted it. They therein reproach'd him with his Deſign to make himſelf abſolute, by having an Army and a Parliament at his Devotion, with his private Treaty with France, &c. which made the King weep heartily, and promiſe to meet them next Day at Weſtminſter, in order to regulate the Adminiſtration; but they were ſcarce got out of the Tower, when he changed his Reſolution: which Inconſtancy provoked them to tell him, that if he did not come according to his Promiſe, they would go to Weſtminſter themſelves, and chuſe a new King; which ſo frighten'd the young Prince, that he not only went thither, but agreed to the Baniſhment of his Favourites as above, and ſeveral other Lords and Ladies, their Friends.

[b] It is ſaid that an Italian Merchant, who offer'd to lend him that Sum, was mobb'd.

[c] Our Hiſtorians tell us that this was the occaſion of the Tumult: A Baker's Boy paſſing through Fleet-ſtreet with a Basket of Bread, a Servant belonging to the Biſhop of London, as Caxton ſays, (but as Sir John Hayward ſays in his Life of Henry IV. to the Biſhop of Salisbury, wherein he agrees with Hollingſhed and others) took out a Loaf, and abus'd the Boy who demanded it, in ſuch a manner, as rais'd a Mob that threaten'd to fire the Biſhop's Palace, into which he retir'd for ſhelter, 'till the Magiſtrates came and ſuppreſs'd them.

[d] The Gaſcons maintain'd their Country was ſo inſeparably united to the Crown of England, that it was not in the King's power to alienate it; and that a Separation from England would expoſe them to the Loſs of the only Protection that could hinder them from falling under the Dominion of France. Rapin's Hiſt.

[e] Such was the Duke of Glouceſter's Innocence as well as Popularity, that Richard was forc'd to make uſe of this kidnapping Stratagem. He went one Morning to the Duke's Country-Houſe at Plaſhey in Eſſex, and deſir'd him to dreſs immediately, and go with him to London upon an Affair of Conſequence, which he would tell him by the way. And when they came to a certain hollow Place, the Duke was immediately encompaſs'd by a Troop of Horſe, and carried thence on board a Ship in the Thames for Calais.

cuted the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, for the very Crime for which in 1388, they had a Pardon both from the King and Parliament: The two latter were condemn'd to die, and the Sentence was executed upon the Earl of Arundel; but they contented themſelves with baniſhing the Earl of Warwick to the Iſle of Man. As to the Duke of Glouceſter, the King took a ſhorter Method to be rid of him, by cauſing him to be ſtrangled in his Priſon at Calais. Mean time it was given out that he died of an Apoplexy, and that before he expir'd he own'd all his Crimes: And upon this pretended Confeſſion all his Eſtate was confiſcated[a].

Duke of Glouceſter murder'd.

Parliament adjourn'd to Shrewsbury.

Its Proceedings.

THE Affair of theſe three Lords being over, the Parliament was adjourn'd to Shrewsbury, where they proceeded in the ſame extraordinary manner as before. They declar'd that the Judges, whom the Parliament of 1388, caus'd to be hang'd, were Innocent; and that their Advice was conformable to the Laws. Upon this Principle they repeal'd all the Acts of the ſaid Parliament, and made others directly contrary. They decided that it was a Crime of High Treaſon to propoſe any Affair in Parliament before the Buſineſs recommended by the King was abſolutely finiſh'd. And to ſay all in a word, they did what they could to advance the Royal Prerogative above all the Laws. In order that the King might be at his entire liberty to do what he pleas'd, the Parliament veſted all their Authority in twelve Lords and ſix Commoners, pick'd out of thoſe that were moſt devoted to the King's Will and Pleaſure. This Inſtance ſhews, that 'tis not impoſſible but the very Parliament, which is deſign'd to maintain the Privileges of a Nation, may throw it into Slavery, when ſuch Aſſemblies are directed by popular Factions, or by the Cabals of an ambitious Prince; which either by running down the Royal Prerogative too low, or elſe ſcrewing it up too high, have often produc'd Diſorder, and deſtroy'd all Law, inſtead of procuring the Welfare of the Kingdom. Thus what was at one time juſt and advantageous to the Kingdom, appears at another time unjuſt and prejudicial. When ſuch an Evil happens, 'tis almoſt impoſſible to cure it, but by violent Remedies. And in my Opinion this, rather than any natural Inconſtancy, of which the Engliſh are accus'd, is the Cauſe of the Civil Wars which have been more frequent in England than any other Country in Europe; it being an Inconveniency which cannot be avoided in ſuch a Government as the Engliſh.

Remarks on the Engliſh Government and Nation.

THE Execution of the Earl of Arundel, the Condemnation of the Earl of Warwick, and the tragical Death of the Duke of Glouceſter, put the whole Kingdom into a Conſternation. On the other hand, the Deciſions of the Parliament, which ſubjected the Fortunes of the Subjects to the King's Mercy, and the Concurrence of the eighteen Commiſſioners with whatever the King deſir'd, made all Oppoſition vaniſh before him. The Lords were terrify'd by the Fate of thoſe who were ſo lately ſacrific'd to the King's Revenge; and the common People being curb'd by their own Magiſtrates, and oppreſs'd by their Repreſentatives in Parliament, were oblig'd to feign an Approbation of what they had not Power to hinder. But this ſort of Diſſimulation is often fatal to Kings of Richard's Character, who are too apt to be deceiv'd by ſuch a forc'd Obedience. If this Prince had been wiſe enough to ſet Bounds to that exceſſive Power, which he had lately uſurp'd, 'tis probable that he would have preſerv'd it all his Life-time: But after he had humbled ſome by Fear, and gain'd others by Favours, Richard thought he had taken all poſſible Precautions to preſerve his Power unlimited. He had made his Couſin, the Earl of Derby, Duke of Hereford, and had given the Title of Duke of Albemarle to the eldeſt Son of the Duke of York. Many other Lords were honour'd with greater Titles than they had before; and the forfeited Eſtates of the condemn'd Nobility were given to thoſe who manifeſted the profoundeſt Submiſſion and Complaiſance to the King's Will. Yet all this was not Security enough for this Prince, becauſe he ſtrangely abus'd the Power which he had newly acquir'd. As I don't propoſe to write a full Hiſtory of his Life, but only to ſet down the chief Events of his Reign, I ſhall content my ſelf with mentioning two remarkable Inſtances, to ſhew the little Regard he had to his Subjects.

Sad State of the Kingdom.

THO' by ſeveral illegal Methods he had already ſqueez'd great Sums out of his People, yet ſo inſatiable was his Avarice, that, notwithſtanding the Amneſty, he confiſcated no leſs than ſeventeen Counties, for having furniſh'd Troops to the confederate Lords in 1388, by which Sentence the Eſtates of all the Inhabitants of thoſe Counties

Eſtates of 17 Counties forfeited to the King.

[a] If the Parliament in 1386, deſerv'd the Title of Mercileſs, our Hiſtorian is at a loſs to find out a Name bad enough for this Aſſembly, who by a manifeſt Prevarication made no ſcruple to ſacrifice the beſt Blood in the Kingdom, as well as the deareſt Liberties and Privileges of the People, to the Paſſion of the King and his Miniſters. Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, for only having been one of the Commiſſioners appointed by Parliament in 1386, to inſpect the Adminiſtration of the publick Affairs, was impeach'd of High-Treaſon, baniſh'd, and had his Eſtate confiſcated. The Lord Cobham was alſo baniſh'd for the ſame Crime. As to the Execution of the Earl of Arundel, Froiſſard tells us that the King himſelf choſe to be preſent at it. And Walſingham affirms, that the horrid Spectacle made ſuch an Impreſſion on the King's Memory, that he was often diſturbed in his Dreams with a Repreſentation of his Ghoſt, all bloody, reproaching him for his Injuſtice. Mr. Rapin obſerves, that the Earl of Warwick was treated with leſs Severity, becauſe he did not lay hold of the Act of Amneſty with the ſame Courage and Gallantry as the others, but meanly confeſs'd himſelf a Criminal. As for the Duke of Glouceſter, who was ſtrangled, or rather ſtifled to death, between two Feather-Beds, he was the Son of one King, and the Uncle of another; and ſo belov'd by the People, that with him, ſaith Walſingham, the general Hope and Comfort of the Commonalty of the Land expir'd.

FOEDERA Tom. VII.

Counties were forfeited to the King's Uſe; ſo that the Richeſt, in order to redeem their Eſtates, were glad to give Bonds to the King, with Blanks for his Majeſty to fill up with what Sums he pleas'd. 'Tis natural to ſuppoſe, that ſo groſs an Inſtance of Tyranny render'd him odious to his Subjects; but another Injury which he committed was more fatal to him than this.

Quarrel betwixt the Dukes of Hereford and Norfolk.

THE Duke of Hereford, Son to the Duke of Lancaſter, having inform'd the King, that the Duke of Norfolk had ſpoke diſreſpectfully of his Perſon, in ſuch Language as tended to inflame the People againſt his Government, and the latter publickly denying the Fact, it was agreed that the Affair ſhould be decided by ſingle Combat, betwixt the Accuſer and the Accuſed [a]. The King had a mind to be preſent at the Duel, which was to be fought at Coventry: But juſt as they were going to begin, the King forbad them to proceed; and afterwards got an unjuſt Sentence to be paſs'd, by which they were both baniſh'd the Kingdom, the Duke of Norfolk for his whole Life, and the Duke of Hereford for ten Years. The former went to reſide at Venice, and the ſecond choſe France; but before his Departure, the King abated four Years of his Exile. He alſo granted him Letters Patent, authorizing him to appoint Attorneys to take poſſeſſion in his Name of ſuch Fiefs as might devolve to him during his abſence, with the Suſpenſion of Homage for the ſame 'till his Return. Nevertheleſs, his Father the Duke of Lancaſter dying not long after, the King ſeiz'd all his Eſtate, and order'd that the Baniſhment of his Son ſhould be perpetual, forbidding all manner of Perſons to ſpeak a word in his favour on pain of Death.

Both baniſh'd.

Death of the Duke of Lancaſter and the Injuſtice done to his Son.

Rebellion in Ireland.

SOME time after this, a Rebellion broke out in Ireland, which the King was reſolv'd to go in Perſon and ſuppreſs. He was ſo imprudent as to leave his Kingdom, and to carry all his Troops with him, tho' he cou'd not be ignorant that he left it full of Malecontents. During his abſence, the Lords who remain'd in England, call'd over the Duke of Hereford, who, upon the Death of his Father, had taken the Title of Duke of Lancaſter. This Prince relying on the Diſcontents of the People, repair'd without delay to Bretagne, where he caus'd three Ships to be fitted out; and putting to Sea with a Retinue of only fourſcore Perſons, he landed in July 1399, at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire, where ſeveral of the Nobility join'd him. The Impatience of the People to ſhake off the Yoke they lay under, made them flock to his Colours in ſuch numbers, that in a few Days his Army amounted to above 60,000 Men. With this great Body he march'd directly to London, which open'd its Gates to him with Joy. He went afterwards and laid ſiege to Briſtol, to which City the King's Miniſters were retired; and after having made himſelf Maſter of it, he caus'd the Earl of Wiltſhire, and two Knights of the King's Privy-Council, to be beheaded.

He cuts off ſome of the King's Miniſters Heads.

Engliſh Malecontents call over the Duke of Hereford, who takes his Father's Title.

His grateful Reception in England.

ALL the while Richard had not the leaſt Tidings of this Revolution; the Wind being ſo contrary for above a Month together, that it was not poſſible for any Veſſel to go over to Ireland. But as ſoon as he heard of it, he return'd ſpeedily to England, where he found things deſperate, the far greateſt part of the Kingdom having declar'd for the Duke. In this fatal Situation of his Affairs he went to Wales, and ſtay'd there for ſome time, not knowing what to determine. At laſt, fearing to be betray'd by his own Army, he ſtole away to Caernarvanſhire, where he ſhut himſelf up in the Caſtle of Conway; which, tho' a ſtrong Place, was altogether unprovided, and therefore no Protection to him. The Duke of Lancaſter, when inform'd of his Return, made great Marches towards Cheſter to give him Battel, which he thought would be the only way to put an end to the Diſpute. But Richard finding himſelf in no condition to venture an Engagement, or to make any long Reſiſtance in the Caſtle, to which he had confin'd himſelf, he put himſelf voluntarily into the Duke's hands, and offer'd to give his Crown for his Life; which being accepted, the Duke himſelf conducted him to London, and committed him to the Tower. And not long after, the Parliament being aſſembled, drew up Articles of Impeachment againſt the King, whereupon the ſaid Prince was ſolemnly depos'd. The Articles of his Impeachment were 35 in number [b], which it would be too tedious to mention here; beſides that Mr. Rymer's Collection takes no notice of them. But I can't help touching upon the 24th Article, which in my Opinion is a very ſingular one. By this Article Richard was accus'd of ſuch Equivocation and Diſhoneſty in the Treaties which he concluded with Foreign Princes, that there was not one left that would confide in him.

The King returns from Ireland to Wales, and ſteals from his Army to Conway-Caſtle.

He reſigns his Crown, is committed to the Tower, and depos'd.

His Succeſſor.

RICHARD being diveſted of the Crown, it was adjudg'd to Henry of Lancaſter, who was look'd upon as the Deliverer of his Country, tho' there was a nearer Heir, viz. Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, Grandſon of Philippa Daughter of Lionel Duke of Clarence, the ſecond of the [a] Mr. Rapin obſerves in his Hiſtory the Miſtake of Polydore Virgil and others, in aſſerting that the Duke of Norfolk tax'd the Duke of Hereford with reviling the King: For this he refers to the Acts of Parliament of the 21ſt of Richard II.

[b] Authors differ as to the number of theſe Articles; ſome make them but 33: the Writer of this Life and Reign, which a Perſon of Quality publiſh'd in 1681, from the Accounts of Knighton and Walſingham, recites them at large 33 in number, from a Record printed in the Volume call'd Hiſtoriæ Anglicanæ Scriptores Decem, which was firſt publiſh'd from authentic Manuſcripts, by thoſe two learned Antiquaries, Sir Roger Twiſden Bart. and John Selden Eſq; The Subſtance of the Articles is given in the Compleat Hiſtory of England, Vol. I. as well as in the third Volume of Mr. Rapin's.

the Sons of Edward III. whereas Henry was deſcended from John Duke of Lancaſter, who was the ſaid Edward's third Son. Now tho' Edmund was only deſcended from a Daughter of Lionel, yet his Right was ſo indiſputable, that his Father, Roger Earl of March, was declar'd preſumptive Heir to Richard by an Act of Parliament. So that while they were puniſhing Richard for contravening the Laws of the Realm, the Parliament aſſum'd a Power to deprive a Prince of his legal Right, againſt whom there was no manner of Objection; and to diſpoſe of the Crown in favour of another, who had not a Right to it. This is not a place to examine whether the Parliament, at a time when there was no Precedent for it, at leaſt ſince the Conqueſt, had any better Right than the King to ſuperſede the Laws: All that I ſhall obſerve, is, that the Injuſtice done upon this occaſion to the Earl of March, was the only Source of thoſe Civil Wars, with which the Kingdom was afterwards afflicted.

The principal Acts relating to Domeſtick Affairs in the Seventh Volume of the Fœdera, and the beginning of the Eighth are theſe, Edw. III's Death. P. 151.

1. A MEMORANDUM of the Day of Edward III's Death, which happen'd on Sunday, June 21, 1377, in his Palace at Sheen, now call'd Richmond.

Richard's Coronation. P. 157.

2. THE Order obſerv'd in the Coronation of Richard II. July 16, 1377[a].

THO' this is the firſt Coronation, at which Hiſtory makes mention of a Champion going into Weſtminſter-Hall, upon theſe Solemnities, to defy all Oppoſers of the King's Titles; yet it is to be obſerv'd, that there's nothing like it in this Order, which is in other reſpects very circumſtantial[b].

King's Marriage Treaty with a Daughter of Milan. P. 213.

3. A FULL Power to treat of the King's Marriage with a Daughter of Barnabas, Duke of Milan: Dated March 18, 1379[c]. But the Treaty did not proceed.

Commiſſioners of Inquiry into the Management of the Revenues. P. 250.

Another of the King's Marriage Treaties. P. 257.

5. A FULL Power to treat of the King's Marriage with Catherine of Bavaria, Daughter to the Emperor Lewis deceas'd: 'Tis dated June 12, 1380[e]; but it ſucceeded no better than his Treaty with the Milaneſe Lady.

6. THE King's Treaty of Marriage with Anne of Luxemburg, Siſter to the Emperor Wenceſlaus[f], dated May 2, 1381[g]. 'Tis remarkable that in the Marriage Articles, there's not the leaſt mention of what Dowry the future Queen was to bring with her; and that on the contrary, Richard lent 20,000 Florins to the Emperor his Brother-in-law.

RICHARD II.

His Marriage with the Emperor's Siſter. P. 290.

7. AN Order for adjourning the Courts of Judicature, upon account of Wat Tyler's Inſurrection: Dated June 15, 1381[h]. This Date ſhews that the Rebellion began much about that time.

8. A PROCLAMATION to inform the People, that the Rebels did not act by the Conſent or Orders of the King, as they boaſted: 'Tis dated June 23, 1381[i]. The Rebels probably miſtook the King's Meaning, when he told them upon the Death of Wat Tyler, that he wou'd be their General.

Proclamation againſt the Rebels. P. 315.

9. A REVOCATION of the Charter and the Amneſty granted to the Rebels during their Rebellion, becauſe thoſe Acts were diſpatch'd without mature Deliberation: Dated July 2, 1381[k].— This Date ſhews that the Inſurrection did not laſt above a Fortnight.

12. THE Amneſty granted to the Rebels at the Intreaty of the future Queen: Dated December 13, 1381[o].

Amneſty for the Rebels. P. 337.

13. THE Grant of a yearly Penſion of 1000 l. Sterling to Leon King of Armenia: Dated February 3, 1386[p].

King of Armenia's Penſion. P. 494.

14. WHEN, towards the cloſe of the Year 1387, the Army of the Confederate Lords was advanc'd near London[q], the King promis'd to ſatisfy them in the next Parliament; and for that end he iſſued his Writs for electing the Members, in which he had inſerted this Clauſe, Eligi faciatis duos Milites gladiis cinctos magis idoneos & diſcretos (& in debatis modernis magis indifferentes) directing the Sheriffs to chuſe two Knights for each County, who were diſcreet Men duly qualified, but ſuch as were Neuter in the modern Diſputes. [a] This diſcovers a Miſtake in the Compleat Hiſtory of England, which places the Coronation on the 16th of June, five Days before the Death of Edward III.

[b] The true Origin of this Cuſtom which is kept up to this Day, is not known; but Mr. Rapin in his Hiſtory, ſeems very ſure that 'tis more antient than the Coronation of Richard II. becauſe Sir John Dimmock, who perform'd the Office of Champion at that Time, was admitted into it by virtue of a Prerogative annex'd to ſome Land which he had in Lincolnſhire. Probably the Lords did not mean that the Deputies ſhould be Perſons indifferent; or perhaps they were afraid leſt this Clauſe ſhould give the Sheriffs a liberty of Chicanery in the Affair of Elections. The King's Order for leaving the words above mention'd out of his Writ, is dated January 1, 1388 [a].

Orders for apprehending Judge Treſilian, Brambre, the Duke of Ireland, and the Earl of Suffolk. P. 566, 567.

The Grant is dated March 2, 1390 [g].

[k] This Warden was Sir Edward Dalyngrugge, who being thought too favourable to the Citizens, was quickly remov'd, and Sir Baldwin Radington, a Perſon of a rougher Temper, put in his Place, who by his prudent Conduct pleas'd both the King and City. It appears by the Account we have of this Reign in the Compleat Hiſtory of England, Vol. I. and in that call'd the Life and Reign of King Richard II. compil'd by the Perſon of Quality formerly mention'd, and from the Accounts of Knighton and Walſingham, that the Biſhop of Salisbury having an old grudge againſt the Citizens, who where generally reckon'd Favourites of Wickliff's Doctrine, took the Opportunity of the Riot we mention'd in Page 190, to ſtimulate and heighten the King's Diſpleaſure againſt the City to ſuch a degree that he threaten'd to raze it to the Ground; but at the Mediation of ſome of the Nobility, he ſent for the Mayor, Sheriffs, Aldermen, and 24 others of the ableſt Citizens to his Court, then held at Nottingham; where impeaching one another in hopes to curry favour with the King, the Mayor was committed to Windſor-Caſtle, and the reſt to other Jails. Mean time the Queen, the Duke of Glouceſter, the Biſhop of London, and other Perſons of Diſtinction, interceeding with the King heartily for the City, he was ſo pacify'd, that he ſet out for London, being met from the City by 400 Men on horſeback, clad all in one Livery, an innumerable Multitude on foot, a ſolemn Proceſſion of the Clergy, and 500 Boys in Surplices, the Balconies being hung with Tapeſtry and Pictures, the Conduits flowing with Wine, &c. Beſides, they preſented the King with a Crown of Gold of great Value, and another of the ſame Metal to the Queen, together with a Picture of the Trinity worth 800 l. and ſeveral other great Gifts; by which Means they obtain'd all their old Privileges: but after all this they were forc'd to pay 10,000*l.* or elſe they muſt have ventur'd the Effects of the King's freſh Diſpleaſure. The Biſhop of London, who had ſuch a great hand in the Reconciliation, was not only highly honour'd by the Citizens all his Life, but after his Death, the Mayor, Aldermen, and Companies, made nine Proceſſions a Year to Weſtminſter, where he lay bury'd, to pray for his Soul. Mr. Rapin obſerves that Richard liv'd to repent his ſevere Treatment of this City, by which he entirely loſt the Citizens Hearts, who afterwards convinc'd him how dangerous it is for a King of England to have that Metropolis for his Enemy.

[o] The King took her Death ſo much to heart, that he curſed Sheen near Richmond where ſhe died, wou'd never come there, and order'd the Palace to be demoliſh'd. 'Tis ſaid ſhe was a Favourer of Wickliff's Doctrine, and was a Princeſs of very great Virtue and Piety. She was magnificently bury'd at Weſtminſter, Auguſt 3.

[r] Tho' the Duke had at a great Expence juſt purchas'd the Hearts of the Gaſcons, yet he paid a punctual Obedience to his Recall, and was receiv'd, if not with Love, yet at leaſt with a ſhew of Honour by the King; and after a ſhort ſtay at Court, obtain'd his Leave to retire to his Houſe at Lincoln, where he marry'd the Lady Catherine Swinford, who was his Miſtreſs even in his Wife's time, and had by her two Sons and a Daughter.

In this Order the King acquainted the Archbiſhop that the Duke had confeſs'd all his Crimes before his Death, and that his Confeſſion had been laid before the Parliament: But 'tis very like that ſuch a Parliament as that was, took the matter upon Truſt, without giving themſelves much trouble of Inquiry whether the Confeſſion was genuine.

THESE two Orders, which were iſſued upon the Road, as they were conducting Richard to London, ſeem to have been levell'd againſt his own Party.

VII. Affairs of the Church.

THE Reader may judge of the State of Church-Affairs in this Reign, by the Accounts given of them in the former Reigns, becauſe the ſame Differences ſtill ſubſiſted between the two Courts of Rome and England. All the conſequence of the Schiſm, with reſpect to England, was, that Urban VI. to whom England adher'd, obſerv'd a little more Decorum than his Predeceſſors; but in the main acted in the ſame manner as they did.

THO' Edward III. had accommodated his Difference with Gregory XI. this Agreement, as was obſerv'd heretofore, only conſiſted, on the part of the Pope, in certain general Terms, which were capable of various Explanations, according to the neceſſity of the Times. And it appears from ſeveral Paſſages in the Seventh Tome of the Fœdera, that the King underſtood that Agreement in one ſenſe, and the Pope in another; and conſequently the ſame Pretenſions ſubſiſted on both ſides.

FOEDERA Tom. VII.

Usurpations of the Court of Rome.

DURING the Reign of Richard II. the Parliament made ſeveral Statutes againſt the Proviſions of Rome, againſt Reſervations, the Bulls of Reverſion term'd Expectativæ, and againſt Foreigners who held Benefices in this Kingdom. But the Pope went on ſtill in his old Career; and after a little diſpute, which ſometimes ſubjected him to Reproaches that were pretty harſh, he always came off with Victory. He put his Creatures into Biſhopricks, ſometimes by reſerving to himſelf the Collation to ſuch as ſhou'd happen to be vacant by the Tranſlation of a Biſhop to another See, ſometimes by the Death of a Biſhop at his Court, and at other times on pretences of a different nature; and when thoſe fail'd him, he nevertheleſs aſſum'd a Right of filling up ſuch Benefices, on pretence that his zeal wou'd not ſuffer him to let Churches be long deſtitute of a Paſtor.

'TIS certain, that if the King had taken due care to have the Acts of Parliament put in execution, he wou'd have been ſupported by all his People, and the Court of Rome muſt, at laſt, have quitted their hold. But as it often happen'd that the King was for electing Perſons who were not acceptable to the Chapters, at ſuch times, for fear that the Electors wou'd thwart him, he apply'd to the Pope, who ſeldom fail'd to favour him, in order to eſtabliſh his own Right at the ſame time. In this ſeventh Tome of the Fœdera we find ſeveral Licences granted by the King to ſollicit Proviſions and Reverſions to Benefices at the Court of Rome, others to enter into the poſſeſſion of Benefices conferr'd by the Pope, contrary to the Laws of the Realm; ſome to Foreigners to take poſſeſſion of Benefices in England, and others to Engliſhmen to farm the Benefices of Foreigners; and all this contrary to expreſs Acts of Parliament. Theſe things conſider'd, the King aggravated the Conſequences of ſuch Abuſes but with an ill Grace, becauſe he himſelf paved the way for them.

Sect of Lollards.

THERE are in this Tome ſeveral Acts relating to the Sect of Wickliffites, commonly call'd Lollards[a], which ſpread very much in this Reign; but properly ſpeaking, they are only Orders tending to cruſh it.

Pope Urban's Croiſado againſt Clement III.

A CROISADO which Urban VI. publiſh'd againſt Clement III. his Competitor, and of which the Biſhop of Norwich was declared General, gave occaſion likewiſe to ſome Acts which are of little Importance.

Friers Mendicant expos'd.

DURING this Reign the Mendicant Friers were ſeverely attack'd by divers Perſons who endeavour'd to turn their affected Poverty into Ridicule. Among others, a certain Archbiſhop of Armagh preach'd againſt them in London, and did them a world of prejudice both by his Books, and Sermons. They complain'd to the King of the Malice of their Enemies, and obtain'd ſeveral Orders from him in their favour.

SOME of the Acts relating to theſe matters, follow.

Foreign Friers expell'd. P. 180.

6. URBAN making an ill uſe of his pretended Right to confer all the Benefices of England, the King wrote a Remonſtrance to him that he broke the Agreement which had been made with Gregory XI. We have here the Pope's Anſwer eluding that Charge; by ſaying, that for the preſent he has not that Agreement in his hands, but that 'till he can get it, he conſents that there be no Innovation. Nevertheleſs he maintain'd himſelf in the Prerogative of conferring Benefices[g].

Complaint against the Court of Rome. P. 672.

14. A Letter from the King and the Nobility to the Pope, relating to the horrid Abuses of the Court of Rome, in the Collation to Benefices. Dated May 26, 1390[b].

The following is a Passage in that Letter, which shews the Substance of the Complaint; and how much the English were provok'd at the Treatment they met with from the Court of Rome.

Immo quod a seculis inauditum est, Humanæ Artis industria tantum didicit Avaritiâ Famulari, ut si fortè unicam Ecclesiam Cathedralem vacare sex aut quinque Translationes sedum Episcopalium continuo celebrantur, non ut de Virtute sit transitus in Virtutem, sed potius, ut saliat uberius qui salit altius, & Imago Cæsaris in Domum Domini multiplicite, sed tamen abominabiliter transferatur.

Cæterum, in tantum processit Provisionis & Reservationis Abusio, quod Dignitates Ecclesiasticæ Regni nostri, & pinguiora Beneficia, curata & non curata, Alienigenis conferuntur, interdum fortassis nobis feraliter Inimicis, & aliis nunquam residentibus, nec residere valentibus in eisdem, qui Linguam non intelligunt, nec cognoscunt oves suas, nec a suis ovibus cognoscuntur.

i. e. "Insomuch that it has not been "known for Ages past, that the Industry "of human Art was ever so subservient to "Avarice as now, when upon a Vacancy, "perhaps of but one See, there are five or "six Translations from one Bishoprick to "another, not as a Transit from one Virtue "to a higher, but rather from one See to a "richer; whereby the Image of Cæsar is "transferr'd, and abominably multiply'd "in the House of the Lord.

"Moreover, the Abuse of Provisions "and Reservations is grown to such a head, "that the Ecclesiastical Dignities of our "Kingdom, and the fatter Benefices, whe-"ther with or without Cure of Souls, are "conferr'd upon Foreigners, sometimes on "such as are, perhaps, our deadly Enemies; "and upon others never residing, nor ca-"pable to reside therein, as not under-"standing our Language: by which means "they know not their Sheep, nor do the "Flocks know their Shepherds."

Richard II.

This Letter is full of such Complaints, and such too as are couch'd in very strong Terms, which nevertheless were of no effect.

King's Subjects at Rome call'd home. P. 698.

15. An Order to all the King's Subjects, who were at the Pope's Court solliciting Benefices, to return to England by such a time; dated May the 3d, 1391[c].

16. An Order to expel the Lollards from the University of Oxford; dated July the 18th, 1395[d].

17. Another of the same Date to the University to examine Wickliff's Book, intitled Trialogus.

University order'd to enquire into the Schism between the Popes. P. 62.

18. Another to the same University to inquire into the Affair of the Schism between the Popes, as a Foundation for an Answer to the Letters on that Subject from the King of France. We find it in the Eighth Tome of the Fœdera, dated November the 2d, 1398[e].

A Note upon the general usefulness of the Fœdera.

Before I pass to the next Tome of the Fœdera, I think fit to acquaint the Reader, that tho' I have consider'd this Collection in no other Light than as it relates to History, which was apparently the chief View of those who had the care of publishing it, yet it is useful in divers other respects: For example, as to Treaties of Peace or Truce, of which there's a vast number in this valuable Collection, publick Ministers may derive Benefit from it, not only with respect to the Form of such Treaties, but also with regard to the Choice of proper Terms, to the Precautions taken to explain them justly, and to several other things of this nature. On the other hand, if any curious Person has a mind to make Inquiries into the Progress of the French Tongue, he may herein meet with Helps for such a Scrutiny, from a Multitude of Acts written in that Language, ever since the Reign of Henry I. In fine, there's so great a Variety of Acts of all kinds in the Collection before us, that it cannot be doubted but every ingenious Man will be the better for it one way or other, according to the different Views with which Persons may be prompted to consult it.

The Reign of HENRY IV.

Henry IV.

Foedera Tom. VIII.

The Eighth Tome contains a vast number of Acts relating to the Reign of Henry IV. of which, tho' there are but few that are curious, and deserve a particular Account, yet they may be of some Use, with respect to the Dates of Times and Places for the Illustration of the History of England *.

After Henry IV. had taken such an extraordinary Leap to the Throne, he always took care to avoid as much as possible any War with his Neighbours. The great number of Malecontents in his Kingdom, and the frequent Conspiracies that were form'd against his Person and Government, gave him Employment enough at home. Moreover, he had reason to fear that Foreign Wars would encourage the Designs of his domestick Enemies. Therefore the principal Events of this Reign are domestick, and may be divided into two Articles.

The

* Mr. Rymer gave this general Account of it in his Dedication to Queen Anne; which it must be observ'd was written in the Year 1709, a time when every body remembers, that the Pretender to our Crown was so publickly supported, as he has been since abandon'd, by a Neighbour Nation, now our good Friend and Ally against him and all his Abettors: Therefore no candid Reader will be offended at the Parallel herein drawn by the British Historiographer, however harsh it may sound at this day.

FOEDERA Tom. VIII.

THE first relates to the Conspiracies of the English against the King; the second to the Rebellion of the Welch. Tho' the Quarrels which this Prince had with his Neighbours were not very considerable, yet it may be necessary to give some account of his Disputes with Scotland, France, and Bretagne; and to this we shall add a sixth Article of Affairs relating to the Church or Religion, in order to preserve the Thread of the History.

Domestick Affairs.

Henry IV's Accession the Source of many Civil Wars.

As the Advancement of Henry IV. to the Throne was the Source and Foundation of those Civil Wars with which England was for a long time disturb'd, 'tis of importance to pause a little upon this Subject, for two principal Reasons. In the first place, it would not be easy for the Reader to understand what will be said hereafter in our Accounts of those Wars, if he has not a distinct and clear Idea of this Matter beforehand. And in the second place, such an Explanation may be of use to shew the Reasons of that Prince's Conduct, which is the Subject of the Acts contain'd in this Eighth Tome.

IT has been already observ'd, that Richard II. deliver'd himself up to Henry Duke of Hereford and Lancaster, and that he carried him to London, and committed him to the Tower. This done, the victorious Duke was not a little perplex'd what Course to take to attain to the Crown. He had several Councils upon this head with his Friends, who unanimously agreed that Richard must be depos'd. This was the first necessary Step. And that Prince was so very ill belov'd by his People, that no body doubted it might be done with ease.

His Right to the Crown question'd.

But notwithstanding Richard was depos'd, the Crown did not rightfully devolve to the Duke of Lancaster, because he had a nearer Heir, viz. Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, whose Father had been declar'd presumptive Successor to Richard by an Act of Parliament. This Edmund was descended from Lionel Duke of Clarence, second Son to Edward III. whereas Henry was descended from John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Lionel's younger Brother. 'Tis true, that Edmund was only descended from Lionel by the Mother's side, viz. Philippa, who was Lionel's Daughter, and he was also by one degree more remote than Henry: yet notwithstanding this, his Right was indisputable. The English had not only no such Law as the Salic Law, but even in the Reign of Edward III. they had produc'd all the Proofs possible, to demonstrate that the said Law did not extend to the Male-Descendants of Females. Consequently, to alledge in favour of the Duke of Lancaster, that he was the nearest Heir-Male descended from the Males, was to destroy the very Foundation upon which Edward III. had made War with France, and in some measure to give up the Pretensions which his Posterity might form to that Kingdom. Therefore it was absolutely necessary to find out some other Expedient for placing Henry upon the Throne.

HENRY IV.

AMONG those who assisted in his secret Councils, was Edward Duke of York, fourth Son to Edmund III. and Uncle both to Richard and Henry. This Duke Edmund, who in the confusion of Richard's Affairs had espous'd the Interest of the Duke of Lancaster, gave advice which was unanimously approv'd, but he did not foresee how prejudicial it would be to his Posterity. He said, that it was absolutely necessary in the first place, to oblige Richard to resign the Crown, as unworthy to wear it; but that this Resignation ought not to be made in favour of the Duke of Lancaster, for fear it should carry too great an Appearance of Extortion: That upon such a general Resignation the Parliament should proceed to depose Richard; and that then the said Assembly being thus vested with supreme Authority, should chuse the Duke of Lancaster, without making any mention of the Earl of March.

THE

"This, the Eighth Volume which you give the World, contains, within a small compass of time, a wonderful "Variety and Vicissitude of Affairs.

"The beginning gives some Glimpses of a Change to ensue in England; and towards the end it discovers the "likely Prospect of a Revolution in France.

"That People, whose Humour it has always been to be troublesome to their Neighbours, now that Henry the "Fourth, your Majesty's most noble Progenitor, is upon the Throne, make their usual Efforts to annoy and give "disturbance in all parts of his Dominions.

"And to perform some Feats of an extraordinary Figure, they hit upon a new Device, of forging Kings, and "making counterfeit Princes.

"In North-Britain is idoliz'd that Phantom of a King, Thomas of Trumpyngton.

"And Owen Glendourdy, that Impostor of a Prince, is set up to play the Mimick in Wales.

"And so it was that this Pretender had the Honour to enter into a League offensive and defensive with the then French "King; a League transacted with all the Solemnity and Equipage of their reciprocal Ambassadors and Credentials.

"And undoubtedly the French were not wanting on occasion to support this their new Confederate, their trusty "Ally, Owen Glendourdy.

"But so far from Success were these Machinations of the Enemy, that, not long after, we see the most eminent "amongst them sue to this very King Henry the Fourth for his Protection.

"Of which number are the Duke of Berry, the Duke of Orleans, and the Duke of Bourbon; they own this Henry "the Fourth for their Lord and Sovereign, do him Homage, and become his Vassals.

"And now it is, most redoubted Sovereign, now it is that the English Troops pell-mell enter France, and "but one Battel remains betwixt them and Paris.

"For now indeed were the Dispositions made, and Operations concerted, which afterwards are accomplish'd, "and have effect under Henry the Fifth, in the Eighth Year of his Reign.

"Besides the Traverses of War, which are very extraordinary, Treaties of Marriage, may it please your Majesty, "make the most shining part of this Volume.

"Philippa of Lancaster is marry'd to Erycus King of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, and Duke of Pomerania: "And this is done more than ten Years before this King Erycus is discover'd, or brought to appear in History.

"Here also is negotiated, by the Emperor Robert, that Palatine Match betwixt his Son Lewis and Blanche our "King's Daughter, with a noble Train of GERMAN PRINCES attending the Ceremony.

"From which Marriage are descended the Palatine Family, to this Day so much the Support and Ornament of "the German Nation."

FOEDERA Tom VIII.

THE Undertakers of such an Experiment as this, ought to have been very sure of the Members of Parliament, because the thing in view was to determine them to an Action contrary to the Laws and Customs of the Realm, in an Affair of the greatest Importance. But this was no very difficult Task, as Affairs then stood. The Parliament was assembled in the Name of Richard, though this Prince was at that very time in the hands of the Duke of Lancaster. 'Tis natural to suppose, that the Majority of the Members were not the most hearty Friends to this unfortunate Prince. Moreover, the English in general were mightily satisfy'd with the Revolution that had happen'd, and consequently could not but be in a fit Temper to own the important Service, which the Duke of Lancaster had so lately done them. This was actually a great Point gain'd in Henry's favour; but this was not the only advantage: For he had almost all the great Men in his Interest. He had but a small number of the Lords against him, who were Richard's Favourites, but having lost their Influence in the Torrent of that Prince's Misfortunes, were by no means a match for the others. Moreover, Henry had 60,000 Men in Arms at his beck, who had join'd him at his Landing, and accompanied him ever since. Therefore there was not the least reason to imagine there would be any considerable number in the House of Commons, so closely attach'd to the Laws and Customs of the Realm, as to presume to dispute Henry's Pretensions, how ill grounded soever they were. We find every day that too many Members of that Body are wholly determined by Events, and fond to list themselves with the Favourites of Fortune. In a word, the Earl of March had not interest enough to form a Party strong enough to cope with the Duke, or to urge the Benefit of the Act of Parliament, which was made in favour of his Father.

Richard's Resignation and Deposition.

ACCORDING to the Resolution taken in the secret Conferences above-mentioned, Richard II. by a Writing under his own Hand, confessed himself unworthy of the Crown; and upon that Confession, the Parliament deposed him. After this, the Throne being vacant, the Duke of Lancaster stood up in the Assembly, and demanded the Crown. What he said to support his Pretensions was so obscure, that it was hard to guess at his meaning: But this Obscurity was altogether affected. It was absolutely necessary that the People should believe he had actually a Right to the Crown; but it was by no means necessary to explain what that Right was, too distinctly. As to the Parliament, 'tis well known they were content to have a Mist cast before their Eyes. Therefore Henry alledged, in the first place, that he was Heir to the eldest Branch of the House of Lancaster, which descended from a Son of Henry III. By this means he proposed to give weight to a certain Report, which was industriously spread among the ignorant People, that the said Branch had been unjustly deprived of the Crown. It was said, that of two Sons whom Henry III. left behind him, viz. Edward I. and Edmund Earl of Lancaster, surnamed Crouchback; the latter was the eldest, but that by reason of his Deformity, Edward his Brother was preferred before him. This was a Supposition so notoriously false, that 'tis surprizing that Henry would give any room to imagine he founded his Title upon it. In the second place, he said, that he grounded his Demand upon the Right he had received from God, by the Assistance of his Kindred and Friends, to recover the Kingdom, which was on the very Brink of Ruin; Expressions, which 'tis no easy matter to come at the meaning of. The truth is, that this Prince was very much embarassed. He was willing to ascend the Throne with the Approbation of the Parliament; and yet he would not have it look as if the Parliament had adjudged the Crown to him as an Act of Favour or Reward, for fear, lest the Grant should at one time or other be called in question. Therefore his Aim was to leave it in a manner undecided by what means he came to the Crown. The Parliament, who was before-hand disposed to do every thing that this Prince would have them, made as if they heard and approved his Reasons, and declared him King, without inquiring into his Title.

Henry's Proclamation.

ON the very Day that Henry was crowned, he put forth a Proclamation, which was worded in Terms less ambiguous than those he made use of at his Demand of the Crown. He said, that he came to the Throne, 1. By Right of Conquest: 2. Because Richard II. had resign'd the Crown to him: And, 3. Because he was the next Male Heir *. But all the three Allegations were equally invalid and false. For, first, it was not true that he had conquered England; for as he came over with no more than fourscore Men, it was the English themselves who had supported and enabled him to put his Designs in execution. Secondly, Richard did not resign the Crown to him, as has been already observ'd. Besides, how could a Prince, who had declar'd himself unworthy and unable to wear the Crown, be acknowledg'd to have a Right to dispose of it? And in the third Reason which he gave, there was a double Entendre, which could not but blind those who were before-hand resolv'd not to see, viz. In the word Heir, which he confounded with the Term, neareſt a-kin. In the present case Regard ought to have been had to the Branch, and not to the Degree of Consanguinity. Edmund Mortimer came from the second Branch Branch of Edward III. whereas Henry was a Deſcendant of the third Branch. So that tho' Henry was actually nearer related to Richard than the Earl of March, it did not follow that he was his next Heir. He could not in juſtice have claim'd preference to the Earl, unleſs there had been a Law in England like the Salic Law, to exclude Females and their Deſcendants from the Crown. But even tho' the Succeſſion were to have been regulated according to the Degree of Conſanguinity, Henry could not have claim'd Precedency before the Duke of York his Uncle, who was ſtill living. Therefore the Pleas which this Prince made uſe of, had no good Foundation, while he neglected the only one that he might have produced with any colour, which was his Election by Parliament. If he had ſtuck to this Plea, probably he would have had none of the ſe Conſpiracies which were form'd againſt him, during almoſt the whole courſe of his Reign. But ſince he refuſed to acknowledge, that he ow'd his Advancement to the Throne, to the People of England, no wonder that ſo many reckoned him no better than an Uſurper.

Act of Parl. excluding the Female Line from the Succeſſion.

THESE Conſpiracies ſo convinc'd him, that the People were not ſatisfy'd of his Right to the Crown, that he endeavour'd to make them eaſy by a new Method. In 1404, he obtained of the Parliament, by what means I know not, an Act for excluding the Females, and their Deſcendants, from the Succeſſion to the Crown. His Aim was to give the People to underſtand, that he had aſcended to the Throne agreeably to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm, which this Statute ſeem'd to acknowledge and confirm. But this Act continued in force no longer than the end of this Year; for the Parliament was ſo ſenſible of the Injuſtice and ill Conſequences of it, that they repeal'd it, and made another for re-inſtating the Females in their Birth-right. Nevertheleſs, they did not repeal the Act which was made in the firſt Year of this Reign, for ſettling the Succeſſion in the Houſe of Lancaſter. This made it apparent, that the Parliament was ſenſible of the Injuſtice which had been done to the Earl of March, and at the ſame time, that the Crown had been adjudg'd to Henry, by an Act of ſupreme Authority, as a Reward for the Service he had done to the Kingdom. This was the real caſe, as to Henry the Fourth's Advancement to the Throne of England. The Reader may, if he pleaſe, examine it by the Rules of Law, and ſee the utmoſt Extent to which the Authority of Parliament may be carried in ſome Caſes; for I don't propoſe to determine the Queſtion myſelf. I ſhall only add, that afterwards the Duke of York's Poſterity was concern'd in Intereſt to ſubvert the Foundation upon which that Duke built his Opinion and Advice, I mean a Parliamentary Power that is boundleſs and lawleſs. Richard Earl of Cambridge, his ſecond Son, having afterwards married a Siſter of the Earl of March, left a Son of the ſame Name, who was Duke of York; and becoming Heir of the Family of March, diſputed with Henry the Fourth's Grandſon for the Crown. And from hence ſprung thoſe Civil Wars betwixt the two Families of Lancaſter and York, of which we ſhall have occaſion to take notice hereafter.

HENRY IV.

I hope no Reader will be offended that I have dwelt ſo long upon this Subject, which was the Foundation of a great many important Events, tho' the Acts in this eighth Tome of the Fœdera have but little relation to them.

LET us now take a view of the moſt conſiderable Tranſactions of England, with reſpect to domeſtick Affairs, from the time that Henry the Fourth was placed upon the Throne, to his Death.

THE Earl of March perceiving which way Affairs were going, retired to his Eſtate at Wigmore, on the Frontiers of Wales, for fear leſt the new King ſhould be jealous of him, if he ſtaid at Court.

ONE Act of Injuſtice is commonly followed with a Train of others. The Parliament not content with the Favour done to Henry, extended it alſo to his Deſcendants, by ſettling the Succeſſion to the Throne in his Family. This done, they condemn'd Richard to perpetual Impriſonment, without hearing him in his own Defence, and without examining Witneſſes. Thomas Merks, Biſhop of Carliſle, did all he could to ward off this Sentence by a long and labour'd Speech, which he made upon the Subject; but it was of no effect. And ſo deaf was the Parliament to all his Arguments, that they made an Order, that if there happened any Commotion in favour of the depoſed King, he ſhould be the firſt Man that ſhould die for it. This was, properly ſpeaking, no leſs than a Sentence of Death itſelf upon him, becauſe his Life depended on a Condition, the Obſervation of which was not at all in his power.

Richard impriſon'd for his Life.

THE ſame thing happened to Richard II. as to Edward II. his Great Grandfather; while he was upon the Throne the Engliſh hated him, and when he was in no condition to hurt them, their Hatred changed into Pity. The People had earneſtly long'd to be delivered from his Tyranny, and they thought every means try'd for this end good and lawful. But when their Paſſions were a little cool'd, and they perceived, that under colour of revenging the Breach of the Laws, they were trampled under foot, they entertain'd quite other Sentiments; for indeed, what could they think when they ſaw Richard depos'd and ſentenc'd to perpetual Impriſonment, or rather Death itſelf, without the Formalities that are moſt indiſpenſably neceſſary in the Proceedings againſt the meaneſt Subjects? One of the principal Crimes laid to his charge, was his having put his Uncle the Duke of of Glouceſter to death, without trying him according to Law. And yet this Prince himſelf is puniſh'd without Examination, and upon no other Evidence than common Fame. In a word, could the People believe that there was a ſincere Deſign to maintain the Laws of the Land when no manner of Regard was had to Law, in ſuch a capital Point too as the Succeſſion of the Crown? Theſe Conſiderations made ſuch an Impreſſion upon a great number of Engliſhmen, that from that time it was viſible in many Inſtances, that they were ſorry that Richard was ever oppreſs'd. From hence proceeded all thoſe Conſpiracies againſt Henry, of which we ſhall by and by give an Account. On the other hand, all thoſe Plots made the King ſo careful to preſerve himſelf upon the Throne, that he, as it were, abandon'd all other Cares for that. But by his uſing Severity rather than Clemency to keep the Crown on his Head, he render'd himſelf ſo odious to his Subjects, that his Reign was one continued Series of domeſtic Troubles, which adding continual Fewel to his Suſpicions and Jealouſy, made him always uneaſy. The Clergy were the only Body in the Nation that always ſtood by him for Reaſons that ſhall be mention'd hereafter. Otherwiſe perhaps this Prince would have had the ſame Fate as his Predeceſſor.

Henry's Character.

Conſpiracy againſt him.

IN the beginning of the Year 1400, that is to ſay about three Months after Henry was plac'd upon the Throne, there was a terrible Conſpiracy againſt him. His firſt Couſin the Duke of Albemarle, eldeſt Son to the Duke of York, his Brother-in-law the Duke of Exeter, the Duke of Surrey, the Earls of Huntington, Salisbury and Glouceſter, the Biſhop of Carliſle, the Abbot of Weſtminſter, and ſeveral other Lords laid a Plot to kill him at Oxford, at a Tournament to which they had invited him. Their Conſpiracy having miſcarry'd by an unforeſeen Accident, and by the Imprudence of the Duke of Albemarle, who was under a Neceſſity to diſcover it to the King; the Conſpirators reſolv'd to take Arms, and pull off the Mask. As they knew how the People ſtood affected, they dreſs'd Magdalen, one of Richard's domeſtic Servants, and who very much reſembled his Maſter, in Royal Robes, and gave it out that Richard had made his eſcape from Priſon. No ſooner was this Picture of Richard exhibited to the publick view, but the People flock'd to their Colours with ſuch haſte, that in a few Days they amounted to 40,000 Men. They narrowly miſs'd ſurprizing the King at Windſor *. After this Miſcarriage they were afraid to go and attack the King, who waited for them upon Hounſlow-Heath with 20,000 Men: and to avoid meeting him, they reſolv'd to retire towards Wales, which was very well diſpos'd in Richard's Favour; and they encamp'd at the Gates of Cirenceſter. Four of them who were the Ringleaders, viz. the Dukes of Surrey and Exeter, and the Earls of Salisbury and Glouceſter, had the Imprudence to go and lodge in two Inns of that Town, without the Security of a Guard, which they thought needleſs, ſo long as their Army was incamp'd in the Suburbs. The Mayor of the Town, taking advantage of their Supineneſs, ſurpriz'd them in the Night-time, took two of them and immediately cut off their Heads: The two others, who made a ſhift to get off, went to rejoin the Army, but found all their Troops diſpers'd by a Pannic, which was owing to the Noiſe they heard in the Town; ſo that theſe two Lords were alſo taken, and had the ſame Fate as their Companions. The Biſhop of Carliſle was likewiſe apprehended, and condemn'd to die; but the King gave him his Life out of reſpect to his Character. Thus was this Conſpiracy ſuppreſs'd more by good Fortune, than by the King's Cunning.

HENRY IV.

THIS being a plain Intimation to Henry that he was not ſafe as long as Richard was living, he caus'd him to be put to death in Pontefract Caſtle, where he was a Priſoner. His Corpſe was carry'd barefac'd to Langley-Abbey in Buckinghamſhire, and there interr'd without any Pomp †.

" a diſtance in the Hearts of King and People, that the attempting the Cure of the Diſeaſes that ſprung " from the Infection of ambitious Miniſters, procur'd Calamities in the Redreſs; as Phyſicians preſcribe one " Diſeaſe as a Remedy for another, and to cure a Lethargy, the Patient muſt be driven into a Fever. King " Edward gave this Offence by his unlimited Favours to Gaveſton and the Spenſers; King Richard to the " Duke of Ireland and Earl of Suffolk. And their violent driving all things into Extremes, was the Fall of " thoſe two unhappy Princes, who, when they had Power, ſhew'd no Moderation; and when they wanted " it, betray'd as much Dejection. Both theſe Princes in the Change of Fortune deny'd and granted too " much; and moſt commonly deny'd what they had granted, and granted what they had deny'd before; by " which they diſoblig'd in denying, and their Favours ſeem'd no Obligation when beſtow'd. The firſt was " look'd upon as a Deſign to injure their Subjects, and the laſt as a Fear of them.

" THEIR Reigns may juſtly be ſaid to be the Reigns of Favourites, who enervated all their Virtues, and " diſpos'd them to Looſeneſs and Careleſneſs, deafned and confounded them with Flatteries, and prompted " them to obſerve no Law but their Will, while they were the Diſpoſers of all things: At which many " great Men and others retir'd diſcontented, and left the Favourite Miniſters at large to purſue their Ambiti- " on, and with new Inventions to waſte and pillage the King's Revenues. This Deſcription ſuits with the " beginning of this unfortunate King Richard the Second, who by contrary Methods to what his Father and " Grandfather us'd, met as contrary Fortunes: The Comelineſs and Beauty of his Perſon (exceeding all his " Predeceſſors) only ſeem'd to entitle him to a generous Father, and as beautiful a Mother. But that promi- " ſing Perſon, which might have become great Actions, was turn'd to Looſeneſs and Pleaſures: And Flatte- " rers broke in to encourage that diſſolute Careleſneſs, which they found would be ſuitable to his Nature, " and their ambitious Deſigns. From the time that he aſſum'd the Government into his own Hands, he " grew liable to his own Errors, appearing wholly regardleſs of all his great Relations and Nobility, and " wholly poſſeſs'd by his Favourites: And being as violent in his Affections, as others could be in their Diſ- " pleaſures, he ſeldom regarded what others thought, 'till Neceſſity inforc'd the Conſideration; which ſhew'd " that even great Affections, when wrong plac'd, are unfortunate Virtues. As Edward II reſtor'd Gave- ſton from Baniſhment and his Subjects Hatred, to his Arms and Love; ſo this unfortunate King receiv'd " the Earl of Suffolk and the Duke of Ireland, the one from the Proſecution of his Parliament, and the other " from the Diſpleaſure of the People, to increas'd Affection and Truſt; after which they rais'd him by " Flattery above his Power, and ſharpen'd him by falſe Arguments to revenge their own Cauſe rather than " his. In moſt of his unhappy Actions he appear'd againſt himſelf and his own Reaſon; being turn'd " from his own Nature and Reaſon by his deſperate Miniſters, that wanted Senſe and Bowels; which " Unſteadineſs daily kindled Miſtruſts, the fruitful Nouriſhers of civil Miſchief. His Gifts, in the mean " time, to his Miniſters, were ſo large that they brought him into more Wants than ever the Wars " of his brave Anceſtors could reduce him to, and us'd more unjuſt Inventions to ſupply his private " Uſe, than they needed publick Aſſiſtances to ſupport the Intereſt and Honour of their Crown. In " his Troubles he was inſtructed by the want of Power to lament the attempting too much, and felt " ſeverely the want of that Truſt and Confidence which he had deſtroy'd. He had forc'd all his " People to be in the Nature of Traitors, and compell'd them to purchaſe as it were the Name of Sub- " jects; while there were none that ſeem'd ſo to him, but thoſe that needed Pardon the moſt, ſuch as had " counſell'd him to the Ruin that was fallen upon him. For he had been ſo long accuſtom'd to follow the " Advice of others, that he knew not the way to uſe his own, and had too long purſued the mean and eaſy " ways of Indirectneſs, ſo that he diſcharg'd his Army, as believing it impoſſible to recover Power after he " had us'd it ſo ill. He ſaw himſelf forſaken by thoſe he ſhould have forſook before; the very Men who had " ſo much flatter'd him with their exceſſive Love and Loyalty: And like thoſe mean Inſects which live with " a little Warmth, but ſhrink at any Change of Weather, They who had contributed to all his Errors in his " Proſperity, tranſplanted their Zeal into the new Sunſhine, as ſoon as his Succeſſor demanded the Crown. " When he reſign'd it, he appear'd moſt like a King: All that he did then was certainly from himſelf. He " was ſo calm in that Extremity, that he ſhew'd Virtue enough to make it evident, that he might have been " an excellent Prince, had not his Miniſters reign'd more than he. He acknowledg'd the Errors which his " Youth made ill Counſellors capable to imprint in him, and ſeem'd only troubled that he had not time al- " low'd to repair thoſe Injuries he had done the Nation. He perceiv'd his own Virtues, when the Vices of " others could no longer hide them; and he that once could have been ſo eaſily perſuaded, that he was ſhot " at thro' his wounded Miniſters, now ſaw that it was from them he had receiv'd his Wounds.

" SIR Robert, who relates the Particulars of his Murder by Sir Pierce Exton, and eight other Aſſaſſins, " ſays, that he ſlew four of them, and fought bravely with the reſt, 'till Exton got upon a Chair behind him, " and with a Pole-Ax ſtruck him down. From hence he remarks, that in the two greateſt Exigencies of " this Prince's Life he appear'd differing from himſelf, one in the Reſignation of his Crown, the other in the " Loſs of his Life; the firſt he did with a ſteady Calmneſs, almoſt above the Temper of a Man; the laſt " with a Courage equal to the braveſt. In ſmaller Concerns he ſeem'd unſteady and amaz'd, in theſe great " ones firm and unconcern'd. But in theſe Extremities he was not clogg'd with thoſe Favourites and Miniſters, " who influenc'd him with their Weakneſs, and ſhook his Mind with their Indirectneſs, making not only their " Cauſe to be his, but his Nature theirs. This ſeem'd juſtify'd by his Behaviour in theſe laſt and greateſt Extre- " mities; when acting wholly for himſelf, he intitled himſelf at laſt to his Grandfather's and Father's Courage " and Virtue, and ſhew'd himſelf dying, what his Minions never gave him leave to appear when living.

" To give a clearer View of the Parallel betwixt Edward II and Richard II, our Author ſums it up thus:

" THEY never appear'd Men 'till they were to be ſo no more. They never attempted true Glory, and " before they were Kings, gave little Teſtimony of their fitneſs to be ſo. They never appear'd able to judge, " but wholly ſubmitted to the intereſted Opinion of others. They were inconſtant in all Conditions; in " Proſperity bold and violent; in Danger fearful and temperate; their Promiſes were no Security, and Diſ- " ſimulation was their Policy. They were ſubmiſſive when oppos'd, and fierce when ſubmitted to. They " always abuſed the Tenderneſs of others, and ſeldom ſhew'd any of their own; never forgiving where " they had opportunity to puniſh. They neither had Power or Deſign to conquer Enemies, but us'd both to " overcome their Friends. Others were Maſters of them, and not they of themſelves; and thoſe that reſiſted " prov'd more fortunate than thoſe that ſubmitted. In Danger they depended on others to attempt for them, " and in Proſperity they gave no Rules of Virtue, but ſuffer'd the Vices of others to be their Examples. They " knew little how to get Power, and leſs how to uſe it. Chance ſometimes brought, and their giddy Favou- " rites loſt. They never ſeem'd inclin'd to make good Laws, and were always contriving to violate thoſe " that were made. They ſhew'd little skill how to gain, and as little how to preſerve, being adviſ'd to the " miſtaken Policy of neglecting Love, and to the Folly of abuſing Truſt. They had great Supplies, but " made no Purchaſes with them of Honour or Intereſt. What others beſtow'd for the publick Good, they " gave away to their private Favourites, and wanted more to ſupply their Avarice and Ambition, than Ed-

Supposition that Richard was alive, and had made his escape from Prison. Tho' nothing could be falser than such Reports, yet the Authors of them were persuaded that the spreading of them would be the right way to stir up the People: An evident Proof that the English in general were not pleas'd with the Treatment shewn to that Prince, nor with Henry's Advancement, tho' the Authority of the Parliament interven'd.

Continual plots against Henry, founded on a Report that Richard was still alive.

IN 1402 there was a Report all over the Kingdom, that Richard was alive in Scotland, just ready to enter England for the Recovery of the Crown; and in the Night-time several virulent Libels were pasted up in the High Streets of London, to back it. Sir Roger Clarendon, the natural Son of the famous Prince of Wales, was hang'd up, together with eight Monks, and a Doctor of Divinity, for justifying the Report. For Henry was so persuaded that he should get nothing by Clemency, that he never pardon'd those who conspir'd against him, or were convicted of spreading the false News that Richard was alive.

YET out of this Number must be excepted the Earl of Northumberland, of the Family of the Piercy's, whom he pardon'd. This Earl's Rebellion being the Subject of a considerable Part of the History of this Reign, we will just give a few of the Particulars.

History of the Earl of Northumberland.

HENRY Piercy Earl of Northumberland was Governour of the Northern Counties, towards the close of Richard the Second's Reign. Not long before that Prince set out on his last Journey for Ireland, he sent an express Order to this Earl, to come and meet him, by reason of some suspicions he had entertain'd against him. Whether this Lord had already been practising with the Duke of Lancaster, who was then at Paris, or whatever else was the Reason, he desired to be excus'd from obeying the King, on pretence that his Presence was necessary in the Countries of which he had the Government. Upon this refusal Richard declar'd him a Traitor, by a Proclamation, and confiscated all his Estate. Piercy being provoked at this Treatment, was the first that went to join Henry, when he landed at Ravenspur; and it is very probable that he was of the number, and perhaps the chief of those who had invited him to come into England. However that was, by his readiness to declare for him, he drew all the rest of the Kingdom into the same Resolution. He was also one of those who took the most Pains to place the Crown upon his Head; which important Services did not go without their Reward: For as soon as Henry was proclaim'd, he confirm'd him in the Government of the Northern Counties, and made him High Constable of England. [The Patent for this Purpose is dated September 30, 1399, at Westminster.] Not many Days after, he made him a Present of the Isle of Man: And the Earl of Northumberland on his Part, was so attach'd to the King's Interest and Person, that he look'd upon him as the most loyal Made High Constable of England. p. 89.

" ward I, and Edward III, did to enlarge the Nation's Glory. The private Conquests the Favourites made " over the former, were more chargeable than the Victories that were obtain'd by the latter, over Nations. " They return'd nothing to their Subjects for what they gave, neither by the Bravery of Arms to crush the " Greatness of their Enemies, nor by vertue of good Laws, to increase the Prosperity of the People. They " seem'd not fitted themselves to attempt the first, and too much influenc'd by Favourites to incline to the " last. They fear'd the greatness of their Subjects more than their Enemies, and shew'd they would ra- " ther have conquer'd at home than abroad, as if they would choose to make their own People Slaves, ra- " ther than others. They apprehended the Effect of good Laws, and were most pleas'd with those that " debauch'd the Trust of Justice; and the Judges were esteem'd most Loyal, that were most readily wicked. " Those were the greatest Favourites that the People most hated, and the greatest Enemies to Men were re- " puted the best Friends to Them. As they divided their Interest from their Subjects, their Complaint of " Grievances rather procur'd Punishment than Redress. They thought the People's Good was inconsistent " with their Power, and that to be sensible of Oppressions was rebellious. In fine, as they were alike in " their Tempers, they were equally unsuccessful: And in the midst of the greatest Smiles of Fortune, both " alike forsaken by her. But Richard II, in the last wretched Scene of his Life, had the Opportunity of " shewing some Testimonies that he sprung from the Black Prince; and had not liv'd more unhappily than " he died bravely: The first he ow'd to his Favourites, the last to himself.

" MR. Rapin observes, that the chief thing in which these two Princes differ'd, was this; Richard was " more harsh and inflexible, and usurp'd more absolute Power than Edward, which made him only the more " hated in Life, and the less lamented at Death. And upon the Catastrophe of these two Princes, he makes " this very just Reflection, That in such a Government as that of England, every Attempt which the So- " vereign makes to grasp at absolute Power, is a Step which brings him so much the nearer to the Precipice of " his Ruin.

" WE hope that every Free-born Englishman will excuse us for taking so much of the Character of these " two Princes from Sir Robert Howard, when he considers that it was the manifest Design of that Author, " to give a Prospect of the Hazard and Madness of a Prince's following the Misguiding Meteor (as Bishop " Nicholson calls it) of Arbitrary Power: And by comparing the Misadventures of those two unhappy Kings " with the Triumphs of their prosperous Predecessors, to shew what Glory and Safety wise and virtuous " Princes have obtain'd; and what Ruin the Cruelty and Folly of others have brought upon themselves and Sub- " jects.

" THE learned Prelate just now mention'd, observes that this Richard gave France the Precedence in his " Royal Style and Title, his Great Seal bearing Rex Franciæ & Angliæ. And so did Henry the Fourth, to " whose Reign we now return, after having premis'd this short Character of him by Bacon, That he was an " unhappy confident Man, who durst undertake more than he would, did more than he ought, and was success- " ful in what he did; yet never attain'd his End, to be sure of his Crown and Quiet of Mind." of his Subjects, and the moſt zealous for his Service.

His Victories over the Scots.

IN 1402 the Earl gain'd two ſignal Victories over the Scots, the firſt at Nesbyt, the ſecond at Humbledon or Halidown. In this latter, which was the moſt conſiderable, the Earl of Douglas, General of the Scotiſh Army, was taken Priſoner, together with the Earl of Fife, King Robert's Nephew, and ſeveral other Officers of Diſtinction. This Victory was the Source of a Quarrel which happen'd betwixt the King and the Earl of Northumberland. The King had a mind to have thoſe Priſoners at his own diſpoſal, but the Earl pretended that it would be an Injury to him, to deprive him of the Ranſoms which he might expect for them. Nevertheleſs he was oblig'd to yield to the King's abſolute Orders. It was unhappy for him that he reſented the King's want of Complaiſance as an Affront to him, which he was reſolv'd to revenge. To this purpoſe he made a ſtrict League with Owen Glendour, who had caus'd the Welſh to rebel, and with the Earl of March, who was at that time Glendour's Priſoner. Their Deſign was to dethrone Henry, and to ſet the Crown upon the Head of the Earl of March; after which the new King was to leave Wales to Glendour, and the Counties by North of Trent, to the Earl of Northumberland. Having concerted their Meaſures, the Earl rais'd an Army in his Government, and by reaſon of an Indiſpoſition which came upon him, he gave the command of it to his Son Henry Piercy, ſurnamed Hotſpur, and to his Brother the Earl of Worceſter, who went to join the Welſh near Shrewsbury. The King march'd to give them Battel, and gain'd a Victory. Young Piercy being kill'd and bury'd, after the Battel the King caus'd his Corpſe to be taken out of the Grave, and cut into four Quarters, which were ſet up upon Poſts. The Earl of Worceſter who was taken Priſoner, was ſentenc'd to loſe his Head. Nevertheleſs the King pardon'd the Earl of Northumberland, who went and caſt himſelf at his Feet; but notwithſtanding this Clemency, the Earl could never entertain that good Opinion of his Prince which he had once, as we ſhall ſee by and by, after mentioning the other Conſpiracies which were form'd againſt the King.

IN 1404, it was reported again that Richard II was alive, and in Scotland. One Serlow, who had been his Domeſtic, was the Author of this Rumour, together with one Thomas Ward, who pretended to be King Richard. Serlow was taken and hang'd, with many others who had ſupported it by falſe Relations.

IN 1405, the Earl of March's Children, who were kept at Windſor by order of the King, were carry'd off; and tho' they were retaken, the Perſons who took them away could never be diſcover'd. The Duke of Albemarle, who, by the Death of his Father, was become Duke of York, was taken up on ſuſpicion, and kept above three Months in Priſon.

HENRY IV.

Earl of March's Children carry'd away, and retaken.

THE ſame Year a great Conſpiracy broke out againſt the King. Richard Scroop Archbiſhop of York, the Earl of Northumberland, Thomas Mowbray Earl Marſhal, the Lords Bardolph, Haſtings, Falconbridge, and many other Lords, having reſolved to make a puſh for dethroning the King, aſſembled a numerous Army at York, where they publiſh'd a Manifeſto, in which they did not ſpare to give the Terms of Uſurper, Traitor, and Arch-traitor. But happy was it for him that the Earl of Weſtmoreland, who was then marching with ſome Forces towards Scotland, being near York when the Rebellion broke out, deliver'd him from the Danger, by this cunning Stratagem. He pretended to be fond of the Rebels Schemes; and having found Means to draw the Archbiſhop of York and the Earl Marſhal to a Conference, he made them his Priſoners. The apprehending of theſe two Ring-Leaders ruin'd the Conſpiracy, and the King cauſed them to be beheaded, as well as the Lords Haſtings and Falconbridge, who had the Misfortune to be taken afterwards. The Earls of Northumberland and Bardolph retir'd into Scotland; and next Year the King made a ſecret Agreement with ſome Scotch Lords, who promiſed him to deliver them up; but they having timely Notice of it, fled to Wales.

Great Conſpiracies againſt the King.

IN 1407, Papers were fix'd up in London and other Towns, denoting that Richard II was ſtill alive, and about to return into the Kingdom at the Head of a powerful Army, and exhorting the People to join him in order to drive out the Uſurper. Several Perſons were puniſh'd for having ſpread or ſupported this falſe Rumour. The Counteſs of Oxford, Mother to the late Duke of Ireland, who was Richard II's Favourite, had her Pardon, but her Secretary was hang'd for it.

Another Report about Richard II.

THE ſame Year the King had like to have been taken by the French Privateers, as he was making a Tour by Sea to one of his Palaces in the County of Norfolk, when no queſtion he was betray'd by ſome of his Domeſticks. At another time an Iron Inſtrument with three Forks was found under the Mattraſs of his Bed, which if he had lain down, would have probably kill'd him. Thus was this Prince

FOEDERA TOM. VIII.

Prince continually made uneasy among those who serv'd him.

Earl of Northumberland's League with Owen Glendour.

IN 1408, the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Bardolph, having made a League with Owen Glendour, publish'd a very injurious Manifesto against the King. At the same time they return'd thro' Scotland into the neighbouring Countries, where they rais'd an Army, with an intent to go and join the Welsh. The King was extremely surpriz'd at this new Rebellion, and had made no manner of Preparation against it. But while he took Measures to go and oppose the Rebels, and was actually marching towards the North, Thomas Rokeby who was High Sheriff of York, did the Work for him; for this Officer having already rais'd some Men for the King against his Arrival, the Earl of Northumberland thought it a matter of great Importance to disperse this Body, which might increase and give him trouble. Rokeby, tho' very inferior in number, could not prevail with himself to retreat, and he received the Earl with so much Intrepidity, that after a very obstinate Engagement, he won the Victory. The Earl of Northumberland was kill'd, and the Lord Bardolph being very much wounded and taken Prisoner, the Sheriff caus'd him to be beheaded. Thus did the King at last get rid of the Earl of Northumberland, who after having done him great Services, liv'd to be his most dangerous Enemy. And if the Earl had liv'd longer, he would, no doubt, have gone near to have depriv'd him of that Crown, which he had contributed more than any body whatsoever, to place upon his Head.

Rokeby the High Sheriff of York defeats him.

The Earl of Northumberland kill'd in Battel.

I HAVE put all these Conspiracies together, because they relate to one and the same Article: I mean the Uneasiness of the English at the deposing of Richard, and the advancing of Henry to the Throne. The latter's escape from all those Dangers, was purely owing to extraordinary Accidents. Those Conspiracies were of such a nature, that one would have thought they were enough to give him more Perplexity than they really did; but they render'd him so suspicious, that the least thing in the World made him jealous. Proceed we now to some other Matters, which come under the Head of his Domestic Affairs.

Marriage of King Henry's Daughters.

IN 1401, Henry agreed to the Marriage of Blanche his eldest Daughter, with Lewis of Bavaria, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Grandson to the Emperor Robert.

IN 1402, he marry'd Philippa his second Daughter, to Eric King of Denmark, who was as yet under the Guardianship of his Mother, Queen Margaret.

AT the same time the King set a Treaty of Marriage on foot between his eldest Son, the Prince of Wales, and Eric's Sister; but this Proposal did not succeed.

His own Marriage.

AND lastly, in that very Year he concluded his own Marriage with Joan of Navarre, Widow of the Duke of Bretagne.

IN 1404, the House of Commons presented an Address to the King, to desire him to seize the Temporal Revenues of the Clergy, who was very rich; but the King refus'd it. This Parliament was call'd Indoctum, or Unlearned.

IN 1406, the Commons having refused to grant the King a Supply, he kept the Parliament sitting 'till they comply'd with his Request. It was in this very Session that the Act above-mention'd was pass'd against the Succession of Females and their Descendants. It is very probable that the King obtain'd it by the same Means as he did the Supply, or by some other way, which he was forc'd to make use of.

IN December that very Year the Act was repeal'd.

IN 1410, the Earl of Northumberland being dead, and France beginning to be disturb'd by intestine Divisions, Henry had nothing more to render him uneasy; and by some Steps which he took, began to make a Discovery that he had not that Aversion to Arbitrary Power, which he pretended before he got into the Throne. He made use of several illegal Methods to have such Members chose to sit in Parliament as were his devoted Tools. These Practices were carry'd on so far, that the Parliament which met this Year, was oblig'd to make a very severe Act to remedy this Abuse, of which they had felt such terrible Consequences in the preceding Reign.

Henry's Endeavours to pack a Parliament.

IN this very Session the House of Commons return'd to the Charge, being very hot for seizing the Clergy's Revenues; but the King made them a very sharp Answer. Considering how the Laity stood affected at that Juncture, he did not care to embroil himself with the Clergy, much less to attack them in a Part so sensible. He likewise return'd a very severe Answer to another Address, which the same House presented to him in favour of the Wickliffites or Lollards. The King's haughty Carriage exasperated the Commons, who, in their turn, bluntly refus'd him a Supply which he demanded: But he would not part with the Parliament 'till they granted it.

THUS ended the Affairs betwixt this King and his Subjects. He liv'd a little above two Years longer, being always jealous of his Authority to a degree of Excess, and suspicious even of his own Henry's Death.

Son. During his laſt Sickneſs he would always have the Crown and Sceptre by his Bed-ſide, for fear leſt any body ſhould carry them away. He died the 20th of March, 1413, after having languiſh'd a few Months.

I SHOULD have been glad to paſs over the Events of this Reign, becauſe of the few important Acts that are in this Eighth Tome. But I thought it by no means proper to loſe the Thread of the Hiſtory, which may be neceſſary hereafter. The moſt remarkable Acts of this Tome, with reſpect to domeſtick Affairs, are as follow, viz.

Affairs of Wales.

EVER ſince the beginning of the Reign of Edward I, Wales had been united to England; but it was a Union which the Welſh accounted perfect Slavery. They had been forc'd to receive Laws and Cuſtoms, which tho' better than thoſe of their Anceſtors, were nevertheleſs the Laws of a Conquering Nation, with which they had a long time diſputed for their Liberty. And this was enough to render ſuch Regulations to them inſupportable. The Reign of Henry IV, beginning as one may ſay with a Conſpiracy which ſhew'd that the Engliſh were not over and above pleas'd with the Revolution that had lately happen'd in their Country, the Welſh thought it a fair Opportunity to ſhake off the Yoke.

Owen Glendour's Hiſtory.

Owen Glendour, or rather Glendourdy, as he is always cali'd in the Fœdera, was the Man who gave the firſt Hint of it to the Welſh his Countrymen. He was a Gentleman who hated the Engliſh for ſome private Reaſons; and ſo full of Ambition, that he only wanted an extraordinary Turn of Affairs to eſtabliſh his Fortune. He diſcover'd his Deſign in the Year 1400, while Henry was engag'd in a War againſt Scotland. The Welſh having ſuch a Commander to head them, took Arms on a ſudden. And it was not very long before this ambitious General obtain'd ſo great a ſhare in the Affection and Confidence of his Countrymen, that they own'd him for their Sovereign; from which Time he aſſum'd the Title of Prince of Wales.

Takes the Title of Prince of Wales.

THE King being in Scotland when this Rebellion broke out, the Earl of March, who was then at his Seat at Wigmore, aſſembled ſome of the neighbouring Nobility to oppoſe Glendourdy. The latter, in order to gain a Reputation among the Welſh, did not only guard againſt the Attacks of the Engliſh, but went even to their Frontiers to inſult them. The Earl of March, going to repel him, was routed and taken Priſoner. The King believ'd, or at leaſt pretended to believe, that he put himſelf voluntarily into Glendourdy's Hands; and upon this Pretence he would never take one Step towards his Ranſom: For ſo pleas'd was he to ſee this Rival out of a Capacity to do him any harm, that he would not ſtir to deliver him out of Captivity. And therefore Glendourdy kept his Priſoner 'till he had an Opportunity to make ſome uſe of him againſt the King, or to get a good Ranſom from him.

Defeats the Earl of March.

HENRY took ſo little notice of the Rebellion of the Welſh at firſt, that Glendourdy made ſome Progreſs, and often inſulted the Engliſh without Oppoſition, 'till 1401, when the King enter'd Wales at the Head of an Army: But as the Welſh retir'd to the Mountains, he could not poſſibly come up with them; and all that he could do was to ravage their Country.

Welſh fly to their Mountains before King Henry.

IN 1402, Henry made a ſecond Expedition into that Country, which was as fruitleſs as the other, becauſe it prov'd an extraordinary wet Summer.

IN 1405, Henry committed the Management of the War in Wales to his eldeſt Son Prince Henry, who defeated the Rebels twice in the ſpace of a Month.

His Son defeats them.

IN this very Year broke out the Rebellion of the Archbiſhop of York, which was ſuppreſs'd ſooner than could be expected, by the Arreſt and Puniſhment of the ſaid Prelate. It is not improbable that he and the other Chiefs of the Malecontents, acted in concert with France and Glendourdy: For that very Summer the Marſhal de Montmorency arriv'd in Wales with an Army of 12,000 Men; and if the Rebels had not been diſpers'd at that time, the King would undoubtedly have been very much embarraſs'd. The French and the Welſh being join'd together, took Caermarthen, Worceſter, and ſome other Places, where they got great Booty. The King, who was then in the Northern Counties, march'd immediately towards Wales: But at his Approach the French reimbark'd, and left Glendourdy to ſhift for himſelf; and happy was it for the Welſh that the Seaſon was ſo far advanc'd that Henry could not do much Execution in their Country.

Archbiſhop of York's Rebellion.

French Forces join the Welſh, but put to Sea again upon the King's Approach.

AFTER this Expedition the King let the Welſh alone, for fear leſt Deſpair ſhould put them upon ſending for freſh Succours from France; for as the only Expectation of the Welſh, and the other Malecontents, was from thence, he had made a firm Reſolution to avoid an open Rupture with that Crown. He choſe to abandon Wales for that Time, rather than to give the Welſh a Colour for bringing in Foreign Troops, which might have occaſion'd a general Inſurrection in England. That was the true Reaſon which made him bear with the Inſults of the Welſh, the French, and the Scots. Conſequently, Glendourdy remain'd Maſter of Wales, while the King made no great Efforts to reduce him to Obedience.

His Reaſons for not revenging the Inſults of the Welſh, &c.

IN 1408, Glendourdy made another League with the Earl of Northumberland: But the Death of this Lord broke all his Meaſures; and ever after that time, his Affairs grew worſe and worſe. Being deprived of the Aſſiſtance of ſuch a Friend, and of Succours from France, whoſe Affairs began to be embroil'd, his Credit diminiſh'd every Day among his Subjects, who ſaw that he was no longer able to protect them; And he abſconded a long time for fear that they would deliver him up to the King. This gave occaſion to ſome Hiſtorians to ſay that he died in 1409; but it appears by the Ninth Tome of the Fœdera, that he was alive in the Year 1417. After this, the Welſh voluntarily ſubmitted to the King.

Glendour makes a League with the Earl of Northumberland.

The Welſh ſubmit to King Henry.

Affairs with Scotland.

DURING the Reign of Richard II, Scotland was included in all the Truces which England made with France: And in the Reign of Henry the Fourth, there were almoſt as many Ruptures with the one as with the other.

Scots break the Truce.

IN October 1399, not long after Henry's Coronation, Robert King of Scotland broke the Truce, and took the Caſtle of Werck. He thought that the Revolution which had lately happen'd in England, could not fail of exciting great Troubles; and he was deſirous to improve the Opportunity. For this very reaſon, Henry diſſembled his Reſentment of this Inſult, and commenc'd a Negotiation upon it. Robert ſeeing that there was no Riſing yet in England, and that France made no manner of Preparation to ſupport the Intereſts of the depoſed King, was very glad that Henry had open'd a Door for him to make a ſafe Retreat.

Earl of March abandons Scotland for the Protection of Henry.

THE Year following, viz. 1400, George Dunbar Earl of March, a Scotchman, being diſguſted at his Sovereign, deſir'd the King of England's Protection, by means of the Earl of Northumberland. Henry granted it to him; and not long after, this Nobleman went to London, and did Homage to the King, who gave him certain Lands in conſideration of the Eſtate which he had left in Scotland. Robert demanded the Refugee, but Henry refus'd to deliver him up; whereupon Robert declar'd War againſt him.

HENRY IV.

War with that Nation upon his Account.

HENRY choſe rather to begin the War in his Enemy's Country than to expect it in his own; and therefore he haſten'd his March towards Scotland. As he approach'd the Frontiers, he ſent a Summons to Robert to come and do him Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland. Robert making a Jeſt of theſe obſolete Pretenſions, Henry enter'd Scotland, and laid ſiege to the Caſtle of Edinburgh, but was forc'd to raiſe it, becauſe the Seaſon was too far advanc'd *. But he was ſcarce retir'd, in order to ſpend the Winter at London, when the Scots made an Incurſion into England, under the Command of Sir Thomas Haliburton and Sir Patrick Hepburn; but as they were returning home, they were met by the Earl of Northumberland, who beat them, and took away all their Booty. This Victory procur'd a Truce of ſix Weeks, which was afterwards prolong'd to a conſiderable Time.

Earl of Northumberland beats the Scots.

IN 1402, the Scots made another Incurſion into England, and were again defeated at Nesbyt by the Earl of Northumberland, who that ſame Year gain'd the ſignal Victory at Humbledon over the Earl of Douglas, who was enter'd into England with a numerous Army. The Scots General loſt an Eye there, and was taken Priſoner, together with the Earl of Fife, King Robert's Nephew, and many other Lords, and Officers of Diſtinction.

Truce with the Scots.

IN 1404 a Truce was concluded betwixt the two Nations, from the 15th of July to Eaſter following.

Broke by another Incurſion.

BUT in 1406 the Scots made another Incurſion into England, which Buchanan ſays was follow'd with a Truce of eight Years; but we don't meet with it in the Acts of this Tome.

Robert Stuart, and the Duke of Albany.

ROBERT Stuart, King of Scotland, being a Prince of a very mean Genius, left the Government to the Care of his Brother Robert Duke of Albany. The latter having taſted the Pleaſure of commanding, form'd a Deſign to ſeize the Crown after his Brother's Death, who had two Sons, viz. David and James, whom he was therefore under a neceſſity of removing out of the way. As to the former, he accompliſh'd it thoroughly. Robert ſuſpected who did it; but not having Courage enough to puniſh him for it,

And they that fled before his Army, fill'd all Places with Fear and Terror, magnifying the Engliſh Forces above Truth, in order to leſſen their Shame in running away.

he only took Care to ſecure Prince James, the only Son he had left, from falling into his Snare. And for this end, he reſolv'd to ſend him to France. The young Prince ſailing along the Engliſh Coaſt, was ſo Sea-ſick that he was reſolv'd to land; but he had no ſooner ſet his Foot on the Shore, when he was arreſted and carry'd to the King, who committed him to the Tower. The King his Father broke his Heart, and the Duke of Albany undertook the Regency of the Kingdom 'till the return of James, to whom the Crown belong'd; but ever after that time, the Duke of Albany was exceeding cautious of diſobliging the King of England, for fear leſt he ſhould ſet his Priſoner at liberty.

IN 1410, Robert de Humfreville, Admiral of an Engliſh Fleet, enter'd the Frith of Edinburgh, and committed Ravages upon both Shores. From hence one would preſume, that there was no Truce concluded in 1406, for eight Years, as Buchanan has aſſerted.

Truce with the Scots.

IN 1412, a Truce was made with the Scots for six Years.

FOEDERA Tom. VIII.

had been longer. She was pleas'd to ſee a Prince upon the Throne of England ſo little qualified to give her any Diſturbance; for Richard being incapable of making one generous Effort to recover what was loſt at the latter end of the Reign of Edward III, his Grandfather, did not only make a Truce of 28 Years with France, but alſo ally'd himſelf to King Charles VI, by marrying his Daughter Iſabella. This Marriage had not yet been conſummated, becauſe the Queen was too young; but France hop'd that it would be the Means of changing the Truce into a Peace; and that thereby ſhe ſhould keep the Provinces which Edward had conquer'd. The Revolution which happen'd in England by the depoſing of Richard II, and the advancing of Henry to the Throne, chang'd this Hope into Fear. King Charles, who was always ailing, had many Fits of real Frenzy, which diſabled him from taking Care of his Government. The Duke of Orleans, his Brother, and the Dukes of Berry and Burgundy, his Uncles, who govern'd in his Name, did not agree well together; and as things then ſtood, there was but too great Reaſon to fear that the new King of England would bring the old Quarrel upon the Stage.

French Court ſends Ambaſſadors to ſift King Henry.

THESE Conſiderations induced the Court of France to deſire a Paſſport for the Ambaſſadors whom they had a mind to ſend to England. The Pretence of this Embaſſy was in all appearance to act in favour of the depos'd King; but the true Motive of it was to ſift the Diſpoſition of the new King, who ere it was long fully reſolv'd their Doubt upon this Head: For immediately after he had ſettled his domeſtick Affairs in his firſt Parliament, he ſent the Biſhop of Durham and the Earl of Worceſter Ambaſſadors to France, who had Orders to confirm the Truce of 28 Years; and if France deſir'd it, to declare the King's Inclination to conclude a perpetual Alliance between the two Crowns, and to propoſe the Marriage of his eldeſt Son, the Prince of Wales, with one of Charles the Sixth's Daughters. This was enough to convince the Court of France, that ſhe had no reaſon to be afraid; and that on the contrary, Henry ſtood in fear of her. The Truce however was confirm'd, but the Propoſal of the Marriage was evaded under pretence of the King's Illneſs.

Truce with France confirm'd.

AFTER this, ſo many Plots broke out in England againſt Henry, as made the Court of France take new Meaſures. They reſolv'd to foment Troubles in this Kingdom, by continually making Henry uneaſy, notwithſtanding the Truce ſo lately confirm'd. Conſequently, England was never in Peace, nor in open War with France, during the whole Courſe of this Reign. Charles's Council intended to leave this Point undertermin'd, that if the Affairs of England ſhould turn to the Advantage of the new King, they might be Gainers by the Truce, or that they might improve the Opportunity of ſuch Diſturbances as the Engliſh Malecontents were like to raiſe in England. At the ſame time they were willing to give the Malecontents of this Kingdom ſome Hopes of a powerful Diverſion, in caſe they ſhould reſolve to make a vigorous Effort. Henry's Politicks occaſion'd this Conduct of France. As it was only from this Quarter that the Malecontents of his Kingdom could expect any Succours, he had taken a firm Reſolution never to make an open Rupture with that Crown. He was determin'd, coſt what it would, to deprive the Welſh and other Malecontents of this Protection; and he labour'd continually during the far greateſt part of his Reign, for the Succeſs of the Project which he had form'd for a perpetual Alliance with France. For the ſake of this, he ſuffer'd ſeveral Inſults from that Nation, without ſhewing much Reſentment; being always ready to accept the moſt frivolous Excuſes. He never refus'd entring into a Negotiation for preſerving the Truce, which France continually violated with Impunity, and without the leaſt Pretext. Such were the Diſpoſitions of the two Courts, 'till the inteſtine Diviſions of France gave them reaſon to take other Meaſures.

Henry's Policy in not breaking with France.

Faction in Guyenne.

IN 1399, the Truce of 28 Years was confirm'd, as has been already ſaid. That ſame Year, Henry had like to have loſt all that he had left in Guyenne, by a Rebellion which was hatching amongſt the Gaſcons, inſtigated by the Duke of Bourbon, who had been ſent into that Province expreſly for that Purpoſe.

Richard's Queen Dowager ſent for home to France.

IN 1401, Charles demanded that his Daughter Iſabella, who was Richard the Second's Dowager, might be ſent back to France. This was the Baſis of a Negotiation which Henry ſpun out to a great length, becauſe he had a Deſign to marry her to his Son the Prince of Wales. But this Project failing, Iſabella was accordingly ſent home to the King her Father.

Her Dowry demanded.

IN 1402, Charles demanded the Reſtitution of the Money which Richard II had receiv'd in part of Iſabel's Dowry: But to ſilence this Demand, Henry, in his Turn, call'd for the Arrears that were ſtill due for the Ranſom of King John *.

* THE Sum due amounted to a Million and half of Crowns.

FOEDERA Tom. VIII.

French Descent on the Isle of Wight.

IN 1403, Valeran the Count de St. Pol, of the Family of Luxemburgh, made a Descent upon the Isle of Wight. As he had married a Sister of Richard II by the Mother's side, he pretended to an Authority of revenging the Death of the King his Brother-in-law. France furnish'd Troops and Ships for this Expedition, and yet pretended that by so doing she had not violated the Truce *.

Duke of Orleans challenges Henry.

THAT same Year the Duke of Orleans, Brother to Charles VI, sent a Challenge to the King of England, to fight him at single Combat, or rather with a hundred Men on each side. Henry demanded of the Court of France, whether the King had any hand in this Proceeding, protesting if he had, he look'd upon it as a Violation of the Truce; but he could get no other Answer from him, than that it was Charles's Intention to observe the Truce †.

DURING the Rebellion of the Piercys, the Duke of Orleans had intended to make a Descent upon England, while the Duke of Burgundy was to besiege Calais; but the King's Victory at Shrewsbury made this Project fall to the Ground, tho' the frequent Confirmations of the Truce were no manner of Hindrance to the many Designs of this Nature, which France form'd during the whole Course of this Reign.

The French not bound by repeated Truces.

They besiege Merk Castle, near Calais.

IN 1405, the Count de St. Pol besieg'd the Castle of Merk, in order to facilitate the Siege of Calais, near which it stood: But the Governour of Calais posted to its Relief, and drove off the French, who were already got into the Castle-yard.

Also Bourg and Blaye.

ABOUT the same time the Duke of Orleans besieg'd Bourg and Blaye in Guyenne, both at once, but was not able to take them. Henry put up all these Affronts, and hardly durst complain of those frequent Violations of a Truce, which was every Year confirm'd to no manner of Purpose.

French land Men in Wales.

THIS same Year the Marshal de Montmorency landed 12,000 Men in Wales; the Design of which Expedition was manifestly to favour the Revolt of the Archbishop of York, and the other Conspirators, which, happily for the King, was suppress'd when the French arriv'd.

The Infidelity of France.

THE League which France made with Glendourdy, is another Demonstration that she made no account of the Truce; only when she could not bring her Designs to bear, then she protested that she had no Intention to break it. Yet for all this, Mezeray, and other French Historians, confidently affirm, that Henry broke the Truce every Year for the purpose: But they don't produce the least particular Fact to prove so general an Assertion. Besides, it is certain that it was as much against Henry's Interest to break the Truce, as it was far from his Design.

HENRY IV.

And of her Historians.

Quarrel betwixt the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans.

NOT long after this, France was so shock'd by intestine Divisions, that she was no longer in a Condition to give any Disturbance to Henry. John Duke of Burgundy, who succeeded his Father Philip in 1403, was upon very ill Terms with the Duke of Orleans; and their Hatred of one another was carry'd to such a height, that the Effects thereof could hardly fail of being fatal. At length, in 1407, the Duke of Burgundy caus'd the Duke of Orleans to be assassinated; and had so much Interest as to get his Pardon for it: After which he made himself Master of the King's Person, and govern'd the Kingdom alone.

The latter assassinated.

Truce renew'd.

IN 1408, The Truce between the two Crowns was renew'd, for Picardy and Guyenne, to the 1st of May, 1410. When this Truce was on the point of expiring, the Duke of Burgundy made great Preparations at St. Omer for the Siege of Calais. They say that the Governour of Calais sent an Incendiary to St. Omer, who putting fire to the Ammunition prepar'd for that Siege, the Duke's Design vanish'd into Smoke.

Miscarriage of a Design upon Calais.

Duke of Burgundy's Pardon revok'd.

THE Duke's Affairs calling him into the Netherlands, his Enemies took the Opportunity of his Absence to have his Pardon revok'd, and to get him declar'd an Enemy to the State. During this, he gain'd a Victory over the Liegeois, and then immediately went for Paris with 10,000 Horse; but when he came, he found the King carry'd away to Tours. There was an Accommodation not long after between this Duke and the young Duke of Orleans; but the former always remain'd Master of the King's Person, and by consequence of the Government.

A Match with France propos'd, but slighted.

HENRY seeing the Duke of Burgundy so well establish'd, resum'd his first Thoughts of making an Alliance with France, and imagin'd that the Marriage of his Son the Prince of Wales to one of the Daughters of the Duke of Burgundy, would be a good Step towards it. He caus'd the Match to be propos'd; but the Duke, who had other Views at that time,

* THEY arriv'd in December, saying, that they were come to keep Christmas there, and demanded a Tax; but Mr. Rapin says, that after they had plunder'd a few Villages, the Inhabitants of the Island, without Assistance, forc'd them to retire with Confusion to their Ships.

† MR. Rapin observes, that upon Henry's refusing to accept his Challenge because he was a Subject, the Duke sent him a Letter, branding him with the Titles of Traitor, Usurper, and Regicide: To which Henry return'd as bitter an Answer, wherein, after having given him the Lye, he accus'd him of having had recourse to Witchcraft, for afflicting his Brother with that Ilness under which he labour'd.

was not in haſte to anſwer the Propoſal; and not long after the Affairs of France took a new Turn.

Troubles in France betwixt the Princes of Burgundy and Orleans.

THE Dukes of Orleans, Berry and Bretagne, the Counts d' Alençon, Armagnac, Clermont, and many others, having made a League againſt the Duke of Burgundy, rais'd Troops, and advanc'd near Paris. The Duke ſent an Army againſt them, which was not inferior to theirs; but juſt as they were going to engage, a Treaty was made betwixt them, by which it was agreed, that the Leaders of both Parties ſhould not come within the Verge of the Court. The Duke of Burgundy executed this Agreement, and retir'd to Flanders: But the Princes of the Houſe of Orleans were not ſo honeſt; for having rais'd freſh Troops, they advanc'd towards Paris, with a deſign to make themſelves Maſters of that Metropolis, and alſo of the King's Perſon. Then it was that the Duke of Burgundy had recourſe to the King of England, who ſent him powerful Succours, with which he march'd to the Deliverance of Paris, and enter'd that City the 30th of October, 1411. It was at this time that the Names of Burgundians and Armagnacs were given to the Factions, from the Duke of Burgundy and the Count d' Armagnac, who were the chief of them.

Both Factions apply to Henry for Aſſiſtance.

'TILL now Henry had been always afraid of France; but the Troubles of that Kingdom having diſſipated all his Apprehenſions, he reſolv'd to improve them to his own Advantage; and the French themſelves ſoon furniſh'd him with an Opportunity. The Orleanois, or Armagnacs, being too weak to make a ſtand againſt the Duke of Burgundy, deſir'd Aſſiſtance of Henry; and made him ſuch large Offers, that they drew him off from the Intereſt of their Enemy. The Duke of Burgundy hearing they had Deputies at London, ſent Ambaſſadors thither alſo, to renew the Treaty of a Marriage between one of his Daughters and the Prince of Wales. Henry pretended to lend a favourable Ear to this Propoſal, but it was only to get the better Terms from the Princes of Orleans, whoſe Deputies haſten'd to conclude a Bargain with him, for fear of being prevented by the Burgundians. They promis'd to put Henry in poſſeſſion of Guyenne, and all its Dependencies, in the ſame manner as his Anceſtors enjoy'd it. And Henry engaging on his Part to give them a powerful Aſſiſtance againſt the Duke of Burgundy, the Treaty was concluded the 18th of May, 1412.

Henry's Treaty with the Orleans Party.

ACCORDING to the Conventions, the King prepar'd the promis'd Succours, and gave the Command thereof to his ſecond Son Thomas, whom he made at the ſame time Duke of Clarence. While theſe Succours were getting ready in England, the Orleans Chiefs ſhut themſelves up in Bourges, whither the Duke of Burgundy went to beſiege them, and carry'd the King along with him. But the very Expectation of theſe Succours from England, put both the Beſiegers and Beſieged alike upon the Fret. The former were afraid they would arrive before they had taken the Place, and the latter left they ſhould come too late; which Uneaſineſs determining both Sides equally to an Accommodation, they made a Treaty, which was actually ſign'd by both Parties when the Engliſh arriv'd. The Duke of Clarence was then very much perplex'd, for fear the two Parties ſhould unite againſt him. But he put a good Face upon it; and after the Duke of Orleans had given his Brother the Count d' Angouleſme to him, as a Hoſtage for ſecuring the Payment of his Troops, he went thro' France to Bourdeaux. Now this put a Period to Henry's Affairs with France; for in March 1413, which was the Year following, he departed this Life.

Affairs with Bretagne.

John de Montfort.

JOHN de Montfort Duke of Bretagne, had always been very much attach'd to the Intereſts of England; and it was by the Aſſiſtance of his Father-in-law, Edward III, that he came at length to the peaceable poſſeſſion of the Dutchy of Bretagne, which had been ſo obſtinately diſputed betwixt him and Charles of Blois. The Dutcheſs, his Wife, dying and leaving him no Children, he marry'd to his ſecond Wife, Blanche of Navarre, by whom he had three Sons. He died in November, 1399, and left his Children to the Guardianſhip of the Duke of Burgundy and Oliver de Cliſſon. The eldeſt of his Sons ſucceeded him by the Name of John; tho' at his Baptiſm he was nam'd Peter.

His ſecond Wife.

Henry's Marriage.

In 1402, Henry marry'd Blanche of Navarre, Widow of the Duke of Bretagne, and Mother of theſe three Princes; which the Court of France was ſorry to hear; for ſhe had reaſon to dread that Union betwixt England and Bretagne, which had formerly given her ſo much Perplexity. To prevent this Inconvenience, the Duke of Burgundy repair'd to Bretagne, and carry'd the young Duke and his Brothers to Paris; after which the Affairs of Bretagne fell under the ſole Direction of the Court of France, who had the Duke in their Power, and whoſe chief Aim was to create a Miſunderſtanding betwixt the People of Bretagne and the Engliſh; ſo that the former continually harraſs'd the latter, without the leaſt Pretence for it.

A Deſcent upon England from Bretagne.

IN 1403, they made a Deſcent upon the Weſtern Coaſts of England, where they committed great Ravages. Henry complain'd of this Inſult, but could get no other Satisfaction than a Declaration that the thing was done by Perſons who had no Authority from the Government. He would not ſhew the leaſt Reſentment of this Affront, but put it up as tamely as he did many others, for the reaſon ſo often mention'd, viz. becauſe he was determin'd to avoid a Rupture with any of his Neighbours. Nevertheleſs, the Inhabitants of the Coaſts, who were Sufferers by the Invaſion, mann'd out a Fleet with the King's tacit Conſent, and therewith took a ſweet Revenge upon the Invaders *.

A Deſcent from England upon Bretagne.

Another Deſcent at Portland.

IN 1404, the People of Bretagne made another Deſcent at Portland; but inſtead of taking any Booty there, they were beat, and left ſome of their People Priſoners in the Hands of the Engliſh †. The King ſeem'd to take no notice of this Inſult neither: And after that time, the Hoſtilities continued on both ſides without

The Engliſh Fleet that was ſent to return the Inſult upon the Coaſts of Bretagne was commanded by William Wilford, Eſq; who not only took 40 Sail of Merchant Ships, laden with Oil and Soap, and 1000 Tun of Rochel Wine; but landed his Men, and deſtroy'd the Towns and Villages for ſix Miles together, as far as the Town of St. Matthew, which he left in Flames, and returning to his Ships, ſet ſeveral empty Veſſels on fire which lay in the Harbour, and then departed.

Truces with Bretagne.

IN 1407, ſuch were the Diviſions at the Court of France, that the People of Bretagne fear'd they could have no farther Protection from that Quarter, and therefore deſir'd a Truce of Henry for one Year, which was immediately granted; and, if they had deſir'd it, they might have had one for a longer Term: But all that they aim'd at then, was to wait what Turn the Affairs of France would take, in order to regulate themſelves accordingly. It is obſervable, that in this Truce the little Iſle of Brehac (on the Coaſt of Bretagne) the uſual Retreat of the Privateers, was particularly excepted.

French attack'd in their Harbour.

SOME time after this, the French Privateers which infeſted the Engliſh Coaſts, being purſued by the Earl of Kent, who commanded the Engliſh Fleet, withdrew into the Harbour of Brehac, where the Earl of Kent attacking them, was kill'd in the firſt Onſet. But this did not hinder his Troops from carrying on the Siege, and taking the Town, where they put all to the Sword.

Prolongations of the Truce.

IN 1409, the Truce betwixt England and Bretagne was prolong'd to the 1ſt of July, 1411, and before it was expir'd, it was farther prolong'd for ten Years.

Affairs of the Church.

THE Diſputes betwixt England and the Court of Rome, mention'd in ſeveral of our former, ſtill ſubſiſted; and it was hardly poſſible for them to be attended with any other Conſequence than an entire Rupture, as happen'd in the Century which follow'd this we are now treating of. The Court of Rome would not relax one jot, and the Engliſh began to be leſs pliable than formerly; and there was a vaſt Difference between the People that liv'd in the Reigns of John Lackland and Henry III, and thoſe that came after them. Whatever Grievances the latter complain'd of, they had the Remedy in their own Hands, and apply'd it; whereas their Forefathers were ſo ſilly as to expect it in the Juſtice and Condeſcenſion of the Popes. For ſome time paſt, particularly in the Reigns of Edward III and Richard II, the Parliaments had made Statutes ſtrong enough to have ſecur'd the Engliſh from the Vexations of the Court of Rome, if they had been but duly obſerv'd. But, to their Misfortune, the Intereſts of their Kings ſo often claſh'd with thoſe of the Nation, that thoſe Acts of Parliament were too frequently diſpens'd with. The Statute of Præmunire, which was at firſt call'd the Statute againſt Proviſors, was the ſtrongeſt Dike which the Parliament caſt up againſt the Incroachments of the Court of Rome, if their Kings had taken that care which they ought, to have put it in Execution. Foraſmuch as the Term Præmunire frequently occurs in the Hiſtory of England, it will not be impertinent in this Place briefly to explain the Meaning of it.

The Statute of Præmunire.

THE Statute againſt Proviſors, made in the time of Edward III, inflicted a Puniſhment upon thoſe who made ſuit to the Court of Rome for Proviſion to Benefices already vacant, or to ſuch as ſhould happen to be vacant hereafter, contrary to the Rights of the Crown, or of the Patrons of Benefices. The Proviſions to Benefices before they became vacant, were call'd Gratiæ Expectativæ. The ſame Puniſhment was order'd for thoſe who remov'd Cauſes that were within the Juriſdiction of the Royal or Civil Courts, to the See of Rome, or any Eccleſiaſtical Court. When a Perſon happen'd to be guilty of this new Crime, he was ſerv'd with a Writ, or Order, which began with theſe Words, Præmunire facias; and he was thereby ſummon'd to appear in the King's Court. It is from this firſt Word that the Statute, as well as the Puniſhment thereby inflicted, had its Name. The Puniſhment conſiſted at firſt in the Forfeiture of Eſtate, and in the Impriſonment of the Offender, during the King's good Pleaſure. After Edward the Third's time the Puniſhment was often aggravated, and the Statute extended to ſeveral other Caſes which had relation to the Quarrels betwixt England and the Court of Rome. Conſequently all the Acts of Præmunire, are ſo many Extenſions of thoſe Acts which were made upon Points of that Nature in the Reigns of Edward III and Richard II. In general, the Word Præmunire regards Offences committed with reſpect respect to any Religious or Ecclesiastical Affair, wherein the Civil Jurisdiction is concerned. By this Term we likewise understand the Punishment which they incur who bring before the Ecclesiastical Court those Causes which ought to be try'd by the King's Courts. And nothing is a more common Phrase among the English than this Expression, to fall into a Præmunire.

THO' these Statutes were not observ'd with all the Exactness that was requisite, yet they produc'd a great many good Effects. The Popes were thereby made more cautious than before, of giving the Parliament a handle to take Measures that might be yet more effectual; nevertheless, when they found a favourable Opportunity, they made it sufficiently appear that they did not renounce their Pretensions. This was, generally speaking, the present Disposition of the Popes and the English, with respect to the Dealings they had with each other.

English Clergy envy'd by the Laity.

FORASMUCH as the Clergy commonly took part with Rome in those Disputes, they thereby incens'd the Laity, who besides could not help envying their wealthy Possessions. The Sect of the Wicliffites or Lollards which grew stronger every Day, were a remarkable Thorn also in the sides of the Clergy, by the Care they took to shew the People those Abuses which were crept into Religion. Among these Abuses, the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and the Wealth of the Clergy, were the Topicks which they most insisted on; and therefore the Clergy left no stone unturn'd to ruin the whole Sect.

Wickliffites expose the Clergies Power and Wealth.

WHAT was said in the first Article under the Head of Domestick Affairs, plainly shews how much Henry IV was concern'd in Interest to be upon good Terms with the Clergy. He had too many Malecontents in his Kingdom already, to exasperate a Body who had it so much in their Power to hurt him; and for this Reason he had always as much Complaisance for the Clergy as they could possibly desire. The Clergy being assembled in Convocation, during the first Parliament that was held in his Reign, he sent two Lords to them to assure them of his Protection, and to let them know his Readiness to concur with them in all the proper Measures for the Extirpation of Heresy. Nothing could go farther than such an Engagement as this to win him the Hearts of the Clergy; for the number of the Lollards, which increas'd every Day, gave the Bishops and Abbots reason to fear that they would at last work a Reformation, which could not but be prejudicial to their Interest.

Henry forced to buckle to his Clergy.

Hereticks punish'd by the Bishops without the King's leave.

IN the Reign of Richard II, the Bishops had obtain'd leave of the Court to throw the Hereticks into Prison, without being oblig'd to ask the King's Consent; but the House of Commons got the said Concession revok'd; after which time there was no Act of Parliament made upon that Account. But tho' the King granted this Permission to the Bishops more frequently than ever, yet the Bishops represented to Henry IV, that bare Imprisonment was not sufficient to stop the Progress of the Sect of the Lollards. And Henry, who affected a mighty Zeal for Religion, tho' his only View was to secure the Clergy in his Interest, strenuously recommended it to the Parliament, which assembled in 1401, to take care that the Church suffer'd no Damage by means of this Sect: And tho' the lower House was utterly against persecuting the Lollards, yet by the Interest of the Court, and the Cabals of the Clergy, an Act was pass'd for condemning the obstinate Hereticks to the Fire. And no sooner was the Law made, but one William Salter or Sautre was deliver'd over to the secular Arm, and burnt alive.

The Act de Hæretico comburendo put in execution for the first time.

THIS Law, and the immediate Execution of it, was matter of great Triumph to the Clergy who were in the utmost Consternation for fear that the Heresy of the Lollards would strip them of their Riches and Power. The Sect had already made such an Impression on the People to their Prejudice, that the Clergy were no longer treated with that Respect and Veneration as formerly, and Measures were actually concerting to abate their Pride by depriving them of their Temporalities. In the Parliament which assembled in 1404, the Commons presented an Address to the King, praying him to seize the Revenues of the Clergy; the Wealth of which Body they represented to be excessive, and complain'd that it was apply'd to Uses that were the most contrary to those for which they were intended.

The Commons of England complain of the Clergy's Wealth and ill use of it.

BUT the King perceiving by a Speech which the Archbishop of Canterbury made to him on this Head, that his Acceptance of this Proposal might embroil his Affairs, rejected it. Nevertheless the Commons still intended to insist upon their Demand, but the upper House broke their Measures.

The King rejects two Proposals of the House of Commons to seize their Revenues.

THE Persons who had form'd this Project against the Clergy, were not a little mortify'd by the ill Success of it: Yet it was far from discouraging them; for in 1410, the lower House presented an Address to the King of the same Nature with the former, wherein they acquainted him that the Clergy were Masters of one third of the Revenues of the Kingdom, and the State not a Penny the better for it: That the Superfluity of their Revenues was sufficient to maintain 150 Earls at 3000 Marks each per Annum, 1500 Barons at 100 Marks each, 6200 Knights at 40 Marks each, and 100 Hospitals at 100 Marks each per Annum. That, in such case, the Kingdom would be in a better Posture of Defence, the Poor better maintain'd, and the Clergy would stick more to their Functions. The King sharply rejected this Address, and forbad the Commons to meddle with the Affairs of the Church.

He rejects the Commons Address for some Favour to the Lollards.

AFTERWARDS, the very same House of Commons presented another Address to the King, praying him to consent that the Act pass'd against the Lollards might be repeal'd, or at least soften'd. But the King made Answer, that so far was he from consenting to any such Repeal, that he wish'd one had been made yet more severe.

AT last, the Commons only desir'd that such of the Clergy as were accus'd of capital Crimes might not be try'd by the Ecclesiastical Court; but even this Demand was refus'd them with surprizing Disdain. It is not unlikely that it had been insinuated to the King, that this House of Commons were all Hereticks, or the Abettors of Hereticks; and therefore Henry, not content with having rejected their Petition in favour of the Lollards, gave Orders that John Badby, one of that Sect, should be burnt alive, during the Session of the Parliament, and in the Face of the whole House.

He commits another of them to the Flames.

IT is observable, that this happen'd in the Year 1410, a Time when the King had nothing more to fear from France. Moreover, the Welsh began to abandon Glendourdy; and finally, the Earl of Northumberland was dead: So that this Prince had no body to stand in fear of at home besides the Clergy, if he had done any thing to disgust them. Had not all these Circumstances concurr'd, he would not have ventur'd to treat the Commons with so much Contempt. But about a Year before his Death, perceiving that his Subjects, the Laity especially, were very uneasy, and having some jealousy of his Son the Prince of Wales, he endeavour'd by more moderate Behaviour to redress the Injury he had done to himself by taking such Steps. And when he died, he was scarce lamented by any of his Subjects except the Clergy, who shew'd some Regret for his Loss, for a Reason which has been already observ'd.

He alters his Conduct.

His unlamented Death.

WE are now come to the Ninth Tome of the Fœdera, which takes in the Acts of the Reign of Henry V, from the 20*th of* March, 1413, the Day that Henry IV died, to the Peace of Troyes, which was ſign'd May the 21*ſt*, 1420, incluſive.

The Uſefulneſs of the ninth Volume of the Fœdera.

AMong all the Tomes we have abridg'd hitherto, there is not one which contains ſuch a Variety of important ſecret Acts, and Pieces ſo uſeful for illuſtrating the Hiſtories of France and England, as this now open before us. And I will venture to ſay, that ſome of theſe Acts are ſo abſolutely neceſſary, that for want of knowing them, both the French and Engliſh Hiſtorians have given a very imperfect Account of this Reign. The principal Subjects to which the Acts of this Tome relate, are, 1. The Pretenſions of Henry V to the Crown of France. 2. The Negotiations on that Head. 3. The War which was renewed upon that Account. And, 4. The Peace which put an end to it.

The Subject of it.

Mr. RYMER's vaſt Collection of the Acts in the ſeveral Reigns, when conſider'd abſtractedly from the Events to which they relate, being in a proper ſenſe but as a Body without a Soul, we ſhall therefore purſue the ſame Method that has been obſerv'd all along, by connecting the Thread of the Hiſtory from one Period to another, with the authentick Records which illuſtrate and ſupport it. Now, to give a general Idea of this Tome, it is abſolutely neceſſary to inform the Reader, 1. Of the State of Affairs between the two Crowns when Henry V aſcended the Throne. 2. Of the Situation of Affairs at the Court of France after the Death of Charles V, ſurnam'd the Wiſe. And when this is done, it will not be difficult to diſcover the Motives of thoſe Acts, and the Uſefulneſs of them.

[*] N° VII, of this Folio Edition. A Recapitulation of Edward III's Diſpute with France.

IT has been already obſerv'd *, that Edward the Third laid Claim to the Crown of France, and we have ſeen what was the Foundation of his Pretenſions. The Preference that the General Aſſembly of the States gave to Philip de Valois, was the Cauſe of the War which Edward undertook againſt France. In that War he gain'd a Victory at Sea, routed Philip at Creſſy, and won Calais, which afterwards ſerv'd as a Key to let him into France, as often as he thought fit to carry his Arms into that Kingdom. After a ſhort Interval of Peace, his Son the Prince of Wales gain'd the famous Victory of Poictiers, where King John, Son and Succeſſor to Philip de Valois, was taken Priſoner. While that Monarch was a Captive in England, Edward enter'd France at the Head of 100,000 Men, and ſhew'd himſelf at the very Gates of Paris. This powerful Invaſion, which France was in no Capacity to reſiſt, produc'd the Treaty of Bretigny, whereby Edward recover'd all the old Dependencies of Guyenne which had been taken from his Anceſtors. Theſe Dependencies contain'd, beſides Gaſcoigne or Guyenne in particular, Bigorre, Saintoigne, Poictou, Angouleſme, Perigord, Limouſin, Rovergne, and in general whatever had been enjoy'd by the ancient Earls of Poictiers, Dukes of Guyenne. All theſe Provinces came to the Kings of England by the Marriage of Eleanor, Heireſs of Guyenne, to Henry II; but during the Reigns of King John (ſurnam'd Lackland) and of Henry III, Philip-Auguſtus and St. Lewis, Kings of France, had par'd away ſo much of this vaſt Tract of Country, that England, when Edward III came to the Throne, had no Part of it left but Bourdeaux, Bayonne, and Gaſcoigne. Moreover, by the ſame Treaty Edward had Monſtrevil reſtor'd, together with the Earldom of Ponthieu, which had both been forfeited at the beginning of the War. He alſo ſecur'd himſelf in the poſſeſſion of Calais, and the Earldom of Guiſnes. By the ſame Peace he acquir'd the abſolute and independent Sovereignty of all the Lands, Towns, and Provinces, which were thereby yielded to him, without being oblig'd to do Homage for them to France. In fine, he ſtipulated a Sum of three Millions of Crowns in Gold for King John's Ranſom. And for his own part, he quitted all his Rights whatſoever to the Crown of France; and in particular renounc'd his juſt Pretenſions to Normandy, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, the Inheritance of his Anceſtors, which

This Perſon and William Sautre, above-mentioned, were the two firſt Perſons, that we read of, who were burnt in England for Hereſy, in oppoſing the Doctrine of the Church of Rome. For the particular Charge againſt both theſe Confeſſors, and for the Courage and Patience with which they offer'd up their Lives as a Sacrifice to the Truth, ſee the Hiſtory of the Engliſh Martyrs, which ſays, that the Prince of Wales, afterwards Henry V, was preſent at the Execution of Badby in Smithfield, and preſs'd him to recant, with an Offer not only of his Life, but a Penſion.

FOEDERA TOM. IX.

France had unjuſtly taken from them, as alſo his Right of Sovereignty over Bretagne.

THIS Treaty was religiouſly executed by King John, and punctually obſerv'd during his Life, except in the Article of his Ranſom, of which near two Thirds remain'd unpaid when that Prince died. But Charles V, his Son and Succeſſor, finding this Peace too diſadvantagious to France, tho' he himſelf had concluded, ſign'd, and ſworn to it while the King his Father was a Priſoner, took a frivolous Occaſion to break it. He declar'd War againſt Edward; and in the Space of a few Years recover'd all that had been yielded to England by the Treaty of Bretigny, except Calais, Bayonne, Bourdeaux, and part of Guyenne, properly ſo call'd.

THIS ſecond War was interrupted by a Truce which laſted 'till the Death of Edward III, in the Year 1377. During the Reign of Richard II, the remainder of Charles the Fifth's, and the former part of Charles the Sixth's Reigns, War and Truces were renew'd by Turns, without any conſiderable Conqueſts or Conceſſions made on either ſide. At length, in 1395, Charles VI, and Richard II, concluded a Truce of 28 Years, which was ſeal'd by Richard's Marriage with Iſabel, King Charles's Daughter.

RICHARD II being depos'd in 1399, and Henry IV ſucceeding him, the Truce was very ill obſerv'd by France during all that Reign; nor was Henry IV himſelf very regardful of it towards the latter end of his Days. But however, notwithſtanding thoſe frequent Violations of the Truce, it was pretended on both ſides to be ſtill ſubſiſting.

State of Affairs between France and England at Henry's Acceſſion.

THUS Affairs ſtood between the two Crowns when Henry V came to the Throne of England. France having broke the Treaty of Bretigny, and pretending it to be null and void, it is manifeſt that by that Means the Kings of England were thereby intitl'd to all the Rights which they claim'd before the ſaid Treaty. Therefore immediately after the Rupture, what did Edward III do but reſume the Title of King of France, which he had quitted ſince the Concluſion of the Treaty, and his Succeſſors took it alſo as well as he. After the beginning of the War which follow'd the Treaty of Bretigny, there never was a Peace betwixt the two Crowns, but only Truces which did not in the leaſt affect the Rights of either Party. It is therefore clear that when Henry V came to the Throne, he ſtood upon the ſame Terms as Edward III, his Great-Grandfather did fourſcore Years before, when he began the firſt War. But beſides this Primitive Right, Henry had a ſolemn Treaty in his favour, which France did not break 'till it had been entirely executed, and upon the weakeſt of all Pretences. This was the State of the Differences between the two Crowns in 1413. Now let us ſee what was the Situation of the Court and Kingdom of France.

HENRY V.

State of the Court and Kingdom of France.

CHARLES V, ſurnam'd the Wiſe, died in 1380, leaving to ſucceed him Charles VI, his Son, who was twelve Years of Age; and to govern the Kingdom during his Minority, three Brothers, viz. Lewis Duke of Anjou, John Duke of Berry, and Philip Duke of Burgundy, who by their boundleſs Ambition, and their Jealouſies of each other, turn'd the whole State upſide down. Charles V alſo left another Son, nam'd Lewis, who had the Title of Duke of Orleans, and who in his Time too did as much as his Uncles towards embroiling the Affairs of the Kingdom. In the beginning of the Reign of Charles VI the Jealouſy between his Uncles flam'd out to ſuch a degree that there was very juſt Reaſon to dread the Conſequences of it; for they agreed but in one ſingle Article, and that was to over-burthen the Subjects with Taxes, which produc'd ſuch an univerſal Diſcontent as diſpos'd the common People to run into Factions, when the Hatred betwixt the Great Men was at the higheſt Pitch.

THE Kingdom of Sicily falling to the Duke of Anjou, he quitted France in 1381, and went to Italy.

AFTER his Departure, the Dukes of Berry and Burgundy govern'd in the Name of the King, their Nephew. In 1385, they marry'd him to Iſabella, Daughter of Stephen Duke of Bavaria. Tho' Charles VI was of Age at the Year 1382, according to the Decree of the King his Father, which bounded the Minority of Kings at their fourteenth Year, his two Uncles govern'd both his Perſon and State, 'till he was twenty.

Charles VI's Marriage.

IN 1388, Charles diſcharg'd his two Uncles, and took the Reins of Government into his own Hands. His chief Favourites at that time were the Duke of Orleans his Brother, who was ſeventeen Years of Age, and the Duke of Bourbon their Uncle by the Mother's ſide.

His Favourites.

THE Duke of Burgundy was extremely jealous to ſee the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon govern the Realm in the Name of the good-natur'd King. And by his Cabals he ſo contriv'd it, that in 1391 the Aſſembly of the States delegated the Government to him, on pretence of enabling the King to bear the Weight of it. Probably Charles began from that time to give Demonſtrations of that Diſtemper in his Mind, which render'd him all his Lifetime incapable to take care of his Affairs. Had it not been for this, the States would not have attempted to give him a Miniſter, or rather a Governour, againſt his liking. And it was for this Reaſon too that the Duke of Burgundy was ſo eager to be put in poſſeſſion of that Poſt, in hopes that his Adminiſtration would be of a long Continuance; for this very Year the King was ſurpriz'd with a Touch of Frenzy, of which he had repeated Fits the following Years. And finally, in 1395, he was attack'd with it ſo violently, that from that time he had ſcarce any calm Intervals; and even when he ſeem'd to be in Health, he labour'd under ſuch a Weakneſs both of Body and Mind, as render'd him altogether unfit for the Government.

Charles's Indiſpoſition for the Government.

THE King remaining in this ſad State all the reſt of his Life *, his Queen, the Dukes of Orleans, Berry, Burgundy and Bourbon, diſputed for ſeveral Years who ſhould govern the Kingdom. In fine, the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy form'd two oppoſite Parties, with which the whole Court join'd, as their ſeveral Intereſts or Inclinations led them; and in a very ſhort ſpace of time, the whole Kingdom was liſted in the one or the other of theſe two Factions. Queen Iſabel join'd with the Duke of Orleans. The Duke of Berry hover'd between both Parties, and had much ado to keep them from Acts of Hoſtility. The two grand Chiefs became at laſt ſo equal, that rather than yield to one another, they agreed to leave the Care of the Government to the King's Council. The Duke of Burgundy retir'd into the Netherlands, where he was Maſter of the Counties of Flanders and Artois, and of the Dutchy of Brabant, and died there in 1403, leaving for his Succeſſor John his eldeſt Son, who became Duke of Burgundy, and Earl of Flanders and Artois. The Princes his Brothers inherited the other Eſtates of their Father.

Parties in the Court and Kingdom of France.

Duke of Burgundy's Retirement and Death.

His Son and Succeſſor.

WHILE the new Duke of Burgundy was kept by his Affairs in the Netherlands, the Queen and the Duke of Orleans ſeiz'd the Government, but not much to the Satisfaction of the People, who ſaw themſelves ſaddled every Day with new Taxes. Mean time, the Duke of Burgundy marry'd Philip his Son, the Count de Charolois, to Michelle the King's Daughter, and gave one of his Daughters in Marriage to the Dauphin Lewis, the King's Son, who was but nine Years of Age.

SOME time after this, Charles VI, being in one of his calm Intervals, and hearing the Complaints made on both ſides againſt the Queen and Duke of Orleans, call'd an Aſſembly of the chief Men, to conſider of a Remedy for theſe Diſorders, and ſent for the Duke of Burgundy to be preſent, which the Duke obey'd; but he came ſo well attended, that at his Approach, the Queen and the Duke of Orleans thought fit to leave Paris, and to carry away the young Dauphin with them; but the Duke of Burgundy being inform'd of it, made ſuch great haſte that he overtook them, and reſcued the Dauphin out of their Hands, which occaſion'd an open Rupture betwixt the two Princes. They were reconcil'd to outward Appearance, but they ſtill hated each other as much as ever. In ſhort, not to enter into farther Particulars upon this Subject, it will be ſufficient to ſay, that in 1407, the Duke of Burgundy caus'd the Duke of Orleans to be aſſaſſinated. He had Courage enough to own that he was the Author of this Murder, and Credit enough to get a Pardon for it. But his Affairs calling him away into the Netherlands next Year, his Enemies took advantage of his abſence, and caus'd the Pardon to be revok'd.

Duke of Orleans aſſaſſinated by the Duke of Burgundy, who gets a Pardon for it.

His Pardon revok'd.

AT the ſame time, the Duke won a Battel over the Liegeois; and immediately after his Victory, march'd directly to Paris with 4000 Horſe. At his Approach the Queen fled to Tours, and carry'd the King along with her. Mean time, as ſhe did not find herſelf ſtrong enough to reſiſt the Duke, ſhe conſented to an Accommodation. The King receiv'd him into Favour, and reconcil'd him in all outward appearance to Charles Duke of Orleans, the eldeſt Son of the murder'd Duke; after which, the Duke of Burgundy remain'd Maſter of the Government, and of the King's Perſon.

His Victory over the Liegeois.

His Reconciliation with the young Duke of Orleans.

IT has been before obſerv'd, that in 1410 a powerful League was form'd at Gien againſt the Duke of Burgundy, the Heads of which were the Dukes of Berry, Orleans, Alençon, and the Count d' Armagnac, Governour of Languedoc, and Father-in-law to the Duke of Berry. It was at this time that the Titles of Burgundians and Armagnacs were given to Factions of the Burgundian and Armagnacs.

* So much has been ſaid of this King's Madneſs, that we have been curious to enquire into the Cauſe of it: Some Authors have aſcrib'd it to his being frighten'd by an Apparition, as he was riding thro' the Foreſt of Mans. But Mezeray, the moſt authentick Hiſtorian among the French, ſays, that as he was riding in a very hot ſultry Day, on an Expedition againſt the Duke of Bretagne, arm'd Cap a pie, and attended with his Page carrying his Lance, he dropp'd aſleep; and the Page happening to let his Lance fall upon his Helmet, it made him awake in ſuch a Fury, that he fell upon all that were about him, and had certainly kill'd ſome of them, if he had not been prevented by being laid hold on. His Diſtemper, ſays Mezeray, grew worſe by a Fright the next Year, when Dancing in a Maſk, the Clothes of his Fellow Maſquers being daub'd with Pitch and Roſin, took fire; ſo that before they could be undreſs'd, they were either burnt or ſtifled; which ſo frighten'd him, that he never recover'd his Senſes more.

the two Parties. The latter had its Name from the Count d' Armagnac, who by reason of his Abilities directed the Affairs of the whole Party. At first, the Duke of Burgundy, having receiv'd Assistance from Henry IV of England, had a great Advantage over his Enemies. Afterwards, the Armagnacs having also obtain'd considerable Assistance from that very King, oblig'd the Duke of Burgundy, who besieg'd them in Bourges, to grant them a Peace: But as it was upon Condition that none of their Chiefs should have leave to return to Court, the Duke of Burgundy remain'd Master of the King's Person.

Duke of Burgundy gets the better both of them and the Dauphin.

THE Armagnac Party being by this means considerably sunk, the Duke of Burgundy flatter'd himself that he should find no more Opposition, when a new Enemy started up against him, from whom he thought he had nothing to fear, viz. The Dauphin Lewis, his Son-in-law, who was at that time sixteen Years of Age. This young Prince being vex'd to see the Duke of Burgundy Manager of the Government, form'd a Design to supplant him. He imagin'd that neither the Duke nor any other Person but himself had a Right to pretend to the Administration of the Affairs of the State during the Illness of the King his Father. With this View he gain'd the Governour of the Bastile, and seiz'd that Fortress; upon which News the Parisians, at the secret Instigation of the Duke of Burgundy, took Arms; and a Surgeon, nam'd John of Troye, putting himself at the Head of ten or twelve Thousand Men, marches directly to the Dauphin's Palace, breaks open the Doors, and carries away the Prince's chief Favourites to Prison. This happen'd about the beginning of the Year 1413, while Henry IV of England lay ill of that Distemper, of which he died the 20th of March, as above, being succeeded by Henry V *.

Sedition at Paris against the Court.

AT the end of April, the Seditious of Paris, who were all Burgundians, committed fresh Outrages, as well against the King himself, as against the Dauphin, and oblig'd them both to put on the White Hood, which was the Badge of their Party. They were secretly abetted by the Duke of Burgundy, tho' they often carry'd things farther than he desir'd. The Dauphin had attempted to take the Power out of his Hands, and that was enough, tho' this young Prince was his Son-in-law, to render him odious to him, and to incline him to give him all the Mortification possible.

The Armagnac Party support the Dauphin against the Burgundians.

THE Dauphin seeing himself thus trampled upon, had recourse to the Armagnacs, who were a very numerous Party in Paris, tho' they liv'd in Oppression under the Government of the Duke of Burgundy. He so artfully conceal'd his Designs, that by the beginning of September there were 30,000 Men on a sudden up in Arms in Paris, all ready to support him. He put himself at their Head, and immediately scour'd the Streets of Paris with them, in order to terrify the Burghers, and to hinder them from assembling. This Action succeeded according to his Heart's Desire; for the Burgundians being terrify'd, abandon'd the Bastile, Louvre, and the Town-House, of which they were in possession, and thought of nothing but making their Escape. And their Chief seeing his Party in a Consternation, and not thinking himself strong enough to stem the Torrent, had no shift to make but to retire to Flanders.

THE Dauphin made no Improvement of that Turn which he had brought about in Affairs. The King his Father being in one of his sober Intervals immediately after this Revolution, took the Reins of Government into his own Hands, and sent for the young Duke of Orleans his Nephew, whom he made his chief Companion and Favourite. This young Prince laying hold of the Advantage, made the King publish thundering Declarations against the Duke of Burgundy, and order several of his Party, who were concern'd in the late Riot, to be executed. It was necessary to enter into this Detail of the Troubles of France, because Henry V regulated all his Motions by the Situation of Affairs in that Kingdom. It is now time to speak of some of the Pieces which we meet with in the beginning of the Ninth Tome of the Fœdera.

ALTHO' in the first Months of the Year 1413, the Duke of Burgundy had the Advantage over the Dauphin, by means of the Sedition which he rais'd in Paris, he plainly saw that it was too violent to be of long Continuance. The Dauphin being presumptive Heir to the Crown, must, in all Probability, get the better of him at last. His Age was the only Pretence

* Mr. RYMER in his Dedication of the Ninth Tome of the Fœdera to Queen Anne, gives her the following general Character of this Reign. "With this Tome, in order of time, you raise to Life, and set forth "the Acts and Atchievements of that most victorious Prince, your Royal Progenitor King Henry the Fifth: "In whose time for ever renowned is the Field of Agencourt; and to blazon it the more after the Mode of the "Times, an Herald is created by the Name of Agencourt. After various Adventures, Treaties of Peace, "and Operations of War, this Tome ends with a Peace, and a Marriage. In the Eighth Year of King Henry "the Fifth, the French are brought to an Agreement with him on his own Terms. In this, the eighth "Year of his Reign, the Great Peace, as they call'd it, and a Royal Marriage are concluded and solemniz'd."

of depriving him of the Adminiſtration of the publick Affairs during the King's Illneſs: But this Pretence could not hold long. Beſides, this Prince being already ſixteen Years old, was above the Age which begun the Majority of Kings, and by Conſequence deem'd capable of governing the State. For this reaſon the Duke of Burgundy believ'd, that in order to maintain himſelf in his Poſt, he ought before-hand to make ſure of Aſſiſtance from the new King of England. With this View he ſent ſeveral Ambaſſadors to Henry, as appears by the Paſſports which that King diſpatch'd to them.

Duke of Burgundy courts King Henry's Aſſiſtance.

Paſſports for his Ambaſſadors.

p. 7. THE firſt was for the Governour of Arras, with ſixteen Perſons; dated May the 10th, 1413 [e].

p. 14. THE ſecond was for a Baron, two Knights, and two Clergymen, all anonymous, who were to go over to England, certis de cauſis, with forty other Perſons; dated the 24th ditto [f].

THIS way of granting Paſſports without naming the Perſons ſent, nor thoſe from whom they came, makes it preſum'd that it was for ſome very ſecret Affair. The Sequel will ſhew that thoſe Envoys came from the Duke of Burgundy.

p. 27. THE third Paſſport was for Ralph le Maire, Provoſt of St. Donas of Bruges, and twenty-four others; dated 8 June the 14th, 1413.

WE ſhall find preſently that theſe Envoys had Orders to make the King a Propoſal of a firm Alliance with the Duke of Burgundy. This was before he was drove out of Paris, which did not happen 'till September.

WHETHER Henry had reſolv'd to make War againſt France before that time is uncertain: But be that as it will, as ſoon as he ſaw himſelf courted by the Duke of Burgundy, he either form'd that Deſign, or elſe was entirely confirm'd in it.

Henry's Ambaſſadors to France. Their Powers.

TOWARDS the middle of July, Henry ſent no leſs than ſix Ambaſſadors to France, viz. Henry Chicheley, Biſhop of St. David's, who was ſoon after made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Earl of Warwick, and four others, whoſe ſeveral Powers were all dated July the 14th, 1413 [h].

P. 34. THE firſt was to treat of an Alliance and perpetual Amity between Henry and the Duke of Burgundy.

P. 35. THE ſecond for renewing the Truce betwixt England and Flanders.

THE firſt of theſe Powers is a manifeſt Proof that the Duke of Burgundy had already caus'd the ſaid Alliance to be propos'd to the King, for the Reaſons abovemention'd.

FOR that Duke's Affairs ſeeming at that Juncture to be in the higheſt State of Proſperity, there's no manner of Appearance that it ſhould come into Henry's Head to propoſe any ſuch Alliance to the Duke.

THE ſecond was only to ſerve as a Pretence for thoſe ſecret Conferences which the ſaid Ambaſſadors were to have with the Duke.

THE third Power was to inform the Court of France of their Maſter's Intention to obſerve the Truce of twenty-eight Years, and to charge that Court to ſee it better obſerv'd than it had been in time paſt.

THE fourth was to treat with the Adverſary of France, concerning all the Differences which their Maſter had with him, and to conclude a Peace. p. 36.

THE fifth was for granting Paſſports to the Ambaſſadors of France to repair to a Place to be agreed on for the Conferences. p. 38.

THE Duke of Burgundy's Flight from Paris interrupted the Negotiation which related to him, and it was not reſum'd 'till ſome time after.

Truce with France. p. 56.

MEAN time, the Ambaſſadors of the two Courts, who were aſſembled at Lenlinghen, immediately after the Revolution which happen'd at the Court of France, and while the Duke of Orleans ſat at the Helm, concluded a Truce there from October the 1ſt 1413, to the 1ſt of June, 1414, which Truce is dated the 25th of September, 1413.

IN the Conferences which were held betwixt thoſe Ambaſſadors, the Engliſh gave the others to underſtand, that their Maſter inſiſted upon the renewing of the Treaty of Bretigny, and on the Reſtitution of every thing that had been taken from his Predeceſſors ſince that Treaty. The Court of France alarm'd at this Demand, immediately ſent Ambaſſadors to Henry, the Archbiſhop of Bourges, the Conſtable of Albret, and one of the King's Secretaries, nam'd Goutier Col. Their Paſſports are dated the 8th of October, 1413 [i]. and their Commiſſion on the 11th of November following [k].

French King's Embaſſy to Henry.

Their Paſſports, 60. Commiſſion, 69.

THIS was probably with a View to ſift Henry's Inclination; for their Power was only to prolong the Truce.

ON the 10th of January, 1414, Henry nominated Commiſſioners to treat with thoſe Ambaſſadors. It appears by another Piece in the Fœdera, that in this Conference the Engliſh renew'd their King's Demand, relating to the Treaty of Bretigny. The French anſwer'd, they had no Inſtructions upon that Head. Nevertheleſs, vertheleſs, they, as it were of their own Heads, propos'd one way which they thought proper for procuring the Peace between the two Crowns, and that was Henry's Marriage with the Princeſs Catherine, their Maſter's only Daughter that remain'd unmarried. Henry could not think by any means that this was a proper method to procure Peace, and he ſtill inſiſted upon Reſtitution as the only effectual Way. However, as there was nothing in the Marriage propos'd to him that was incompatible with the Reſtitution demanded, he was willing that there ſhould be a Treaty upon both thoſe Methods; whereupon the Truce was prolong'd to the 2d of February, 1415 [l]. Which done, the Ambaſſadors of France return'd to Paris. By this we ſee the Miſtake of the French Hiſtorians who ſay that the Propoſal of this Marriaage came firſt from the King of England. But this is not an Error of any great Conſequence.

FOUR Days after the ſigning of the Truce, viz. on the 28th of January, Henry nominated Ambaſſadors for the Court of France, by an Inſtrument dated at Weſtminſter.

Henry's Ambaſſadors to France, 102.

THE following are ſome Acts in this Tome of the Fœdera which are capable of illuſtrating this matter.

1. HENRY's Engagement that he will not contract Marriage with any other Woman but the Princeſs Catherine, before the firſt of May following [m].

His Promiſe to marry none but Princeſs Catherine. 103, 104.

2. A POWER to his Ambaſſadors to prolong that Term [n].

3. A SAFE Conduct from the King for Ralph le Maire, Provoſt of St. Donaſt in Bruges, and for four other Envoys from the Duke of Burgundy; dated January the 29th, 1414 [o].

Paſſport for the Duke of Burgundy's Envoys. 112.

4. ANOTHER of the ſame kind for Roland de Hutkerke, Envoy from the ſame Duke, dated April the 2d, 1414 [p].

THE Court of France having found ſomething amiſs in the Powers of the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, or perhaps being willing to gain Time, deſir'd Henry to ſend them other Ambaſſadors with more extenſive Powers. Upon this Demand the King appointed ſeven other Ambaſſadors on the 31ſt of May, 1414 [q], and gave them a Commiſſion to treat with the Court of France on the two Methods propos'd on both ſides for a Peace, viz. Reſtitution and Marriage.

More Ambaſſadors ſent to France. 131.

5. A COMMISSION from the King to the Lord Scroop and four others, to treat with the Envoys of the Duke of Burgundy, then in England, about the King's Marriage with the Princeſs Catherine; dated June the 4th, 1414 [r].

Commiſſioners appointed to treat of his Marriage. 136.

BEFORE we proceed to the other Pieces in this Tome, it is abſolutely neceſſary to give an account of what paſs'd in France from the beginning of the Year 1414.

THE Duke of Orleans, who govern'd in the King's Name, fearing leſt the Dauphin ſhould ſerve him the ſame Trick as he had play'd the Duke of Burgundy, kept ſuch a ſtrict Hand over him, that the young Prince was no better than a Priſoner in the Louvre. Such a State of Confinement not at all ſuiting with the Dauphin's Humour, he ſecretly call'd the Duke of Burgundy to his Aſſiſtance; whereupon the Duke immediately put himſelf at the Head of an Army, and advanc'd near Paris. He was welcom'd at Noyon, Soiſſons, and Compiegne, and made himſelf Maſter of St. Denys.

Duke of Burgundy marches to the Deliverance of the Dauphin.

BUT his Party being ſo weak in Paris that he could not enter that City, he retir'd. Immediately after his Retreat, the King publiſh'd a thundering Declaration againſt him; and it was reſolv'd in Council to go to War with him. For this end, the King went himſelf to St. Denys to fetch the Auriflamb *, as if he was going to march againſt an Enemy of the State.

Council reſolves to go to War with him.

IT was while Preparations were making in France for this War, that the Duke of Burgundy ſent thoſe Ambaſſadors to England, whoſe Paſſports are mention'd above. In order to know what was their Commiſſion, one need only conſider the Powers which Henry gave to his Commiſſioners to treat with them.

THE firſt was to treat with the Duke's Ambaſſadors about the King's Marriage with Catherine, Daughter of his Adverſary of France. Nevertheleſs, at that very time, the Duke of Burgundy was not only without any Credit at the Court of France, but alſo a declar'd Enemy of the State.

Powers given to Henry's Commiſſioners, 136.

THE ſecond Power was for treating with the Ambaſſadors aforeſaid, about a League, Confederacy, and perpetual, or temporary Friendſhip between Henry and his Succeſſors, Kings of England, on one part; and on the other, their moſt dear Couſin John Duke of Burgundy, his Succeſſors, Subjects and Vaſſals, and all his Dominions whatſoever they 137.

THE third Power was for receiving Homage from the Duke of Burgundy, as the King's Vaſſal.

p. 138. FROM all this it is plain enough that the Duke of Burgundy, when he ſaw all the Forces of France ready to fall upon him, deſir'd Aſſiſtance from the King of England; that he offer'd to become his Vaſſal, and to bring about his Marriage with Catherine to his Satisfaction, provided that by his means he might recover the Poſt which he had left at the Court of France. Therefore Mezeray might well ſay that the Arms of England were brought into France by the French themſelves. Yet no Hiſtorian that I know of has ſpoke of theſe ſecret Intrigues between Henry and the Duke of Burgundy, before the beginning of the War; theſe private Memoirs being to be met with no where but in Mr. Rymer's Collection, and yet abſolutely neceſſary for underſtanding the Hiſtory of that time. For it is very probable that Henry would not have thought of aſſerting his Pretenſions to France, if the Duke of Burgundy had not courted his Friendſhip. Nevertheleſs, this Negotiation came to nothing at that Juncture, becauſe of the Turn that happen'd to the Duke of Burgundy's Affairs, of which it is neceſſary to give a brief Hint.

THE King of France being in the Field, recover'd thoſe Places which the Duke had taken. And afterwards, the Flemings having refus'd to ſerve the Duke againſt France, the Duke of Bourbon, who had been detach'd towards Artois, made himſelf Maſter of Bapaume. Nor was the Deſign to ſtop there; but, happily for the Duke, the King relaps'd into his Frenzy, which gave him leiſure to fortify Arras, and to put a ſtrong Garriſon into it.

Charles of France relapſes.

The Dauphin aſſumes the Regency.

As ſoon as the King was attack'd with his old Diſtemper, the Dauphin aſſum'd the Regency, which the Duke of Orleans had no Right to diſpute with him. He carry'd the King, ſick as he was, to the Siege of Arras, where he met with more Difficulty than he expected; ſo that without more ado it was reſolv'd in Council to grant to the Duke of Burgundy a Peace; but it was upon hard Conditions: It is true that he had an Amneſty with it, but 500 of his Followers were excepted out of it. Moreover, it was agreed that he ſhould come no more to Court, and that the King's Banners ſhould be hung out upon the Walls of Arras. The Duke who was glad he came off, put a Stop to his Negotiations with England for a time.

He grants Peace to Duke of Burgundy.

WE left at Paris ſeven Ambaſſadors from England ſent to treat with the Court of France upon the two Methods propos'd for Peace, viz. Reſtitution and Marriage.

THESE Ambaſſadors in the beginning of March, met the Commiſſioners of the King of France at Paris, with the Duke of Berry at the Head of them. We have in this Tome the authentick Protocol of their Conferences, which being too long to be inſerted here at large, I ſhall only give the Subſtance of it.

Protocol of the Conference betwixt the Ambaſſadors of England and the Commiſſioners of France. 208.

At firſt, the Ambaſſadors of England demanded the whole Kingdom of France: Afterwards, they contented themſelves with demanding the Reſtitution of Normandy, Touraine, Anjou, Maine, all that France poſſeſs'd in Guyenne, all that was yielded to Edward III by the Treaty of Bretigny, all the Country ſituate between Gravelin and the River of Soamme, the Homage for Bretagne, and the abſolute Sovereignty of the Countries mention'd in this Article.

THE French Commiſſioners having made ſeveral Objections to thoſe Demands, and ſeveral Offers on their part, the Engliſh reduc'd themſelves to theſe four Articles.

1. THE Treaty of Bretigny. 2. Half of Provence, and the Counties of Beaufort and Nogent. 3. Six Hundred Thouſand Crowns of Gold for the Arrears of the Ranſom of King John. 4. Two Millions of Gold for Princeſs Catherine's Dowry.

To theſe Demands the Duke of Berry return'd theſe Anſwers in Writing. 1. He offer'd to reſtore Agenois to England with the Bazadois, Auch in part, the Perigord, Bigorre, Saintonge beyond the Charente, le Quercy except Montauban, the Angoumois and la Rouergne.

To the ſecond Article he anſwers, that the King his Nephew had no Lands in Provence, and that he never had any thing there which belong'd to the Engliſh.

To the third, that ſince the King of France offers to yield ſo many fair Provinces, the King of England ought to forbear making any farther Demands.

To the fourth, that the King offer'd 600,000 Crowns of Gold for Princeſs Catherine's Dowry.

AFTER many Debates, the Engliſh ſtill perſiſting in their former Demands, as to the three firſt Articles, reduc'd themſelves in the fourth to a Dowry of one Million of Crowns in Gold.

THE Duke of Berry perſiſting in like manner in his Offers to the three firſt Articles, went ſo far as to offer 800,000 Crowns of Gold for the Dowry.

THE chief Difficulty lay in this, that Henry wanted to have the Sovereignty of all that ſhould be yielded to him, where-as France would only give it him in Fief or in Domain, according to the then State of each Place. The Conference ended the 13th of March.

FOEDERA Tom. IX.

FROM that time to the breaking out of the War, there were various Negotiations, reciprocal Embaſſies, and Conferences upon the Articles which were debated in the laſt.

IT was in a manner impoſſible that a Peace could be made upon the Footing propos'd by Henry, without compelling France to it by Arms; which was what Henry hop'd likewiſe for an Opportunity of doing, becauſe of the inteſtine Diviſions of that Kingdom.

HE very well knew that he ſhould only have to do with one of the Parties, ſince they hated each other too heartily to unite againſt him. Beſides, he did not deſpair of gaining the Duke of Burgundy. Therefore in a Parliament which aſſembled at Leiceſter the 31ſt of May, 1414, a War againſt France was reſolv'd on; and the Parliament granted the King the neceſſary Subſidies to prepare for it.

War voted by Parliament againſt France.

THE reſt of the Year 1414, was ſpent in unſucceſsful Negotiations. All that France aim'd at was to gain Time and amuſe Henry, who, on his Part, ſtill decoy'd her with the Hopes that if the Marriage propos'd took effect, he might probably recede from a part of his Pretenſions. It was with this View that he prolong'd from time to time the voluntary Engagement which he had enter'd into upon account of Catherine, as we find in ſeveral Acts of this Tome. During that time, Ambaſſadors were continually going and coming betwixt Paris and London. And it is for this Cauſe we find ſo many Paſſports and Commiſſions here, during that Interval, for treating of a Peace and a Marriage. But this was only for the Amuſement of one another.

AMONG the Acts of this Year, we have a Paſſport for an Envoy from the Duke Orleans; dated November the 1ſt [s]. This gives ſome colour for preſuming that the Duke courted the Protection of England, tho' it is but Conjecture.

On the 15th of January, 1415, the Truce was prolong'd to the 1ſt of May, and from thence at ſeveral times to the 15th of July following [u].

FRANCE was govern'd at that time by the Dauphin Lewis, a preſumptuous young Prince, who 'till then thought of amuſing Henry by ſham Negotiations. Mean time, the Preparations that were making in England open'd the Eyes of his Council, and made them reſolve to ſend over twelve Ambaſſadors, with the Archbiſhop of Bourges at the Head of them. Their Paſſport is dated April the 13th, 1415 [x].

THE Embaſſy of the Archbiſhop of Bourges came to nothing more than a Prolongation of the Truce from the 10th of June, 1415, to the 15th of July following.

THE King having made his Laſt Will and Teſtament, dated at Southampton the 24th of July, 1415, wherein he only bequeath'd certain Legacies to his Favourites and Domeſticks, was juſt ready to embark on the 5th of Auguſt, when he diſcover'd a Conſpiracy by the Earl of Cambridge, the Duke of York's Brother, and by the Lord Scroop, who were puniſh'd according to their Deſerts. The Engliſh Hiſtorians ſay that France gave or promis'd them a Million of Livres to kill the King: But we find nothing like it in the Confeſſion of the Earl of Cambridge, in this Tome, which ſhews that their only Deſign was to ſet up Edmund Mortimer Earl of March in his room, who was the very Man that diſcover'd the Conſpiracy to the King.

all together they will make an Army of 100,000 Men. This Letter is dated at Calais, October the 7th, 1415.

ALTHO' the Acts of this Tome make little mention of this Battel, which was actually fought at Agincourt on the 25th of October, yet they ſuppoſe it in very many Places. Beſides, the Victory which Henry obtain'd there, is in a manner the Foundation of all the Events that we are to ſpeak of hereafter. Therefore we are under ſome Neceſſity of giving a brief Account of it.

AFTER Henry had made himſelf Maſter of Harfleur, he lay encamp'd near that Town 'till it was repair'd, and never ſtirr'd 'till the end of September, or the beginning of October. During this, one third of the Army was carry'd off by a Bloody Flux, and another third diſabled from bearing Arms; which ſad Circumſtance conſider'd, and how far the Seaſon was advanc'd, made him reſolve to retire to Calais. He hop'd to be able to paſs the Soamme at the Ford of Blanquetaque, where Edward III paſs'd it the Day before the Battel of Creſſy; but when he came to it he found it impracticable. This made him reſolve to trace the River to its very Fountain but he would find a Paſſage. During this, the Conſtable d' Albret, who commanded the French Army, having receiv'd ſeveral Reinforcements, and being at the Head of above 100,000 Men, did not give himſelf any trouble about guarding the Soamme; but on the contrary wiſh'd that the Engliſh would paſs it, that it might not be in their Power to avoid a Battel. Therefore he went to expect them in the County of St. Pol, hard by a Caſtle nam'd Agincourt; where King Henry met him, and with 15 or 20,000 Men (ſome ſay but 9000) all tir'd, and oblig'd to fight naked from the Waiſt downward, becauſe of the Diſtemper which hung upon them, there did he put that great Army to the rout. The Conſtable d' Albret, the Duke d' Alençon, the Dukes of Brabant and Nevers, Brothers to the Duke of Burgundy, and a great many other Lords of Diſtinction fell in the Battel. Among the Priſoners were the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Counts d' Eu, Vendoſme, Richemont, the Marſhal de Boucicaut, the Sire d' Etouteville, and many others of an inferior Rank *. Next Day, the victorious King continu'd his March towards Calais, and afterwards return'd with his Priſoners to England, where he arriv'd the 16th of November. And thus ended the Year 1415.

Battel of Agincourt.

King's Return to England with his Priſoners. 1327.

IT was natural to ſuppoſe that after ſo great a Victory, Henry would not have fail'd to purſue the Blow. But all the Year 1416, and half of the next were ſpent in Negotiations; during which he did not ſeem to make the leaſt Preparation to carry his Arms again into France, where he had made ſo ſucceſsful a beginning of the War. This Conduct of his has been darkly accounted for by Hiſtorians; but the Acts of this Tome of the Fœdera clear it up to Satisfaction; for we find that he wholly employ'd the Year 1416, in Negotiations with the Duke of Burgundy, in order to bring him into his Intereſt; which was a Point of greater Advantage to him than the winning of another Battel, or the Reduction of many Towns. And by the way, I cannot but think that the King in this Conduct of his made an eminent Diſcovery that his Wiſdom was equal to his Valour. We are now to give an account of his Negotiations, as well with the Court of France as with the Duke of Burgundy, which are the Subject of the Acts of the Year, 1417. But for this end it is neceſſary, in the firſt Place, to ſee how things ſtood at the French Court after the Battel of Agincourt; becauſe, according to the Situation of Affairs there, Henry regulated his whole Conduct.

His Reaſon for not purſuing his Victory.

THE Conſternation throughout France giving the Duke of Burgundy Hopes of being reſtor'd to the Adminiſtration, he thought it his Duty not to let this Opportunity ſlip. For this Purpoſe, about a Month after the Battel, he march'd at the Duke of Burgundy marches an Army to Paris.

* HARDING an Engliſh Hiſtorian, who was in this Battel, ſays, that King Henry's Army conſiſted of no more than 9000 Men. Walſingham reports that they were but 8000, and the French Hiſtorians make them but 25000 at moſt; whereas the ſame Authors, both Engliſh and French, agree that the Conſtable's Army conſiſted of 140,000 at leaſt. Dr. Parnel's Chronicle ſays, that when King Henry ſent out David Gam, Commander of a Company of Welſhmen, to view the Enemy, he brought back word, There were enough to be kill'd, enough to be taken Priſoners, and enough to run away. The King expos'd his Life to the greateſt Danger, by fighting on foot in the Front of his Army; for Le Fevre, who was alſo in the Battel, ſays, that 18 French Gentlemen, having combin'd to kill him, or periſh in the Attempt, charg'd him ſo cloſe that one of them with his Battel-Ax ſtruck him on the Creſt of his Helmet, and brought him to his Knees; but they were all kill'd on the Spot. As for the Loſs of the Engliſh in this Battel, Monſtrelet makes the Number kill'd to be 1700, and le Fenin, another French Hiſtorian, but 4 or 500. Caxton affirms there were but 26 Engliſh Soldiers kill'd, and Walſingham ſays not many more, viz. The Duke of York, the Earl of Suffolk, 4 Knights, 1 Eſquire, and 28 common Soldiers. Le Fevre writes, that of the French 10,000 were kill'd, of whom 100 were Princes, and 7000 Noblemen. Juvenal des Urſins makes the French Priſoners 14,000; and all Authors agree that they were as many as the Number of the Engliſh Army. For the Particulars of the Action, the Reader need only conſult Goodwin's Hiſtory of this Reign. We ſhall only add from Stow, that the King, when he return'd to London with the chief Priſoners, was met at St. Thomas of Waterings by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Clergy, who made a joyful Proceſſion, in which the Prieſts brought out the Relicks of 70 Saints.

Head of an Army directly to Paris. But the Dauphin had taken such Precautions to keep him out that he could not enter. Mean time, this young Prince either to be reveng'd of his Father-in-law, or because he did not think himself qualified to steer at the Helm alone in so violent a Storm, sent for the Count d' Armagnac, a mortal Enemy of the Duke of Burgundy, to give him the Constable's Staff. The Count arriving accordingly at Paris, on the 20th of December, was invested in his Office; and in five Days after, the Dauphin died, not without suspicion of having been poison'd.

The Count d' Armagnac made Constable of France.

Dauphin's Death.

Constable assumes the Regency with a high Hand.

AFTER the Dauphin's Death, the new Constable assum'd the Government with such absolute Authority that he seem'd to act not so much like a Minister as a Sovereign. He observ'd no Measures with the Duke of Burgundy; but all the Burgundian Soldiers, that were made Prisoners, were hang'd without Mercy; and the Inhabitants of Paris, who were of his Party, were expos'd to continual Insults.

A new Dauphin.

KING Charles had two Sons still alive, viz. John Duke of Touraine, and Charles Earl of Ponthieu. The first, who by the Death of his elder Brother was become Dauphin, liv'd with the Earl of Hainault, whose Daughter he had marry'd. This Prince, by the Advice of the Earl his Father-in-law, sent Orders to both Parties to lay down their Arms, by vertue of his Right to command during the Indisposition of the King his Father. The Duke of Burgundy obey'd, and retir'd to Flanders; but the Constable, perceiving that the Dauphin had a mind to continue Neuter in the Quarrel, refus'd to receive his Orders, unless he would declare himself openly against the Burgundian Party. The Dauphin could not think of complying with this Condition, and wisely judg'd that a Prince, who has the Government of a State committed to him, cannot upon such Occasions declare himself the Head of a Party, without doing himself a vast Prejudice. This Refusal furnish'd the Count d' Armagnac with a Pretence to keep the Authority in his own Hands, while the Dauphin was still in Hainault.

The Constable refuses Obedience to him.

Duke of Burgundy negotiates with England.

ALL this while, the Duke of Burgundy renew'd his Negotiations with the King of England. And among the Acts of the beginning of this Year 1416, there are several Passports for his Envoys. The Pretence was sometimes the renewing the Commercial Truce between the English and the Flemings, and at other times a certain Affair depending in the Council of Constance. We shall see presently what was the Issue of all those Embassies.

The Reason of Henry's not pushing on the War in France.

THIS Negotiation betwixt Henry and the Duke of Burgundy was the true Cause of the Interruption of the War. The Duke had great Domains in France, and the Earls of Flanders and Artois in the Netherlands. Moreover, he was in France the Chief of a powerful, though oppress'd Party, which bid fair to get the better again, as it actually did. Therefore it was good Policy in Henry to bring over this Prince to his Interests. He was wise enough to see that the Duke only courted his Alliance to make use of him at a time of Necessity, when he might happen to be too much press'd: The Duke, therefore, was to be drove, to take this Step out of despair of being otherwise able to make Head against his Enemies. For this Reason Henry took care not to press France, as knowing very well that all the Advantages he should obtain, would only retard the Execution of this Project. The more Victories he had gain'd, the more the Constable's Credit would have been ruin'd; by Consequence the Duke of Burgundy might have been restor'd to the Government, and have had no farther occasion for Assistance from England. It was therefore advantagious for Henry that Affairs in France should continue on the present Footing. It was absolutely necessary that the Constable should preserve his Authority, and that he should persecute the Burgundians without Control; to the end that Disgust and a Desire of Revenge might push on the Duke of Burgundy to take a Step which he would never have done, if he could have found any other Method to ruin his Enemies. That was without Dispute the true Cause of the Interruption of the War on the Part of Henry; but he had like to have been grosly mistaken in his Politicks.

Emperor Sigismund goes to France and England to mediate a Peace.

THE Emperor Sigismund went to France in the beginning of this Year, to mediate a Peace between the two Kings; but he did not find that Disposition at the Court which was necessary for the Success of his good Offices. Therefore in the Month of April, he pass'd over to England, whither the Earl of Holland went also with the same Design. The Constable d' Armagnac, who was very cunning, perceiving the Officiousness of these two Princes, thought to make use of them to lull Henry to sleep, and rob him of Harfleur. With this View he consented that they should find out Expedients to procure a Truce, which might pave the way for a Peace. Upon this Consent of his, the two Princes Mediators agreed with Henry on a Truce of four Years; during which Harfleur was to be put into their Hands upon certain Terms, of which the French Princes, who were Prisoners in England, were to be engag'd for the Performance. This is a Fact which, tho' not mention'd by the Historians, is evident from one of the Acts in this Tome [z]. While Henry was laid asleep with the Hopes of this Truce, the Conſtable under various Pretexts brought all his Troops down upon Normandy. When he was ready, the Captive Princes refus'd to ſign the Treaty, which by that Means was of no effect. At the ſame time the Conſtable went and beſieg'd Harfleur, the Garriſon of which Henry had neglected to reinforce.

Conſtable beſieges Harfleur.

THE King ſeeing himſelf thus bubbled, was reſolv'd in his Turn to have recourſe to Craft, and to propoſe a Truce, that he might have time to prepare Succours for Harfleur. This he did by an Inſtrument, dated June the 28th, 1416 [a]. After this, he deſir'd an Interview with his Couſin of France, by an Inſtrument of the ſame Date. But the Conſtable of France was deaf to all theſe Propoſals; ſo that Henry had no Chance left but the Fortune of War. He hop'd that the Valour and Experience of the Earl of Dorſet his Uncle, who commanded in Harfleur, would give him time to prepare Succours. It appears by ſeveral Acts in this Tome, dated at Weſtminſter, from the 3d of June to the 22d of July, that the King deſign'd to go in Perſon to relieve that Place; but at laſt, upon the Emperor's Sollicitation, he gave a Commiſſion for that Purpoſe to his Brother the Duke of Bedford [b]. The Duke putting to Sea towards the latter end of July, beat the Viſcount de Narbonne, who kept the Place block'd up by Sea, and by that Means the Conſtable was oblig'd to raiſe the Siege.

WE left the Dauphin John in Hainault, refuſing to accept the Condition on which depended his Return to the Court of the King his Father. The Duke of Burgundy hearing that he was diſpos'd to continue Neuter, went to Valenciennes in the beginning of the Year to diſcourſe with him. In the Conference which he had with him and the Earl of Hainault it was agreed, that the Dauphin ſhould make his Appearance in France, in order to take that Rank upon him which was due to his Birth; and that if he was receiv'd, he ſhould ſend for the Duke to Court; but if not, that then he ſhould, in concert with the Duke and the Earl of Hainault, take fitting Meaſures to deliver the King his Father from Captivity.

Negotiations betwixt the Duke of Burgundy and the Dauphin.

ACCORDING to this Reſolution the Dauphin went to Compiegne, where he ſtopp'd while the Earl of Hainault proceeded to Paris, to negotiate the Affair. When he had once ſignify'd that it was the Dauphin's Intention to recal the Duke of Burgundy, they would not hear a Word more that he had to ſay; whereupon the Earl could not help letting fall ſome Menaces, which alarm'd the Conſtable and all his Party. But to make themſelves eaſy they got the Dauphin poiſon'd at Compiegne, where he died the 16th of April, 1416, and not in 1417, as Mezeray has aſſerted in his Abridgment.

Dauphin poiſon'd.

A Miſtake of Mezeray about the time.

BY the Death of John the Dauphin, his Brother Charles, Earl of Ponthieu, became Dauphin and preſumptive Heir of the Crown. This young Prince, who was but fourteen Years of Age, devoted himſelf entirely to the Conſtable, through the Inſtigation of the King of Sicily his Father-in-law, who was the Duke of Burgundy's ſworn Enemy. Then the Duke's Affairs grew worſe and worſe. The Conſtable having ſhew'd no Mercy to the Burgundians, and choſe to ſacrifice John the Dauphin, rather than be expos'd to the Hazard of ſeeing his Enemy triumph, the Duke had no other ſhift to make but to throw himſelf into the Arms of the King of England. Therefore, without more ado, he gave Orders to his Envoys at London, to ſettle an Interview betwixt him and the King in October following at Calais. The King's Orders for this Purpoſe are dated at Weſtminſter the 5th and 7th of Auguſt, 1416.

The new Dauphin is attach'd to the Conſtable of France.

Interview ſettled betwixt King Henry and the Duke of Burgundy, 374, 375.

WHILE this Affair was negotiating at London, it happen'd that the Burgundians of Paris form'd a Conſpiracy to deliver up one of the Gates of that City to their Chief; which being diſcover'd, the Conſtable caus'd the Conſpirators to be puniſh'd in ſuch a manner as compleated the Duke of Burgundy's Deſpair, and forc'd him to take that Step which he had ſo long deferr'd. Therefore, without any farther Regard for the Court of France, he caus'd a Truce to be concluded with Henry, by his Envoys at London, for all their Dominions reſpectively, 'till the Feaſt of St. Michael, 1417. This Truce was publiſh'd at Calais in the Month of Auguſt. But his Revenge did not ſtop here; for his Envoy engag'd in his Name, that he would own Henry for King of France, that he would perform Homage to him, and that he would take an Oath of Allegiance to him. But this Engagement was kept ſecret, the better to ſerve the Deſigns both of the King and Duke.

The different Turn given to this Matter by Mezeray.

MEZERAY ſays, " That the Thirſt " of Dominion ſo far tranſported the " Duke of Burgundy, that he went to " confer with the King of England at " Calais, and there concluded a ſeparate " Truce with him, whereby he engag'd " in one reſpect not to aſſiſt the King of " France his Sovereign." But beſides that the Truce was already concluded and proclaim'd at Calais before the Duke went thither, the Inſtrument we have juſt now inſerted is a very plain Evidence that the Affair tranſacted betwixt Henry and the Duke was very wide from a ſeparate Truce.

His groſs Miſtake about the Dauphin.

I SHALL obſerve here by the way, that Mezeray is guilty of a capital Error, which has very much confounded the Hiſtory of this Time, by ſaying that the Duke of Burgundy went from Calais to confer with the Dauphin John, who was dead ſix Months before ; and by placing his Death in the Year 1417, whereas he died in April, 1416. This is manifeſt from the Letters Patent juſt now mention'd, wherein the Duke makes a League with Henry againſt the Dauphin. Now this Dauphin could be no other than Charles, who was his ſworn Enemy, whereas John, as has been before obſerv'd, was his Friend. But I have made this Remark not ſo much to point out an Error of Mezeray, as to ſhew the Uſefulneſs of the Fœdera.

French Court's Jealouſy of the Interview betwixt Henry and the Duke of Burgundy.

WHILE Henry was at Calais, France being alarm'd at the Interview which he was to have with the Duke of Burgundy, ſent the Archbiſhop of Rheims thither, with five other Ambaſſadors, on pretence of negotiating a Peace ; but according to all Appearance it was only to diſcover what paſs'd. It ſeems by all the Hiſtories of France that they were not able to dive into the Secret, tho' afterwards the Proceedings of the Duke of Burgundy made it groſly ſuſpected that he was too good a Friend to the Engliſh. In the mean time, this Alliance betwixt the King and the Duke of Burgundy, is as it were the Hinge on which the principal Events that happen'd before and after it turn. From hence it is eaſy to perceive how imperfect moſt Hiſtories are, and how uſeful this Collection may be to ſuch as ſhall happen hereafter to write the Hiſtory of England.

A farther Note upon the Uſefulneſs of the Fœdera.

Truce with France, 397.

Henry's League with the Emperor, 377.

AMONG the Acts of the Year 1416, there's a Treaty of Alliance betwixt the Emperor Sigiſmund and Henry, againſt France, which League was ſign'd at Canterbury the 15th of Auguſt, as the Emperor was on the Road for Calais. This ſhews that the Emperor was not an impartial Mediator ; for tho' he had receiv'd no Injury from the Court of France, he made a League againſt that Nation with its Enemy, pretending this reaſon for it, that he had not been ſucceſsful in making a Peace betwixt the two Crowns. This Treaty ſhews, moreover, that Sigiſmund did not undertake this Voyage, nor ſtay ſo long in France and England, with no View to his own Intereſt, as he would have had it believ'd. We find by the Treaty, that Henry engag'd himſelf to procure him the Enjoyment of certain Provinces he claim'd in France, and the Homage of certain Countries which are not nam'd in the Act, but it is ſuppos'd they were Provence and Dauphiny. And Sigiſmund engag'd on his part to aſſiſt Henry with all his Power to conquer the whole Kingdom of France. It appears likewiſe by ſome Acts in this Tome, that after the ſigning of the League againſt France, the Emperor being then at Calais, ſtill continued the Office of Mediator between the two Crowns, France knowing nothing all the while of his Engagements to Henry : But whether this was ſtrictly honourable or not is no hard matter to judge. In short, we find in several places of this Tome, that there was a firm Union, and entire Correspondence betwixt the Emperor and Henry.

Henry's Embassies to foreign Powers to assist him in his War with France. 410, 412, 414, 415, 419.

As soon as the King of England had made sure of the Assistance of the Duke of Burgundy, he turn'd all his Thoughts to War; and with this View he sent Ambassadors to Arragon, Castile, Germany, the Hanse Towns, and to the Republick of Genoa, in order to get Succours from all those Dominions, or at least to engage them to observe a Neutrality. All these Commissions we find among the Acts of December [h].

Another of Mezeray's Anachronisms discover'd.

BEFORE we proceed to the Acts of 1417, it may not be improper to observe another of Mezeray's Errors in Chronology, when he places Henry's second Descent on France in the Year 1416, whereas it is certain it was not undertaken 'till the end of July 1417, as is evident from several Acts in this Tome, and from the whole Series of the History.

Henry's Letter to Tiptoft, 417.

AMONG the Acts in January 1417, there's a Letter from the King to Tiptoft, his Ambassador to the Emperor Sigismund, in which he communicates a Secret to him, with Orders to tell it to none but the Emperor himself. It is dated the 25th. The Subject of it was as follows.

Private Negotiations betwixt Henry and the French Prisoners.

"THE Princes and other French Prisoners of distinction, who were in England, had made a Proposal to the King of a separate Agreement with him. But upon Henry's requiring of them to own him for King of France, the Duke of Orleans answer'd for one and all, that they could not treat upon that Foot. Some time after, the Duke of Bourbon desir'd a private Audience of him, and told him that since they had the Honour to talk with him, they had sent People into France to inform themselves exactly of his Right to that Kingdom, and that they had receiv'd such Light from them as they never had before. That for his own part, since he had heard that his Majesty had offer'd to quit all Claim to the Crown of France, provided he might have those Lands restor'd which were yielded to Edward III, in the Treaty of Bretigny, with the Addition of Normandy; he thought it so reasonable a Proposal, that the Peace not only might, but ought to be made upon that Condition; and he gave him also to understand that this was the Sentiment of the other Prisoners.

"UPON this Foundation he desir'd his Permission to go to France, there to sollicit the Court in the Name of all the rest to accept this Proposal. And if they refus'd to consent to it, he would engage to put his Places into sure Hands, and return to England, where he would not only pay him Homage, but swear Allegiance to him. At the same time he begg'd him to keep it secret, because of the Danger he should run if it were discover'd during his stay in France. Upon this Engagement the King gave him a limited Furlough, after having receiv'd his Son as a Hostage, and Security for 200,000 Crowns." This is what the King charged Tiptoft to discover to the Emperor, in order to have his Opinion. At the same time he commanded him to tell that Prince, that this should not retard the Expedition he had design'd against France; but we find no Consequence attending this Affair, therefore I imagine that it was only a Trick of the Constable d' Armagnac, who put the Duke of Bourbon upon this Action, on purpose to lull Henry asleep with the Hopes of this Negotiation, and to retard his Preparations. The Duke of Bourbon did nothing in France; and tho' he return'd to England, he did not perform his Engagement. We find a great many Acts in this Tome relating to this Affair. And perhaps the Order which the King issued to shut up the Duke of Orleans in Pontefract Castle, was a Consequence of it. This Order was dated [i] the first of June, 1417.

Duke of Orleans committed to Pontefract Castle, 456.

Henry and the Constable amuse each other.

WHILE Henry was preparing to carry his Arms again into France, the Constable d' Armagnac endeavour'd to retard him by fresh Negotiations. And Henry in his Turn paid him in the same Coin, by never refusing to enter into a Treaty, tho' he did not lose one Moment in his Preparations for War. And this is the Substance of many Acts in the beginning of the Year 1417.

Truce with the Duke of Burgundy. 451.

WE find in this Tome, that during that time Envoys came to London every now and then from the Duke of Burgundy, on pretence of renewing the Truce, which indeed was prolong'd by an Act dated the 8th of May [k]; but that was not the real Motive of those Embassies. Probably the Business was to concert with the King that Diversion which the Duke propos'd to make while the King attack'd Normandy. The Constable himself furnish'd the Duke with a Pretext for taking Arms, tho' it did not appear that it was in favour of the King of England.

[h] Those to Arragon, Germany, the Hanse Towns and Genoa, are dated the 2d of that Month at Westminster, and that to Castile is dated on the 15th. [i] At New-Sarum. [k] At Calais.

THO'

FOEDERA TOM. IX.

THOUGH Queen Iſabel, the Wife of King Charles, was no Friend of the Duke of Burgundy's, yet ſhe was a continual Thorn in the Sides of the Conſtable, who was afraid ſhe would find means to remove him from the Government, either by gaining over the King her Husband in ſome of his calm Intervals, or at leaſt the Dauphin her Son. To ward off this Blow, he fill'd the Heads of both the King and the Dauphin with ſo many Jealouſies againſt this Princeſs, that he caus'd her to be baniſh'd to Tours; an Affront for which ſhe never forgave either him or the Dauphin.

The Queen of France baniſh'd to Tours by the Intrigues of the Conſtable.

THE Duke of Burgundy, who only wanted a fair Pretence for Action, took occaſion from the Queen's Baniſhment, the Death of the two former Dauphins, and ſeveral other things, to run down the Conſtable's Conduct, in a Manifeſto which he publiſh'd on that Head, and ſent to the chief Towns of the Kingdom, many of which openly eſpous'd his Party; for there was an univerſal Diſcontent at the Conſtable's Government, which had been very violent. After this, the Duke of Burgundy advanc'd near to Paris, and took ſeveral Towns in the Neighbourhood.

Duke of Burgundy publiſhes a Manifeſto againſt him.

AT the ſame time, the King of England ſailing about the latter end of July, made a Deſcent with about 25,000 Men, at Touque in Normandy. Conſequently, the Dauphin and the Conſtable were under a Neceſſity either of abandoning Paris to the Duke of Burgundy, or elſe of leaving Normandy expos'd to the Engliſh Arms, and providing for the Security of Paris. But they choſe the latter, and ſhut themſelves up in that Capital. One may eaſily judge, that as Affairs then ſtood, Henry did not meet with abundance of Oppoſition in Normandy. He preſently made himſelf Maſter of Touque, and ſeveral other Caſtles, and afterwards of Caen, Bayeux, Mante, Alençon, and Falaize. We find the Capitulations of all thoſe Places in this Ninth Tome of the Fœdera, the Dates of which may be of ſome ſervice.

Henry's Deſcent in Normandy.

His Progreſs there.

WE left Queen Iſabel in Baniſhment, and little better than a Priſoner at Tours, which was a Reſtraint upon her that ſhe could not brook; and in order to her deliverance, ſhe made a League with the Duke of Burgundy, which was concluded with ſuch Secrecy, that the Court of France had not the leaſt notion of it. The Duke of Burgundy, who was beſieging Corbeil, left his Camp all on a ſudden, and poſted to Tours; from whence he carry'd off the Princeſs without oppoſition, and conducted her to Troyes in Champaign, where ſhe took the Title of Regent, aſſerting that both the King and the Dauphin were kept by the Conſtable in a State of Slavery.

Queen Iſabel's League with the Duke of Burgundy, who carries her off to Troyes, where ſhe takes the Title of Regent.

Mean time, Henry puſh'd on his Conqueſts in Normandy. As ſoon as ever he had reduc'd Touque, he ſent to acquaint King Charles with his Intention to recover his Eſtate by force of Arms. The Letter is dated [1] the 13th of Auguſt, 1417. Charles return'd anſwer, that he was always for Peace, that Peace was what he ſtill deſir'd, and that he was ready to make uſe of all proper means for that end. Henry reply'd, that if he was in earneſt for a Treaty, he would offer to ſend his Ambaſſadors to ſome convenient place: upon which a Conference was agreed on at Berneville, a place betwixt Touque and Harfleur; but it was not held 'till the 28th of November. What was moſt remarkable in it, are the Conditions upon which Henry offer'd to make Peace, viz. That Charles ſhould hold the Crown during his Life, but that after his Death it ſhould deſcend upon Henry and his Heirs: That during the Life of Charles, Henry ſhould be Regent of the Kingdom; and upon theſe Terms, Henry offer'd to marry the Princeſs Catherine, without putting the King her Father, or the Kingdom, to any Charge. This Conference was not puſh'd very far, becauſe the Archbiſhop of Rheims, who was at the Head of the Embaſſy of France, had no Inſtructions for treating on a Demand of that nature.

DURING this, Henry continued the War in Normandy, notwithſtanding the Severity of the Winter, being reſolv'd to improve the beſt Opportunity that he could poſſibly have had. The Capitulations of the many Places he took, during the Remainder of the Year 1417, and the firſt Months of 1418, fill up a conſiderable part of this Tome *.

IN the Year 1418, Henry's Affairs took a conſiderable Turn, occaſion'd by the Revolution which happen'd at the Court of France. Martin V, who had been choſe Pope by the Council of Conſtance on the 11th of November, 1417, ſent two Legates in April following into France, with a Commiſſion to make Peace between the Kings of France and England, or to procure the Publication of Truces, &c. Partium tamen diſſidentium accedente conſenſu; i. e. * THE Inhabitants of the open Country had ſuch terrible Ideas of the Engliſh, that no leſs than 25,000 Families fled into Bretagne, from whom the People of that Province learnt the Art of dreſſing Wool, and making Cloth; inſomuch that when the Engliſh came to Liſieux, a conſiderable Town eighteen Miles from the Sea, they found only one old Man and a Woman, the reſt being retir'd into the fortify'd Towns. England and Scotland, without adding any Clauſe including their Conſent; and by his ſingle Authority caus'd a Truce to be proclaim'd without conſulting the King of Scotland, who made a Jeſt of it, and went on with his Hoſtilities. It appears by Mezeray's Hiſtory that Martin's Legates had Orders, in the firſt Place, to uſe their utmoſt Endeavours for reconciling the two Factions into which France was then divided. Accordingly they made that their firſt Buſineſs; and they ſucceeded ſo well, that on the 17th of May the Dauphin and the Duke of Burgundy agreed, all Malice apart, to govern the Kingdom jointly during the King's Life. But the Conſtable laid invincible Obſtacles againſt the Execution of the Treaty; and the Chancellor, who was his Creature, refus'd to ſeal it.

The Reconciliation of the two Factions in France, only hinder'd by the Conſtable.

THIS Conduct of the Conſtable open'd the Eyes of a great many People, even of his own Party. His Enemies took occaſion from it to run down his Conduct; and when they ſaw that the People were incens'd againſt him, they form'd a Conſpiracy to deliver Paris into the Power of the Burgundians, in which they effectually ſucceeded: For on the 24th of May, Liſle Adam, who was Governour of Pontoiſe for the Duke of Burgundy, was admitted through the Gate of St. Germain into Paris, with 800 Horſe; and immediately a multitude of the Citizens flock'd to him ſo faſt that the Armagnacs had not Time to take Meaſures for their Defence. Tanneguy du Chatel Governour of the Baſtille, run immediately to the Louvre, and carried away the Dauphin, naked in his Shirt, in order to ſhelter him from the Fury of the Burgundians. The Conſtable had no other Shift to make, but to conceal himſelf at the Houſe of a Maſon, who betray'd him; and he was immediately committed to the Priſon of the Palace.

Paris deliver'd into the power of the Burgundians.

UPON this News, the Burgundians, who had been baniſh'd the City, return'd, and on the 12th of June made a horrid Maſſacre of the Armagnacs. The Conſtable was hal'd out of Priſon, murder'd, and dragg'd about the Streets. In a Word, no leſs than 2000 Perſons had their Throats cut in a few Days time. And upon the 14th of July, the Queen and the Duke of Burgundy enter'd Paris as it were in triumph, and took the King's Perſon and Government into their own Hands.

They maſſacre the Conſtable and all his Party. The Queen and the Duke of Burgundy enter Paris, and aſſume the Government.

DURING theſe Tumults, Henry continued his Conqueſts in Normandy, and reduc'd a great many Places. We have in in this Tome the Capitulations of Evreux, Dompfront, Pont de l'Arche, &c. as alſo of Cherbourg, which, after having ſuffer'd a Siege of three Months, ſurrender'd on the 22d of Auguſt, 1418. As the King only wanted to take Roan to be entire Maſter of Normandy, he begun the Siege of it about the latter end of Auguſt, or the beginning of September, and not in the Month of June, as Mezeray has aſſerted *.

An Error of Mezeray about the Siege of Roan.

BY the Revolution which had juſt happen'd at the Court of France, the Scene of Affairs was alter'd, and the Intereſts of the principal Actors became quite different from what they were before. The Dauphin, who ſaw himſelf excluded from the Government, was very ſure that the Duke of Burgundy favour'd the King of England, tho' he knew nothing at all of their ſecret Alliance. He dreaded the Union of thoſe two Powers againſt him, and ſtudied day and night how to ward off the Blow. On the other Hand, he was willing to ſave Roan, the Capital of Normandy, on which the Preſervation of that Province depended; and for this end he thought it his beſt way to enter into a Treaty with Henry, and to propoſe an Alliance with him againſt the Duke of Burgundy. With this View he ſent his Steward to make the Overture to him, as appears by the Paſſport which Henry granted him, dated the 3d of October [m].

The Dauphin deſires an Alliance with Henry againſt the Duke of Burgundy. 624.

THE Duke of Burgundy was as much perplex'd too as the Dauphin. He knew he was engag'd to the King of England by a ſecret Treaty betwixt them; but having now the Government in his own Hands, his Intereſt and Henry's were vaſtly different. Yet he did not dare to break with him, for fear the Dauphin ſhould preſs him ſo hard as to make ſuch a Protector neceſſary. Therefore while he was demurring what courſe to take in ſo tickliſh a Juncture, he ſuffer'd Henry to carry on the Siege of Roan without Moleſtation. It is true, he made as if he intended to march to the Relief of the Beſieged; but whether he thought himſelf too weak, or whether he was afraid of breaking ſo ſoon with the King, he dropp'd that Deſign. By what we have now taken notice of, it is pretty obvious that moſt of the Occurrences of that time have a Dependance on the ſecret Treaty made betwixt Henry and the Duke of Burgundy; and that by Conſequence the Hiſtorians, who knew nothing of this Treaty, could not but give a very lame Account of their Cauſes.

Duke of Burgundy wants to get off of his Alliance with Henry.

HENRY having receiv'd the Dauphin's Propoſal, did not think fit to reject it. He did not imagine that it would come to any Concluſion; but all he meant by it was to give Umbrage to the Duke of Burgundy, and to oblige him to haſten the concluſion of the Peace with him while it was to be had. Such was the Situation of Affairs, and the Diſpoſition of thoſe three Princes during the Siege of Roan, which laſted near five Months.

FOEDERA TOM. IX.

Instructions to his Ambaſſadors for that end. 628.

THE King and the Dauphin having agreed to ſend their Plenipotentiaries to Alençon, Henry gave Inſtructions to his, which we find dated from the Camp before Roan, the 26th of October, 1418. Nothing is a plainer Proof of the Foreſight and Judgment of this great Prince than theſe Inſtructions; but as they are too long to be inſerted here, it may be ſufficient to obſerve, that theſe were the three chief Heads: 1. A Peace between France and England. 2. A long Truce with the Dauphin. 3. A League with him againſt the Duke of Burgundy. As to the Peace, Henry inſtructed them to demand in his Name, beſides the Territories comprehended in the Treaty of Bretigny, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, Normandy, Flanders, and the Country ſituate between the Soamme and Graveling in full Sovereignty. And if the Dauphin's Ambaſſadors ſhould offer the King reaſonable Satisfaction, he would not have them conclude a Treaty with him, but to demand how, and by what Means the Dauphin propos'd to make thoſe Offers ſure and effectual.

2. As to the Truce, if the Dauphin's Plenipotentiaries were for a ſhort one, his were to refuſe it; but if they offer'd a long one, they were then to demand what their Maſter would give to obtain it.

3. THEN as to the League, he ſaid that this Propoſition would tend unavoidably to obtain Aſſiſtance of him againſt the Duke of Burgundy: In that caſe, he order'd his Ambaſſadors not to hear of their Demand of a few Succours, but to offer them Aſſiſtance worthy of a great King, and ſuch as might be ſufficient for reſtoring the Peace and Tranquillity of the Kingdom of France. In conſideration of ſuch powerful Succours, he requir'd the Dauphin to aſſiſt him in the Reduction of Flanders, and that afterwards all the other Places which ſhould be taken from the Duke of Burgundy ſhould be conquer'd for France.

IT is evident by theſe Inſtructions, that Henry had no deſign to conclude any thing with the Dauphin, becauſe, tho' the Dauphin had granted every thing he ask'd, it was not in his Power to execute it.

Charles's Letter to Henry. 631.

AFTER theſe Inſtructions we have a Letter from Charles VI to Henry, dated [n] November the 1ſt, 1418, wherein he tells him, that he perceives by his Letter of the 26th of October to the Duke of Burgundy, that he was ready to receive all reaſonable Propoſals for advancing of a Peace, if he was inclin'd to ſend Ambaſſadors to him. That Letter from Henry to the Duke of Burgundy, which was dated the ſame Day that he ſign'd the Inſtructions above-mention'd, ſhews, that as on the one hand he had a mind to give umbrage to the Duke of Burgundy by his Negotiations with the Dauphin, ſo he aim'd on the other hand to give the Dauphin the ſame Uneaſineſs by his Conferences with the Ambaſſadors of the King his Father. Nevertheleſs there was this difference, that Henry wiſh'd to conclude a Peace with the latter; whereas he only aim'd at amuſing the Dauphin, and to oblige him to offer ſuch Conditions as he might make an advantage of in his Treaty with the Duke of Burgundy. As for the Dauphin, he only wanted to obtain a Truce in order to ſave Roan. And thus we have ſeen the Game which was then play'd by thoſe Princes. Mean time, the two Kings agreed to ſend their Plenipotentiaries to Pont de l' Arche, there to treat of Peace. Theſe two Negotiations are the principal Contents of the Acts in this Tome, from the beginning of October to the end of the Year 1418.

The Colluſion of Henry and the French Princes.

AMONG thoſe acts, one of the chief is a Protocol or Journal of the Conference between the Ambaſſadors of the King of England, and of the Dauphin; by which we find that the Engliſh Ambaſſadors brought thoſe of the Dauphin to propoſe the Execution of the Treaty of Bretigny, except as to the Sovereignty of the Places thereby yielded: But upon this Exception the Conference broke off. Beſides, the Dauphin could not give any valid Security for the Execution of that Treaty, moſt of thoſe Provinces being now in his Power. There was no mention in the Conference of the two other Articles contain'd in the King's Inſtructions [o].

Conferences betwixt the Engliſh and the Dauphin's Ambaſſadors. 632.

BEFORE this Conference was over, Henry ſent a full Power to his Ambaſſadors, dated November the 14th [p], to engage in his Name to the Dauphin, that he would conclude no Friendſhip nor Alliance with the Duke of Burgundy before the Feaſt of the Circumciſion. This was purely to haſten the Dauphin's Ambaſſadors to propoſe every thing that they had a Power to offer; for the King's Alliance with the Duke had already been made above a Twelvemonth, tho' the Dauphin knew nothing of it.

Henry's Promiſe to make no Peace with the Duke of Burgundy. 646.

WE find alſo that at this very time, the Dauphin wrote to Henry to deſire an Interview with him; and here we have likewiſe the King's Anſwer, wherein he accepts the Propoſal. The former is dated [q] November the 25th, 1418; and the latter [r] the 25th ditto.

Letters betwixt Henry and the Dauphin. 647, 651.

AFTERWARDS we find ſome Acts relating to the Conference which was held in the Month of December, at Pont de l' Arche, between the Ambaſſadors of the two Kings, with the Mediation of Cardinal Jordan of Urſins, the Pope's Legate, and of his Colleague. This Conference was begun, but came to nothing by reaſon of a need-leſs Cavil which the French had recourſe to on purpoſe to break it off. They would have the Conference manag'd, and the Protocol kept in their own Language, to which the Engliſh were not willing to conſent. The Cardinal des Urſins gave himſelf a great deal of Trouble to accommodate this Diſpute. Henry too, who hop'd to reap ſome Advantage from the Conference, conſented that two Protocols ſhould be kept, one in Latin and the other in French; and that the firſt ſhould be deem'd authentick. But the French rejected this Expedient. Probably the Duke of Burgundy had heard that the Conference at Alençon was come to nothing. Moreover, he had another Project in his Head, which did not require him to be too haſty in his Concluſion of a Peace with the King of England, nor ſo much as to enter into a Negotiation with him.

THUS ended the Year 1418, while Henry was ſtill employ'd in the Siege of Roan, which he carry'd on without intermiſſion, notwithſtanding the Severity of the Winter. The Year 1419 produc'd Revolutions much more ſtrange, and more prejudicial to the Peace of France.

Capitulation of Roan. 664.

ON the 13th of January, 1419, Roan capitulated *, and the King made his Entry into it the 19th. By the taking of this Town, he became Maſter of all Normandy, a very few Caſtles excepted.

THOUGH the Conference at Pont de l'Arche came to nothing, yet the Dauphin was alarm'd at it. He renew'd his Inſtances to haſten his Interview with Henry; and it was to regulate the Time and Place of it, that his Ambaſſadors met with thoſe of the King at Louviers: There it was agreed on the 12th of February, that the two Princes ſhould meet each other on the 26th of March, between Evreux and Dreux. But the Dauphin taking other Meaſures afterwards, this Propoſal fell to the Ground. Mean time the King continu'd to make himſelf Maſter of ſeveral Places.

Capitulations of other Places, 674, to 679.

DURING all theſe Negotiations, the Duke of Burgundy was in the utmoſt Perplexity. It was now againſt his Intereſt to keep his Engagement with the King of England, in aiding him to conquer France. He was ſenſible that when once that Monarch was in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, he would not leave the Government of it to him; and yet all the Steps he had taken for ſeveral Years, had a manifeſt tendency to that very end. On the other hand, he had in the young Dauphin a mortal Enemy, who might one Day triumph over him again, either by the Death of the King his Father, or by ſome other Means unforeſeen. After he had long conſulted on his Pillow how to extricate himſelf out of this Difficulty, he determin'd at laſt to take that courſe which he thought the ſafeſt and moſt honourable. He reſolv'd to leave no Stone unturn'd to incline the Dauphin to a ſincere Reconciliation, to the end that they might govern the Kingdom jointly, and drive out the Engliſh. By this Means he thought himſelf ſure of being at leaſt Second in the Government; and he did not deſpair of having this young Prince as much in his Power one day or other, as the late Count d'Armagnac had before him. But in caſe he could not effectually ſucceed in this Project, he form'd a deſperate Reſolution to put Henry in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom. The then ſituation of the Duke's Affairs being ſuch that he was under an immediate neceſſity of knowing what he had to truſt to, he caus'd the ſaid Reconciliation to be propos'd to the Dauphin without loſs of Time. But this Prince receiv'd the Propoſal with ſo much Indifference, that thoſe who were employ'd in the Affair, plainly ſaw that it would not take; and therefore they contented themſelves with the Offer of a Truce. The Dauphin was very willing to conſent to it, provided it might be for three Years; but the Duke of Burgundy, whoſe Affairs were in too uncertain and wavering a Condition to admit of any longer Suſpence, would have it only for two Months: And therefore the Negotiation was broke off.

The Duke of Burgundy reſolves to be reconcil'd to the Dauphin.

The Dauphin rejects his Overture.

MEAN while the Duke had begun to concert Meaſures for treating of a Peace with the King of England, in caſe the Dauphin ſhould ſtill refuſe to be reconcil'd with him. He had deſir'd the Duke of Bretagne to go to Henry, and make him the firſt Overture of it. Immediately after this, the Court of France requir'd that the Plenipotentiaries of the two Crowns might aſſemble at Mante, and ſeem'd in a Hu-

Duke of Burgundy propoſes a Peace to Henry.

* ONE cannot forbear mentioning ſome of the Diſtreſſes of this City during the Siege, as they are related by Goodwin, who quotes Hollingſhed, Hall, Monſtrelet, Peter de Fenin, Le Fevre, and other French Hiſtorians, for the Truth of what he relates. Above 50,000 were ſtarv'd during the Siege, and in one burying Place above 12,000 were thrown into the Ground. Perſons of better Quality eat their own Horſes, and the poorer People fed on Dogs, Cats, Rats and Mice; ſo obſtinate were they in holding out the Town to the laſt Extremity. Little Infants hung on the Breaſts of their ſtarv'd Mothers as they lay dead in the Streets; and the Rage of Hunger forc'd the diſtracted Multitude to a thouſand Violences: So that whoever was ſeen carrying any thing fit to eat was preſently aſſaulted, and thus they wounded and kill'd one another to take away the vileſt Nouriſhment of Life. In three Months together no Meat had been ſold in the Shambles, ſo that what coſt but one Penny before the Siege, was ſet at the Price of 30 or 40; inſomuch that young Virgins were forc'd by Hunger to proſtitute themſelves for Bread. Goodwin adds, that King Henry was ſo compaſſionate of their Miſeries, that he often ſent Relief to the poor People as they lay ſprawling in the Ditches, and that he tax'd the French Officers with Inhumanity in not relieving them according to their Promiſe. By the Date of its Surrender, the Reader is enabled to correct a groſs Miſtake of Dr. Howel, who ſays it had been beſieged a Twelvemonth.

mour to make Propoſals to Henry's Satisfaction.

IN order to have a complete Idea of the Situation of Affairs in the beginning of the Year 1419, it is abſolutely neceſſary to know how the Duke of Burgundy, the Dauphin, and the King of England ſtood affected. The firſt had, as they uſe to ſay, two Strings to his Bow: He was reſolv'd either to be reconcil'd heartily with the Dauphin, or elſe to be united more ſtrongly with the King of England; but he gave the firſt the Preference, and was not inclin'd to try the ſecond but in a caſe of Extremity. For this end he was under a neceſſity of negotiating publickly with the King of England, that the Dauphin taking the Alarm might haſten his Conſent to the Reconciliation propos'd. But at the ſame time it was neceſſary to prolong this Negotiation, in order to give the Dauphin leiſure to reflect upon the Riſque he was going to run; and in caſe that the Dauphin continu'd obſtinate, the Duke reckon'd it would be ſtill time enough to conclude a Treaty with England.

The Dauphin obſtructs it.

THE Dauphin had nothing in View but to gain Time, and, as far as lay in his Power, to obſtruct the Concluſion of the Peace, which could not but be made to his prejudice. And he thought the ſureſt Way to carry his Point, was to make the King of England hope for more Advantages from a Concert with him, than he could poſſibly expect from the Duke of Burgundy.

As for Henry, he perfectly knew what an Animoſity there was between thoſe two Princes; and he hop'd to find his account in it, by making them both jealous of one another. With this View he refus'd none of the Propoſals that were made to him from either Party, whether for the aſſembling of Ambaſſadors, or for Interviews and perſonal Conferences. This then was the Diſpoſition or Temper of the three Courts; by which we may be enabled to judge of the Reaſons and Motives of thoſe Acts in this Tome, which we are now going to refer the Reader to.

Powers to treat with the Dauphin. 670.

1. A POWER to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, &c. to treat with the Dauphin's Ambaſſadors either of a final Peace or of an Interview, &c. dated January the 21ſt 1419 *.

676. 2. A PASSPORT for the Archbiſhop of Sens and other Ambaſſadors from the Dauphin, to repair to Roan; dated the 31ſt Ditto.

3. A TREATY for an Interview betwixt the King and the Dauphin; dated February the 12th, 1419 [r]. Interview with him. 686.

10. ANOTHER Paſſport for the Ambaſſadors of France; dated March the 18th, at the Caſtle aforeſaid. Paſſport for Ambaſſadors. 709.

BY theſe Acts we ſee that Henry treated with both Parties at one and the ſame time.

WHILE theſe Ambaſſadors, &c. went forward and backward, the Duke of Burgundy try'd all the Intereſt he could make with the Dauphin to engage him to a Reconciliation.

BUT this young Prince, who was always beſieg'd by Tanneguy du Chatel, and by Louvet the Preſident of Provence, old Servants of the late Duke of Orleans, would hear no talk of it. Dauphin ſtill refuſes a Reconciliation.

THE Duke of Burgundy thought then it was high time to haſten the Negotiation with the King of England, with a View either to force the Dauphin to a Reconciliation, or whatever happen'd, to conclude a Peace with the Engliſh, tho' to the prejudice of France and the Royal Family.

PURSUANT to this Reſolution, a Treaty was concluded at Vernon upon the Seine for the Interview of the two Kings; which Treaty we have here at length, dated the 7th of April, 1419. It was therein agreed, that King Charles, Queen Iſabel, the Princeſs Catherine, and the Duke of Burgundy on the one Part, and the Treaty for an Interview between the two Kings. 717.

AFTER it follow ſeveral Acts which have relation to this Treaty, as Conventions about the Place and Time, a Prolongation of it to the 31ſt of May, the Oath of the King of France upon this Subject, and other things of that nature.

The Interview.

THE firſt Interview was had upon the 29th of May, near Meaulant or Melun, at a Place which had been agreed on. King Charles was not there by reaſon of his Diſtemper, but there it was that Henry firſt ſaw the Princeſs Catherine. The ſame Day he iſſu'd Letters Patent, importing an Agreement that the Conferences ſhould be continu'd 'till the Concluſion of the Peace; that in caſe either of the two Kings had a mind to break them off, he ſhould ſend his Letters Patent to the other eight Days beforehand, to notify it to him; and that in the mean time, the Truce ſhould ſubſiſt for theſe eight Days, and for eight Days longer.

Commiſſioners appointed to conclude a Peace with France. 761.

HENRY perceiv'd Affairs had ſuch a promiſing Aſpect of Peace, that on the firſt of June, when he was at Mante, he nominated his Brothers, the Dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, to be the Finiſhers of the Treaty, which was to be firſt form'd in the Conferences.

Henry's Demands. 762.

AFTER this, we meet with Henry's Demands, containing in ſubſtance theſe three Articles: 1. The Poſſeſſion of all the Grants in the Treaty of Bretigny. 2. Normandy and its Dependencies. 3. The abſolute Sovereignty of all Places that ſhould be yielded to him by the Treaty.

Duke of Burgundy's Policy.

WE have already ſeen that it was not the Duke of Burgundy's Intention to come to any Concluſion with Henry, 'till he had reaſon to deſpair of an Agreement with the Dauphin; and that he hop'd theſe Conferences would help to determine this young Prince to Friendſhip. With this View it was neceſſary to keep the Conferences at Melun on foot, in order to give the Dauphin time to take his Reſolution. By conſequence it was by no means proper abſolutely to deny the King thoſe three Articles, for fear of breaking off the Conferences; for Henry was ſo poſitive in his Demands, that he would have a Peace upon thoſe Terms, or none at all. The Duke of Burgundy therefore, being deſirous to reſerve to himſelf the Power of concluding the Peace upon theſe Conditions, if he was forc'd to it, or of breaking up the Conferences, if his Intereſt requir'd it, reſolv'd to make counter Demands on the part of France. Thoſe Demands which we find here, together with the King's Anſwers, were of ſuch a nature, that the Duke might ſtand to or recede from them as he ſhould think fit. They are too long to be inſerted in this Extract, and it is ſufficient to obſerve, that the greateſt part of them did not pleaſe the King, becauſe they requir'd a fuller Explanation; whereas this was the very thing the Duke of Burgundy aim'd at. But the Explanation which the King wanted, ſeem'd ſo eaſy in the nature of it, that this Prince did not imagine it could be any Obſtacle to the Peace, and made not the leaſt doubt that it was upon the point of being concluded.

HENRY V.

Counter Demands of France, and King Henry's Anſwer. 763.

THE reſt of the Month of June was ſpent in a Treaty of Commerce betwixt England and Flanders. The Duke of Burgundy was very glad to amuſe the Congreſs with the Expectation of the Dauphin's final Reſolution.

Treaty of Commerce with Flanders. 767, &c.

HENRY ſeeing the Treaty in ſo good a Forwardneſs, appointed Ambaſſadors to go and finiſh it, and empower'd them to compound with the Court of France for the Arrears of the Ranſom of King John, as alſo for the Demands which that Court had upon him as to the Reſtitution of the Dowry of Iſabel, Richard the Second's Widow. This Commiſſion was dated [z] July the 5th, 1419. Moreover, by another Commiſſion of the ſame Date, he impower'd the ſame Ambaſſadors to conclude his Marriage with the Princeſs Catherine; but his Affairs ſoon took a new turn.

Henry's Commiſſion to his Ambaſſadors to treat with France. 774, 775.

THE Dauphin, who ſaw the Peace juſt ready for ſigning without his Participation, and who was ſenſible that ſuch a Peace muſt needs be to his Prejudice, thought of no other means to ward off the Blow than to be reconcil'd with the Duke of Burgundy. And on the 11th of July, theſe two Princes met and embrac'd each other, about a League from Melun, on the Road to Paris, each accompany'd by ſeveral Noblemen. At the ſame time they ſign'd a Treaty, which was ready drawn up for the purpoſe, whereby they promis'd to love one another like Brothers, to govern the Kingdom together in Union and Concord, and to unite all their Forces to oppoſe what they call'd the damnable Deſigns of the Engliſh. This Treaty, which we have at large, dated the 11th of July, 1419, was ſworn to before Alain Biſhop of Leon, the Pope's Legat, by the two Princes, by eighteen Noblemen, on the part of the Dauphin, among whom were Tanneguy de Chatel and Louvet; and by twenty-one on the part of the Duke of Burgundy.

Prior's Letter about the Peace. 779.

IMMEDIATELY after this Treaty, comes a Fragment of a Letter, dated from Mante July 14, and ſubſcrib'd Rober Priour, wherein it is ſaid, that after the Articles of the Peace had been agreed on, and nothing remain'd but to engroſs the Treaty, the French produc'd new Demands, which had prevented the Concluſion of it: Moreover, that the Dauphin and the Duke of Burgundy were reconcil'd on the eleventh, and that their Treaty was publiſh'd the ſame Day at Paris; and that conſequently it would not be above ſix Days before they ſhould know whether they were to have War or Peace.

Henry's Power to his own Miniſter to prorogue the Truce. 792.

IT ſeems, however, that notwithſtanding all that had paſs'd, Henry ſtill flatter'd himſelf with the Hopes of Peace. This appears by a Power which he gave to the Earl of Warwick on the 19th of July [a] to prorogue the Truce beyond the 29th, by reaſon of certain Occurrences, which made it probable that the Peace could not be concluded before that Day whereon the Truce was to expire. And in this Collection we alſo find a ſafe Conduct for four of King Charles's Privy Counſellors, who were to repair to the King of England at Mante [b].

Henry's Paſſport for French Miniſters. 783.

NEVERTHELESS Henry was not ſo far dos'd with the Hopes of Peace, but that he thought of renewing the War. The Conferences being broke off, by reaſon of the Chicanery of the French, he caus'd the Walls of Pontoiſe to be ſcal'd by his Brother the Duke of Clarence, who took it, Liſle Adam the Governor being forc'd to fly out naked in his Shirt with part of the Garriſon. The Booty which the Engliſh found in the Town, where the Court of France had been not many Days before, amounted to above two Millions of Livres. I have read in ſome French Hiſtorian *, that this Action happen'd on the 28th of July; which, if true, was a Day before the Expiration of the Truce.

His Army takes Pontoiſe with a great Booty.

His Manifeſto. 786, &c.

AFTER the taking of Pontoiſe, Henry publiſh'd a ſort of Manifeſto, or particular Narrative of all that had paſs'd from the beginning of his Reign, with relation to his Pretenſions to the Crown of France. There are ſeveral Particulars in it, which may be of very great Service towards explaining the Hiſtory of that Time: But I have mention'd them elſewhere, and therefore it is not neceſſary to repeat them. Beſides ſeveral things of no great Importance, Henry complain'd chiefly, that after the Conditions of Peace had been agreed on, the adverſe Party had refus'd to conſent that they ſhould be engroſs'd; that they had advanc'd new Demands that were quite contrary to the former; that they had demanded of him to renounce all manner of Right which he had, or might have, either by Transfer or Purchaſe, or any other way, to the Crown of France, as well now as for the future, for himſelf, and for his Heirs and Succeſſors; but that this Demand having a Relation to Futurity, and including all ſorts of unforeſeen Caſes, he could not poſſibly agree to it in this general way without ſome Explication: That France had alſo demanded things of him which he could not grant without offending God, &c. That when he anſwer'd the firſt Demands of the adverſe Party, they reply'd in general, that his Anſwers were looſe, unreaſonable, and obſcure: That the Engliſh Plenipotentiaries deſiring to know wherein their Obſcurity conſiſted, France refus'd to tell them; and in ſhort would not come into any manner of Expedient, but demanded that he ſhould accept her Offers ſimply and expreſly, or elſe the Conferences were to be broke up. He added in the end, that tho' the Court of France was chargeable with breaking off the Conferences, and tho' he had ſince made himſelf Maſter of Pontoiſe, which was as it were the Key of Paris, yet he was willing to abide by his firſt Propoſals, on condition that Pontoiſe ſhould remain in his Hands.

The Situation of Henry's Affairs.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Grand Airs which Henry gave himſelf, it is certain that they were by no means conſiſtent with the then Situation of his Affairs. In the firſt place, he had not above 25,000 Men in France, a number ſcarce ſufficient to man the Places he had conquer'd, eſpecially Pontoiſe, which required a ſtrong Garriſon: And if immediately after the breaking up of the Conferences he had been oblig'd to have brought 10,000 Men into the Field, he would undoutedly have been very much embarraſs'd. 2. The two Factions on whoſe Diviſion he had depended, being reconcil'd, he might naturally expect all the Forces of France upon his Back in a very ſhort time. 3. It was very likely that the Flemings, who had refus'd to ſerve the Duke of Burgundy, their Sovereign, againſt France, would aſſiſt her with all their Power when the Kingdom was at ſtake. 4. At the very time that we are ſpeaking of, Henry receiv'd a Letter from Bayonne, dated July the 22d, 1419, informing him that the King of Caſtile had fitted out 40 Sail of Ships for Scotland, to tranſport a number of Troops from thence, which the Scots deſign'd for the

* THIS Author was Juvenal des Urſins, in his Hiſtory of Charles VI, but Goodwin ſays, Henry was ſo punctual in his Obſervation of the Truce, that it was not beſieged 'till the Day after it expir'd. Dr. Howel ſays it was taken the 31ſt of July.

Dauphin's

Dauphin's Assistance. Another Letter from the Mayor of that City, which was writ soon after the former [c], gave him an account that the Castilians and the Arragonese were enter'd into Bearn, and preparing to besiege Bayonne; and also that their design was to send powerful Succours to the Dauphin. 5. The English, who according to their natural sanguine Disposition, enter'd with Impatience into the War against France, in hopes that a Battel or two would put an end to it by the Conquest of that Kingdom, were vex'd to see that in five Years time there was but one single Province conquer'd. They knew too that this Conquest was not so much owing to the King's Forces, as to the Divisions of the French Nation. Consequently the Parliament grew cool, and what Subsidies they granted were far short of his present Necessities. The King was perpetually oblig'd to borrow Money, and to pawn his Jewels, and his Crown to boot, for a Security; as appears in several Pages of this Collection. His ordinary Revenues amounted but to 55,000 l. Sterling, and his ordinary Expences to 52,000. Therefore if we weigh all these Circumstances together, viz. The few Troops which Henry had, the Reunion of the Forces of France, the Conjunction of the Flemings and the Scots, the Diversion given by the Arragonese and the Castilians, the King's Poverty, and the Parliament's Indifferency, it is easy to judge, that this Prince, whatever he pretended to, was not in a Condition to support the War. But his own good Fortune, and the Dauphin's Animosity against the Duke of Burgundy, pav'd the way for him to carry his point without any great Struggle.

Another. 794.

King's Revenues, Disbursements, and Poverty.

IN the Interview betwixt the Dauphin and the Duke of Burgundy, on the 11th of July, they agreed to have another upon the 18th of August, at the Bridge of Montereau Faut-yonne. On that Day the two Princes repair'd to the fatal Bridge, and there the Dauphin caus'd the Duke of Burgundy to be assassinated by Tanneguy de Chatel, and some others who with him had sign'd and sworn to the Treaty of Reconciliation *.

Duke of Burgundy assassinated by the Dauphin.

AFTER that time, Henry's Affairs took quite another Turn: Philip the new Duke of Burgundy, Son to the deceas'd, being impatient to revenge his Father's Death, thought there was no Way more speedy and effectual than to unite firmly with the King of England, and Queen Isabel, who was a mortal Enemy to her Son the Dauphin. He held the same Posts about King Charles as the Duke his Father had, which was an Advantage that he only made use of to sacrifice France, and the Royal Family, to the Passion which govern'd him.

HENRY V.

ALL the Remainder of this Year, Couriers and Envoys were continually going and coming betwixt the Duke of Burgundy and King Henry, as appears from the Acts in the close of the Year 1419; all which Negotiations ended at last in an Alliance between the King and the Duke against the Dauphin. But before it came to maturity, Henry was desirous to be sure of a Peace with the French King upon his own Terms. As the Conjuncture was so favourable for him, he did not think it worth while to abide by his last Demands, viz. The Execution of the Treaty of Bretigny, and the Grants of Normandy and Pontoise; but he reviv'd his former Pretensions, especially to the Kingdom of France, only he was willing to leave the Crown to Charles during his Life. When the Duke of Burgundy had consented to this, a publick Instrument was drawn up which that Prince approv'd, sign'd and swore to. It contain'd in substance, that King Charles should keep the Crown and Title of King of France during his Life, and enjoy the Revenues of the Kingdom: That Henry should be Regent, and marry the Princess Catherine; and that after Charles's Death, the Crown of France should devolve to Henry and his Heirs. The Duke of Burgundy sign'd this Instrument at Arras, the 2d of December, 1419. After this, a Truce was agreed upon betwixt France and England, from the 24th of December to the 1st of March, 1420, out of which the Countries obedient to the Dauphin were excepted. This done, the King ratify'd his Treaty of Alliance with the Duke of Burgundy, by an Instrument dated [d] on the 25th of December. And the Duke's Ratification of it was dated at Arras on the 25th of January, 1420.

* GOODWIN, who gives the Particulars of this Fact, and shews the Treachery of it in all its Colours, remarks it as a signal Instance of the divine Justice, that this Duke of Burgundy, who had caus'd the Duke of Orleans to be assassinated in the Streets of Paris, should be sacrificed in the same manner, after several Stops and Pauses upon the Road whether to proceed or not, for fear that Mischief was intended him. Tanneguy de Chatel (who had been a trusty Servant of the murder'd Duke of Orleans) first assaulted him, and with a Battel-Ax hid under his Coat, cut off his Chin, which fell on his Knees; when the Duke nevertheless offer'd to draw his Sword in his own Defence, but was soon beat down by others, and kill'd with many Wounds; one of the Assassins running his Sword up to the Hilt in his Belly, which made so large a Wound that the Guts came out, and he fell on the Ground: then a Friend of his throwing himself on the Body to shield it from the Blows they made at it, was soon kill'd, as was also the Lord de Nouailles, who had drawn his Sword half out to defend the Duke, or to revenge his Death; and his other Companions, to the number of eight, were all taken Prisoners.

FŒDERA Tom. IX.

IT was ſtipulated by this Treaty, that the King of England and the Duke of Burgundy ſhould bear reciprocal Love to one another as Brothers: That they ſhould join all their Forces together againſt the Dauphin: that if the Dauphin, or any other of the Aſſaſſins of the late Duke of Burgundy ſhould be taken, they ſhould not be ſet at liberty without the Duke's Conſent: That the King ſhould make over to the Duke and to Michelle his Ducheſs, who was Daughter to King Charles, Lands to the value of 20,000 Livres per Annum, lying as near as poſſible to thoſe which the Duke already enjoy'd in France, to hold them in Fee of the Crown: That if any other Prince, who ſhould marry a Daughter of the Royal Family of France, ſhould claim the like Settlement, the Duke ſhould aſſiſt the King with all his power to hinder it. This could only have a view to the Dukes of Bretagne and Orleans, who were married to two other Daughters of Charles VI.

THE five firſt Months of the Year 1420, were ſpent in drawing up the ſolemn Treaty of Peace, according to the Terms which had been before agreed to: during which time the Truce was often prolong'd. When every thing was ſettled, another Treaty was made for regulating the Interview of the two Kings who were to ſign and ſwear to the Peace. It was agreed firſt that it ſhould be in ſome place near Troyes, where the Court of France then was. But afterwards Henry conſented to go to Troyes itſelf. This Treaty was immediately reduc'd into preliminary Articles, which were confirm'd by King Charles's Letters Patent, dated at Troyes the 9th of April 1420.

Preliminaries of the Treaty with the Fr. King. 877.

BY one of the Articles it was ſtipulated, that during the Life of Charles, Henry ſhould never aſſume the Title of King of France. Yet we find, that nine Days after the Date of theſe Letters Patent, Henry publiſh'd an Order from Roan Caſtle to coin new Money in Normandy, with this Inſcription upon one ſide, HENRICUS FRANCORUM REX.

Henry's Order for Coinage in Normandy. 888.

WE have here a Letter of Attorney from King Charles (who was then indiſpos'd) to his Queen Iſabel and to the Duke of Burgundy, to ſwear to the Peace in his Name; 'tis dated the 19th of May 1420 *.

Charles's Letter of Attorney to the Queen and the Duke of Burg. 894.

THIS Treaty, which was call'd the Peace of Troyes, is printed here entire, both in Latin and French. It contain'd 31 Articles; the chief of which were the Dowry ſettled by Henry on Catherine his Spouſe; the Regency of the Kingdom of France made over to Henry during the Life of King Charles his Father-in-law, and his Succeſſion to the Crown after the Death of Charles, conformable to the Prelimianary Articles. The greateſt part of the reſt were only Explanations of theſe.

Peace of Troyes. 896.

IN the 22d Article it was ſaid, that in all the publick Acts King Charles ſhould give Henry the Stile of Our moſt Dear Son Henry King of England, Regent and Heir of France.

IN the 24th, that the Kingdoms of France and England ſhould always be united under one and the ſame Sovereign, without being ever ſeparated; and that nevertheleſs each of the two Kingdoms ſhould preſerve its Liberties, Franchiſes, Privileges, Cuſtoms, &c.

ALL the mention made of the Dauphin was in the 29th Article, in theſe Terms: Alſo conſidering the enormous Crimes and Offences committed by Charles, who ſtiles himſelf Dauphin of Vienne, 'tis agreed, that neither we, nor our ſaid Son King Henry, nor even our moſt dear Son Philip Duke of Burgundy, ſhall by any means treat of Peace or Concord with the ſaid Charles, but with the Advice and Conſent of every one of us three, and of the States of the two Kingdoms.

ALL the Acts we find after the Treaty, are a few relating to the reciprocal Oaths of the two Kings, and of ſome other Perſons, and to the Execution of the Treaty.

Duke of Exeter's Letter about Henry's Eſpouſal. 907.

EVERY thing being thus ſettled, Henry went to Troyes on the 20th of May 1420; and next day in the Cathedral Church of Troyes the Peace was ſign'd and ſworn, and Henry was affianc'd to Princeſs Catherine, as appears by a Letter from the Duke of Exeter, dated May the 23d at Troyes.

II. Domeſtic Affairs.

THIS Article takes up ſo little room in that Tome, that we ſhall ſoon run over the chief Pieces relating to it.

Inſtructions to the Executors of his Father's Will. P. 9.

IN the firſt place we find an Act †, by which it appears that the late King Henry IV. had left more Debts behind him, and bequeath'd more Legacies in his Laſt Will and Teſtament, than his Effects were ſufficient to pay: That his Executors propos'd to ſet his Jewels to publick Sale, in order to ſatisfy his Creditors and Legatees. But Henry V. his Son, thought it was more honourable to keep thoſe Jewels, and to pay the value of them, which amounted to 25,000 Marks, in four Years time, to the end that the Legatees and Creditors might be paid their Proportions as far as the Money would go. It would have been more to his honour to have diſcharged the whole. But it must be considered that at this time of day, Kings were not very rich; that the Parliament gave no Supplies but for extraordinary and publick Occasions; and that by consequence the Prince was obliged, like a private Man, to stint his Expences according to his Revenue. He had also this disadvantage, that when he had extraordinary Occasions for Money, he was more puzzled to raise it than any of the Lords of his Court would have been, because he had not so much Credit, there being few People that car'd to trust their Sovereign with their Substance.

Among the Acts of the Years 1414 and 1415, there's a great number relating to a Conspiracy, which will be mentioned under the Article of Religion.

Duke of Bedford's Creation. 128.

On the 16th of May 1414, John of Lancaster, the King's Brother, was created Duke of Bedford *.

Henry V's Indentures with his Subjects for raising Men.

We meet with several Instruments in this Tome, which let us into the Method of Henry's raising Troops for the War against France. He made Indentures ‖ with the Nobility and Gentry, whereby they engag'd for a Sum of Money payable Quarterly, to supply him with a certain number of Soldiers, either Foot or Horse. Nor did he make these Indentures only for the sake of Troops, but he sign'd others also of the same kind with his own Officers and Domesticks, as his Physician, Surgeon, &c.

His Shifts to raise Money.

As the Funds settled by Parliament did not all come presently into the Treasury, Henry was often unprovided with Money to pay those who furnish'd him the Troops punctually every Quarter, according to Agreement: But to remedy this Inconvenience, he gave them his Jewels in pledge for security of Payment, with leave to sell them if the Money was not paid by such a time. And herein he found this advantage, that those People being satisfy'd with their Pawns, gave him the longer time, and often two or three Years, for payment, by which space he might naturally expect that the Moneys arising from the publick Funds were brought into the Treasury. This ninth Tome abounds with Engagements of this kind.

When Charles VIII. King of France, set out for the Conquest of Naples, it was thought very extraordinary that he should be oblig'd, as he pass'd thro' Turin, to borrow the Duchess of Savoy's Jewels. But here we find something yet more strange: Henry V. when he was preparing for the Conquest of France, was oblig'd, before he left England, to pawn his Jewels for the Payment of the second Quarteridge due to those who furnish'd him with Troops. This is evident from several Acts in the Year 1415. After the taking of Harfleur he was oblig'd to borrow again, in order to put the Place in a posture of Defence: In short, there was hardly one Year, during the whole Course of his Reign, but he was under a necessity of borrowing Money from private Men, by pledging his Jewels, and his Crowns into the bargain, for very moderate Sums, as we find in the Acts of this Tome. But this does not appear altogether so surprizing, when one considers that the ordinary Revenues of the Crown amounted at that time to no more than 55,000 l. Sterling, and that his Expences exceeded 52,000; so that there was not above 3000 l. Sterling for the extraordinary. This is what we find in the Fragment of an Estimate of the ordinary Revenues and Expences, which was drawn up in all probability to be laid before the Parliament. See Mr. Rymer's Vol. X. p. 113.

Henry V.

Negotiations betwixt the Q. of Naples and the D. of Bedford.

From Page 701 to 711 of this Tome, we have several Pieces relating to a Project form'd between Joan Queen of Naples and the Duke of Bedford Brother to the King. This Queen, so fam'd for her Amours, being much press'd by her Enemies, chose to get Assistance from England, by adopting the Duke of Bedford, and giving him the Hopes of being her Heir and Successor. We have in this Tome the Duke of Bedford's Instructions to his Envoys, Conventions betwixt the Queen and him, &c. It would not only be too tedious to explain the Subject of those Pieces, but it would moreover necessarily engage us in a Detail of the Affairs of Naples; therefore 'tis sufficient just to hint at them.

D. of Glocester propos'd as a Match for the Queen of Sicily. 716, 741, 742.

At the same time Henry proposed a Marriage between the Duke of Gloecester, his other Brother, and Blanche of Navarre, Queen Dowager of Sicily, who had some Pretensions to this Kingdom in her own Right. But the Infante of Arragon was before hand with him, and actually marry'd her †.

III. Affairs of the Church.

Persecution of the Wickliffites.

Of all the Events in Henry the Fifth's Reign, relating to Religion, I shall only insist on one in particular, which to me appears of the greatest Importance, and is most capable of being explain'd by the Acts of this Collection; I mean the Persecution rais'd against the Wickliffites or Lollards in the beginning of this Reign.

From the time that Wickliff first publish'd his Doctrine, which was in the latter end of Edward the Third's Reign, to Henry the Fifth's Accession to the Crown, the Sect of the Wickliffites or Lollards was exceedingly increas'd, and had been very much favour'd by the Minority of Richard II. by the Support of Anne of Luxemburgh his first Wife, and by the open Protection of the Duke of Lancaster. No Act of Parliament was made against them, till Henry IV. to

* By a Patent dated at Leicester.

‖ See Du Cange's Glossary for this word.

† King Henry's Licence to the Duke for this purpose was dated April 1. 1419, at Evreux; and Charles de Beaumont's Letters on this head to the King are dated the 28th ditto at Olit.

Foedera Tom. IX. to ingratiate himself with the Clergy, obtain'd a Statute of both Houses, which condemn'd obstinate Hereticks to the Fire. Notwithstanding this severe Act, and the Execution of two Lollards thereupon, the Sect spread to such a degree, that an Historian says, wherever two or three Persons happen'd to meet together, one of them was sure to be a Lollard. The chief Article of their Doctrine, and that which gave most distaste to the Clergy, was, That they would not own the Authority either of Pope or Prelates, nor by consequence that it was necessary for the Clergy to be Masters of so much temporal Wealth. This was enough to inflame the Clergy against them, or else nothing was: And such indeed was their Resentment, that the very first Synod or Convocation, which met in the Reign of Henry V. 1413, had a serious Consultation how to destroy this Sect. They came to this Conclusion, that there could be no hopes of rooting out those Hereticks, if care was not taken to punish their principal Leaders and Abettors: among these, Sir John Oldcastle being known to be one of the most obstinate, as well as one of the most bitter Enemies of the Clergy, it was thought absolutely necessary to try him for Heresy, and deliver him up to the secular Arm. Mean time, as this Gentleman, to whom some give the Title of Lord *Cobham, was one of the King's Domesticks, Thomas Arundel Archbishop of Canterbury was desir'd to let the King know their Resolve, and to ask his Leave to put it in execution. At first the King did not think fit to grant their Demand, but return'd Answer, that he would talk with Oldcastle, and if he could not turn him aside from his Errors, he would then permit the Laws to take their swing against him. Mean time, in order to give the Clergy some satisfaction, he put out a Proclamation, forbidding all Priests to preach who were not licens'd, suppressing all private Assemblies of the Lollards, and restraining all the Subjects of England from going to their Assemblies. The Proclamation was dated † August the 21st, 1413.

Of Sir John Oldcastle.

Proclamation against the Lollards. 46.

THE King having talk'd to Oldcastle, and finding him inflexible, left him to be dealt with by Law; and upon this Permission, Oldcastle was cited by the Archbishop: but so far was he from appearing, that he would not so much as receive the Summons; of which Henry being inform'd, caus'd him to be apprehended and committed to the Tower. On the 23d of September he was had before the Archbishop, who sat in Court, assisted by two Bishops and some others of the Clergy. The Articles of his Charge being then read to him, he made answer, that he was ready to give an Account of his Faith; and then presented a Paper, containing in substance, Oldcastle committed to the Tower.

His Impeachment, and Confession of his Faith.

1. THAT in the Sacrament of the Altar the true Body of Jesus Christ, born of the holy Virgin, exists under the Species of Bread.

2. THAT Penance is absolutely necessary.

3. THAT Images were introduc'd into the Church to be Calendars to the Ignorant, to enable them the better to remember the Actions of the Saints. But that they who put that Confidence in Images, which they ought to repose in God alone, and are more devoted to one than to another, are no better than Idolaters, and commit Sin against God.

4. AS to Pilgrimages; that the Man who doth not keep the Commandments of God, because he neither knoweth, nor will know them, may ramble from Pole to Pole in Pilgrimages, and yet fail of Salvation; and that on the contrary, he that observeth the Commandments of God, has no need to take a Journey either to Rome or Compostella, or any other place of Pilgrimage.

HENRY V.

THIS Confession of his Faith being thought by the Prelates too general, he was order'd to give a clear Answer to the following Articles.

Questions put to him.

1. WHETHER or no in the Sacrament of the Eucharist, material Bread remain'd after Consecration?

2. WHETHER or no he believ'd it necessary to confess to a Priest ordain'd by the Church?

HE answer'd, that he had nothing to say more than what was contain'd in his written Paper.

THEN the Archbishop told him, that the Holy Roman Church had determin'd those Points according to the Sentiments of St. Austin, St. Jerome, and St. Ambrose; and that all Christians were oblig'd to conform to those Decisions.

His Answer.

OLDCASTLE made answer, that he was ready to believe all that the Church had decided, and all that God had made an Article of his Faith, or a Precept of his Practice; but that he would not affirm that the Pope, Cardinals, and the other Prelates, had a power to determine any thing about those Points.

THIS Answer not satisfying the Prelates, they order'd him to prepare one to the following Articles, which they sent him in writing the next Day, viz. Sunday; and allow'd him time for it to the Day following, which was September the 25th.

More Articles put to him.

1. THE Holy Catholic Church has decreed, as to the Sacrament of the Altar, that after the Consecration pronounced by a Priest in the Mass, the material Bread is chang'd into the material Body of Christ, and the material Wine into Christ's material Blood, in such manner that neither the Bread nor the Wine have any longer the Substance they had before.

What is your Belief as to this Article?

2. THAT every Christian is obliged to confess his Sins to a Priest ordained by the Church, if he can get such.

What

* Goodwin says, he had this Title of Honour from his Marriage with a Grand-daughter of the Lord Cobham; and that as a Peer he had Summons to Parliament in the latter end of Henry the Fourth's Reign, and in the first Year of this: That Henry IV. gave him a considerable Command in those Troops which he sent over to assist the Duke of Burgundy against the Duke of Orleans; and that his Seat was at the Castle of Cowling, 3 Miles from Rochester.

† At Westminster.

FOEDERA Tom. IX.

What is your Belief as to this?

3. JESUS Christ constituted St. Peter his Vicar upon Earth, and the Roman Church is his See. He has given the same Power to all St. Peter's Successors, who are call'd Popes of Rome. 'Tis by their Authority that the Archbishops, Bishops, and the other Ecclesiastical Orders, are establish'd in the Church; and 'tis to them that all Christians are bound to pay Obedience, according to the Traditions of the Church of Rome.

What is your Belief in this Article?

4. THE most Holy Catholic Church has decreed, that 'tis necessary for every Christian to go in Pilgrimage to holy Places, there to adore the Relicks of the Apostles, Martyrs, Confessors, and other Saints whom the Church has approv'd of.

What do you believe as to this?

ON the 25th of September, as aforesaid, Oldcastle being brought before his Judges, was exhorted to desire Absolution; to which he answer'd, that he would apply for Absolution to none but God. And then he gave his Answer to the preceding Articles in this manner.

His Answer. TO the first, that as the invisible Godhead of Jesus Christ is veil'd under his visible Manhood, so in the Sacrament there is the true Body of Jesus Christ, and true Bread; the Bread which we see with our Eyes, and the Body of Jesus Christ which we do not see, hid under the Bread. He deny'd that the Church had decreed otherwise, and maintain'd that if it had, 'twas a Decision contrary to the holy Scriptures, and made since she receiv'd the pernicious Poison of worldly Possessions, and not before.

TO the second, that it might be profitable for a Sinner who found his Conscience burden'd with any great Crime, to go to a discreet Priest for Advice; but that whether it was to his own Pastor, or to some other Priest, was a matter on which Salvation did not depend, because nothing but the Contrition of the Heart could blot out the Sin.

TO the third, that the very Body of Jesus Christ, which was nail'd to the Cross, was the only Subject of Adoration.

AND being ask'd what Honour he allow'd to the Image of the Cross? he answer'd, that to keep it clean, and put it up in a safe place was all the Honour he vouchsaf'd it.

TO the fourth Article he answer'd, that the Pope and his Clergy were truly Antichrist, meaning that the Pope was the Head of the Antichrist, the Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, &c. the Members, and the Friars the Tail. That they were by no means to be obey'd further than as they were Imitators of Jesus Christ; and that He, and He only was St. Peter's Successor, who led the most holy Life.

AFTER he had finish'd his Answer to the four Articles, he lifted up his Hands and Voice, and exhorted the Standers-by to beware of those Men, who were leading them captive to Hell. HENRY V.

His Condemnation. UPON these Answers the Judges proceeded to give Judgment, and pass'd Sentence upon him, by which he was declar'd a Heretic excommunicate, and as such deliver'd up to the Secular Arm.

ABp of Canterbury's Narrative of his Trial. P. 61. ALL this Account of Oldcastle is taken from a Narrative written by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Bishop of London, to inform him of what pass'd in this Trial, dated at his Manor of Maidstone the 10th of October 1413. By it we see what were the Opinions of the Wickliffites or Lollards: And if they had at that time maintain'd all the Errors which have been father'd upon them since, it is not to be suppos'd that they would have been pass'd over in silence in the Charge which was prosecuted against Oldcastle.

Oldcastle's Escape. HOW distinguish'd soever this Gentleman was both by his Birth and Merit, he would undoubtedly have suffer'd the Pains of Fire at that time, if he had not found a way to escape from the Tower; at which there's some reason to think his Majesty himself conniv'd, who had a great Esteem for him, and was not yet prejudic'd against the Lollards.

THE Clergy were raving mad that their Burnt-Offering was got out of their Clutches; and that Henry V. did not shew the same Zeal against the Heretics as did the King his Father. And while the King was in that Temper, they plainly saw that do what they could to destroy them, it would be labour in vain. Therefore all they aim'd at, was to prejudice this Prince against the Lollards in general, and Oldcastle in particular.

Lollards charg'd with a Conspiracy against the Government. IN the beginning of January 1414, when the King was at one of his Seats, about seven Miles from London, (viz. Eltham in Kent, where he pass'd the Christmas Holidays) word was brought him, that the Lollards, with Oldcastle at their head, were assembled to the number of 20,000 Men in St. Giles's Fields, which, tho' now a part of the Buildings of London, were then cover'd with Bushes; and that their Design was to kill his Majesty, the Princes his Brothers, and most of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the Realm. Upon this Information, which was back'd with a great many Circumstances, the King with all the Posse he could raise, march'd at the head of 'em towards St. Giles's, where he arriv'd about Midnight, and there found fourscore Men arm'd, of whom thirty were kill'd on the spot, and most of the others taken Prisoners. 'Tis very probable, that these People were only assembled there to pray to God in secret, and to worship him in their own way, and that they had taken Arms only to defend themselves in case they should be attack'd. But be this as it will,

The King marches against them to St. Giles's.

FOEDERA Tom. IX.

the King having ſuffer'd himſelf to be prejudic'd againſt the Lollards, and in particular againſt Oldcaſtle, put forth a Proclamation with a Reward of 500 Marks to any Perſon that ſhould diſcover Oldcaſtle, 1000 to the Man that ſhould take him; and if he was apprehended by any Town or Borough, ſuch Corporation or Community was to be excus'd from paying any ſort of Tax for ever. He ſet forth in his Proclamation, that by the Suggeſtions of Oldcaſtle, the Lollards had conſpir'd to extirpate the whole Royal Family, becauſe like a truly Chriſtian Prince, he had declar'd againſt them. It was dated at Weſtminſter the 11th of January. Of thoſe who were taken at St. Giles's, ſome were executed, and the greateſt part pardon'd, even after they had been condemn'd to die. We don't find in Hiſtory that there was any great Search made over the Kingdom on account of this Conſpiracy, tho' the Nature of the Crime, and the number of the Conſpirators ſeem'd neceſſarily to demand it. If it had been a real Conſpiracy, or if Henry had been ſtill convinc'd it was ſo in his own Mind, 'tis by no means probable that he would ſo eaſily have pardon'd the Conſpirators. His natural Temper inclin'd him rather to Severity than Clemency, if we may believe the French Authors; tho' in this Tome we find a great number of Pardons granted for this very Fact, as will appear preſently. From hence it may be preſum'd, that this Prince, who at firſt believ'd it to be a real Conſpiracy, was of another mind after he had maturely weigh'd all Circumſtances. Yet for his Honour he would not unſay what he had ſaid; for in all the Pardons which he granted, he always ſuppos'd the Fact as needing no Proof, and reſerv'd to himſelf the Merit of Pardoning of his own free Will, and without being thereto ſolicited, as he himſelf expreſs'd it. Now to prove what I have aſſerted, that the King's Prejudice was over, as to this pretended Conſpiracy, I ſhall produce ſome of the Acts upon this Subject.

Lollards pardon'd. P. 119.

1. A PARDON granted to all the Lollards for the Conpiracy, excepting Oldcaſtle, and eleven others, dated March the 28th, 1414[a].

P. 129.

2. THE like Pardon granted to Philip Turner and twenty four others, for the ſame Fact[b]. 'Tis very probable that they were ſome of thoſe who were apprehended at St. Giles's. HENRY V.

3. A PARDON to John Wykham, one of the Conſpirators, tho' he had always deny'd the Fact of which he was found Guilty, and for which he was condemn'd, dated November the 6th, 1414[c]. Is it a uſual thing to pardon Perſons under Sentence of Death, who even after a fair Conviction will not own themſelves guilty? The King ſays in this Act, that the Lollards had conſpir'd to kill him, together with his Brothers, &c. and then to make Oldcaſtle Regent of the Kingdom: That they had reſolv'd on a Meeting at St. Giles's to the number of 20,000 Men, and that there they actually aſſembled: But he does no ſay that the whole number of them amounted only to fourſcore, leaving it to be ſuppos'd by the Words there they actually aſſembled, that there were 20,000 Men, or at leaſt a very great number. There's a ſort of double Entendre in thoſe Words, which makes one think that what the King ſaid of that Aſſembly, was only to ſave his Honour, and to juſtify his former Conduct. P. 170.

4. THE like Pardon to thirteen Conſpirators, tho' they alſo deny'd the Fact after Conviction; dated December the 16th, 1414[d]. P. 193.

Declaration againſt falſe Accuſations. P. 196.

UPON the whole, 'tis apparent that the King began to be diſpleas'd with the Proſecutions carry'd on againſt many Perſons upon this Head, by his putting forth an authentic Declaration, call'd Inſpeximus, of a Statute made in the Reign of Edward III. to put a ſtop to falſe Impeachments and Accuſations; which Declaration was dated January the 24th, 1415[e]. There being no other Affair at that time but this, which could oblige the King to make ſuch publick Notification of that Statute, it may very well be preſum'd, that it was done upon this Occaſion. This however is certain, that from that very time ſuch a ſtop was put to all theſe Proſecutions, that there is nothing like it to be ſeen to the very end of his Reign, excepting only the Inſtance of Oldcaſtle, who being apprehended in the Year 1417, while the King was in France, was burnt alive, being hung to a Chain faſten'd about his Middle[f]. But his ſuffering this kind [f] This great Man, whoſe Blood was the firſt noble Blood that was ever ſpilt in England by Popiſh Cruelty, on account of Religion, was taken in Wales by Lord Powis, aſſiſted with a Rabble, againſt whom he defended himſelf ſo couragiouſly, that he wounded ſeveral of them before they overpowered him by numbers. Being conducted under a ſtrong Guard to London, he was carried before the Parliament on the 18th of December, and executed upon Chriſtmas-day at the New Gallows, afterwards call'd Tyburn, as ſome have ſuppos'd from the manner of his and other Perſons Execution there, whoſe Bodies were tied to the Gallows, while they were burnt in the Flames. Goodwin ſays, he had all the Qualities of a brave and gallant Gentleman, and was equally illuſtrious in Arms and Arts: That in ſeveral Parliaments, and to the faces of this and the two preceding Kings, he declar'd boldly againſt the Corruptions of the Chriſtian Faith and Worſhip, the Uſurpations of the Pope, and the Abominations of the Prieſts. That he maintain'd ſuch Preachers as were hateful to thoſe Clergy; and that at the deſire of John Huſs, he caus'd all Wickliff's Works to be writ out, and diſpers'd into ſeveral Parts of Europe, of which Books above 200 Volumes were burnt by Order of the Archbiſhop of Prague. No wonder that for all this he was mortally hated by the malicious Popiſh Clergy; and that in complaiſance to that perſecuting Order, the Poetaſters in the ſucceeding Ages repreſented him in their Interludes as a Bully or Jovial Royſter, and that from them their Couſins the Sign-Painters have hung him up with a Brimmer in his Hand at the Doors of Alehouſes.

kind of Death ſhews that it was not ſo much for any Conſpiracy as for Hereſy.

BEFORE I leave this Article of the Lollards, I can't avoid juſt taking notice of an Event which has a Dependance upon it; not that there's any mention of it in Mr. Rymer's Collection, but only for the ſake of preſerving the Thread of the Hiſtory.

A further Account of the Lollards.

ALTHO the Lollards were perſecuted, yet they were very powerful in England. They were for a time ſo numerous in the Houſe of Commons, that probably they were ſtrong enough to have had a great many Reſolutions paſs'd in their Favour, if they had not been afraid of alarming the People. We obſerv'd that in the laſt Reign, the Lower Houſe made a Propoſal to the King in two ſeveral Parliaments to ſeize the Revenues of the Clergy, Attempts which none but the Lollards and their Friends could be capable of: And the Failure of this Project was owing to the Clergy's repeated Remonſtrances to the King, that the Propoſal came from the Heretics Quarter, and tended to the Overthrow of Religion. In the beginning of Henry the Fifth's Reign, the Clergy having us'd thoſe Endeavours we have juſt now mention'd to deſtroy the Lollards, the Enemies of the Clergy laid their heads together to make an Advantage of their furious Zeal, in order to draw them into a Snare; and they narrowly miſs'd falling a Prey to their own Reſentments.

Perſons who hold publick Offices oblig'd to ſwear to aſſiſt the Biſhops in the Extirpation of the Lollards.

IN the Parliament which met at Leiceſter the 31ſt of May 1414, a Motion was made in the Lower Houſe for a new Statute againſt the Lollards; which being greedily ſwallow'd by the Clergy's Friends, an Act was made, importing that all Perſons who held any publick Employments, ſhould be oblig'd to take an Oath that they would aſſiſt the Biſhops to the utmoſt of their power to deſtroy the Hereſy of the Lollards[a].

Commons addreſs the King to ſeize the Revenues of the Clergy.

NOW the Commons being ſcreen'd by this Act from all Suſpicion of Hereſy, preſented an Addreſs to the King of the ſame nature with thoſe which had been preſented to the King his Father, praying him to ſeize the Revenues of the Clergy into his own hands. Henry who had aſſembled this Parliament for no other purpoſe but that they might give a Sanction to his War with France, and grant him the neceſſary Supplys, did not reject the Propoſal; being very ſenſible that a Seizure of that kind would enable him to put his vaſt Deſigns in execution. Then it was that the Clergy were terribly alarm'd[b]. They could no longer tax the Houſe of Commons with being Heretical, after the Statute which they had ſo lately paſs'd againſt the Lollards. Their Chiefs being aſſembled to conſult how to ward off the Blow, judg'd it abſolutely neceſſary to give the King a Part, in order to ſave the Whole. With this View they offer'd to give him up the Revenues of 110 Priories of Aliens or Foreigners, that were then in the Kingdom, which the King accepted: And by this means the Parliament granted the Eſtates of thoſe Foreign Monks to the King, without the leaſt Oppoſition from the Clergy[c].

HENRY V.

The Clergy give him up 110 Alien Priories. P. 280.

THE Engliſh Hiſtorians add, that in the Clergy's Conſultations upon this Head, it was reſolv'd, that there was an abſolute Neceſſity of engaging the King in a War againſt France, on purpoſe to divert him from giving an ear to the Commons Propoſal: And that in purſuance of this Reſolution, Henry Chicheley, who was then juſt made Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the room of Arundel[d], harangued the King in Parliament with ſuch Eloquence, as perſuaded him to undertake the War againſt Charles VI. But we have already ſeen that this War was reſolv'd upon a Year before the meeting of the Parliament at Leiceſter.

Miſtake of our Engliſh Hiſtorians.

WE will conclude our Account of this ninth Tome of the Fœdera, with juſt pointing out a few more Acts which may be of ſome ſervice to the Writers or Readers of Hiſtory.

IN this Tome we have ſeveral Pieces relating to the Council of Conſtance, of which theſe are the chief:

1. A LETTER from Conſtance to the King, with the Particulars of the Emperor Sigiſmond's Entry into Conſtance, wearing the Collar of the Order of the Garter[e]; dated February the 2d, 1417.

Letter to the King from Conſtance. P. 434.

2. ANOTHER Letter from the ſame Place, to the Biſhop of Durham, with the Particulars of the Diſpute which aroſe in the Council betwixt the Engliſh and Arragoneze Nations, touching Precedency. The Engliſh gave up the Precedency for two Seſſions only, for fear, ſays the Letter-Writer, leſt a Pretence ſhould be taken from the Diſturbance attending Another to the Biſhop of Durham. P. 439.

[a] By this Law the poor Lollards were in as bad a caſe for Hereſy, as if they had committed Treaſon or Murder; they were to loſe both Life and Eſtate, only here was no Stain of Blood. And 'tis obſervable, that purſuant to this Act there was this Clauſe in the Sheriff's Oath, even ſince the Reformation, viz. Ye ſhall do all your Pain and Diligence to deſtroy and make to ceaſe all manner of Hereſies and Errors, commonly call'd Lollers within your Bailiffwick. [See Book of Oaths, p. 27.] And ſo it continu'd to the beginning of the Reign of Charles I. and then, viz. the 4th of December 1625, it was, by Direction of the King's Council, reform'd, and that Clauſe omitted.

[b] This wrought ſuch an Effect, ſaith Hall, that the fat Abbots began to ſweat, the proud Priors to frown, the poor Friers to curſe, and the ſilly Nuns to weep, for fear their Babel was now utterly to be demoliſhed.

[c] This appears by an Act dated at Weſtminſter, June the 25th, 1415.

[d] This Arundel, who was Sir John Oldcaſtle's bittereſt Enemy, and had in a Synod forbidden the Scriptures to be tranſlated into, or read in the Engliſh Tongue, was taken away in the Year 1414, by a very ſtrange Death, his Tongue being ſo ſwell'd, that he could neither ſpeak nor ſwallow. See Thomas Gaſconous his Theological Dictionary.

attending this Quarrel, to break up the Council[a].

Deposition of Pope John XXIII.

WE find by some Acts of this Tome, that Balthazar Cossa, who had been Pope with the Title of John XXIII. and afterwards depos'd, was by the Council deliver'd into the hands of the Emperor Sigismond, who committed him to the Custody of the Count Palatine of the Rhine. Some time after, the Count had Orders to bring him back to Pope Martin V. who would fain have committed him to the Charge of the Bishop of Winchester, Uncle to King Henry. But by all Appearance, this Prelate excus'd himself. Upon the whole, as they were carrying Balthazar to the Pope, he found means to escape to a Castle of the Doge of Genoa, who happen'd to be his intimate Friend: But having receiv'd a Safe-Conduct from Martin V. he went to meet him at Florence, where he confirm'd and renew'd his Abdication; after which he was made a Cardinal[b].

His Commitment by the Emperor into the hands of the Count Palatine of the Rhine. P. 538.

Pope Martin's Letter to the Bishop of Winchester. P. 540.

His Letter to King Henry P. 766.

THERE is another Letter from the said Balthazar Cossa, to King Henry V. wherein he tells him, that having always had a vast Affection for him as long as he enjoy'd the Papal Dignity, he retain'd the same Zeal for his Interests since his being made a Cardinal, and desir'd his Protection. This Letter is dated July 12, 1419[c].

WE don't find one Piece in this Tome which makes mention of the Affair of John Huss and Jerome of Prague[d].

Conventions with the new Pope for the Reformation of Abuses. P. 730.

THE Ambassadors of England having again demanded of the new Pope, that several Abuses crept into the Kingdom might be reform'd, Conventions were made about it at Florence; which, as well as those agreed on betwixt Gregory XI. and Edward III. are couch'd in such artful, general, and ambiguous Terms, as left the Pope at liberty to continue the Abuses after all his Pretences to redress them. These Conventions were dated at Florence, April the 17th, 1419.

We now enter the Tenth Tome of the Fœdera, which contains the Acts relating to the two last Years of Henry V's Reign, and a part of that of Henry VI[e].

ALTHO what remains of Henry V's Reign, from his signing the Peace of Troyes to his Death, takes up but two hundred and fifty pages of this Tome, yet we find several Pieces in it, which may be useful for the Explanation of the Histories both of France and England.

THE Peace of Troyes might have restor'd the Tranquillity of France, if the French had one and all come into it: and 'tis not improbable on the other hand, that if all had stood out, the Effect of their Unanimity would have been much the same at last; for then the King of England would have been too weak to force them to observe it. If they had been wise, they would have been unanimous in one or other of these two Points, by which means they would have been in possession of that Tranquillity to which their own Divisions altogether disabled them from attaining. If they had only consider'd their own Interest, it must have been very near the same thing to them whether France was govern'd by a King of England, or by a Prince of the House of Valois. They could not well think of being more happy under the one than the other; therefore it may be said that in the Quarrel which had already spilt so much Blood of two contending People, the real Point in dispute was nothing more than the Interest of two Families, both striving for the Crown of France, with little or no regard had at the same time to the Interest of the French in general: but 'tis common in such Cases for the Subjects to be the Bubbles of their Princes. The People are apt to espouse the Interest of their Princes with as much Heat as if their own were at stake, without considering, that which-ever gets the upper-hand, they themselves are scarce ever gainers in the issue. As Reflections on the Divisions of the French, and their different Sentiments of the Peace of Troyes.

[a] The Letter is dated March the 14th, 1417*.

* Goodwin says, that upon a full Debate of this Business of the Precedency, in which the Pre-eminence of the University of Oxford was prov'd above that of Salamanca, in an eloquent Speech made by Henry d'Abendon of Merton-College, who likewise shew'd the many Privileges which the Bishops of Rome had granted to the English University in preference to that of Spain, the whole Council was so mov'd by his Arguments, that they declar'd the Post of Honour for the English Nation.

[b] The Emperor's Letter to the Count Palatine above-mention'd is dated at Constance, January 7. 1418: The Pope's Letter to the Bishop of Winchester is dated the 5th of the Ides of that Month; and his Letter to King Henry, notifying the depos'd Pope's submissive Behaviour, is dated at Florence the 18th of the Calends of July 1419.

[c] At Florence.

[d] These two Martyrs were burnt by the infamous Council of Constance, which also made that abominable Declaration, That Faith is not to be kept with Hereticks.

[e] Mr. Rymer has left us a fine Picture of these Times, in his Dedication of it to Queen Anne.

" This tenth Tome, says he, of your Royal Bounty, contains what pass'd most memorable within the Compass " of one and twenty Years, from 1420 to 1441, a Period of great Variety in the Turn of Affairs, and of great " Curiosity: a Time wherein liv'd no Writer of Note to describe or transmit the Transactions to Posterity. It " begins when all the Talk and all the Business in Europe was the Great Peace concluded betwixt England and France. " The Emperor, and Princes of any Figure at that Time in Europe, send their Ambassadors to give their Laud " and Approbation of this Peace, and to be comprehended in it. The French King, with his Lords Spiritual and " Temporal, Citizens and Burgesses, representing the three Estates of France in Parliament assembled at Paris in " the Palace of St. Paul, make this Peace a publick Law, and enact that every Subject swear to observe and main- " tain it, and take an Oath of Allegiance to King Henry REGENT and HEIR of the Kingdom of France.

" Pursuant thereunto, we see King Henry, by virtue of his Regency, according to Emergencies, settling both " Church and State: Bishops, Abbots, Deans, and Priors, with the Subaltern Dignities, all strive who the fore- " most to take the Oaths. And what a dust make the Parsons, with all the Flock, their Parishioners at their " Heels, shewing their Zeal and Forwardness in this Point of Swearing? No Abby, Convent, or Religious House, " is easy till King Henry does confirm their Charters; nor is any Corporation pleas'd till they see their Franchises " under the Broad Seal of King Henry. This the invincible, your most noble Progenitor King Henry the Fifth, " at Bois le Vincennes, on a Day well known in those Parts by the name of St. Fiacres, (not of a Disease call'd St. " Fiacres, as Histories have reported) yielded to Death.

FOEDERA Tom. X.

As matters then ſtood with the French, the Treaty, which was juſt concluded, inſtead of putting an end to the War, furniſh'd both Parties with freſh Motives for continuing it. Before this Peace was made, Henry V. would have been glad of a Part of France, and have left the Remainder to the Family of Valois, upon the ſame footing that the Peace of Bretigny was concluded formerly in the time of Edward III. and it was on a Partition much like this, that all the Negotiations of Peace were founded after the time that Henry V. renew'd the War. But when the Peace of Troyes was ſign'd, Henry, conſidering himſelf as preſumptive and lawful Heir to Charles VI. could no longer conſent to ſuch a Partition: on the other hand, the Dauphin, who by the late Treaty was excluded from the Succeſſion of the King his Father, plainly ſaw that he could not hope to recover his Right bnt by Force of Arms.

As to the People of France, they had different Sentiments of the Peace of Troyes, according to the Parties in which they were liſted: the Burgundians rejoicing in the Ruin of the Armagnacs, choſe to ſee France under a foreign Dominion, rather than run the riſque of being expos'd another day to be trampled on by their Enemies. That was the true Reaſon which made them approve of the Peace of Troyes independently of the Rights of the two Princes who were Competitors for the Succeſſion, to which they ſhew'd little or no regard; tho' they pretended to act only from a principle of Juſtice, in eſpouſing the cauſe of the King of England. The Armagnacs, with the like Plea, declaim'd againſt this ſame Treaty, on pretence of the Injury which it did to the Royal Family. But in the main, both acted only from a Spirit of Party; and conſequently their reciprocal Animoſity ſtill continuing with the ſame Heat, France remain'd divided betwixt King Henry V. and the Dauphin. The King was ſuperior on this ſide the Loire, but he had not yet carry'd his Arms on the other ſide, where the Dauphin was Maſter of ſeveral Provinces, and had moreover ſuch Places in the Iſle of France, Champagne, and Picardy, as enabled him to keep the Field near Paris, and thereby to hinder the Engliſh from advancing on that ſide. Therefore Henry found himſelf under a neceſſity to make himſelf entire Maſter of the Northern Provinces, before he could attack his Enemy on the other ſide of the Loire, and drive him out of the Kingdom. And the Execution of this Project was what he turn'd all his Thoughts to, as ſoon as ever he had ſign'd the Treaty.

In June 1420, he ſet out from Troyes to beſiege Sens and Montereau, which, when he had taken, he ſtay'd ſome time at Corbeil, where in a Council of War it was alſo reſolv'd to beſiege Melun. And here we find a Commiſſion granted to the Duke of Burgundy to command at the Siege on the ſide of la Brie. 'Tis dated in the Camp near Melun, July the 12th, 1420. This Place held out four Months, as may be inferr'd from two Acts, one dated in the Camp before Melun, July the 20th, and from the Capitulation it ſelf, dated November the 17th.

HENRY V.

Sieges of Sens, Montereau, and Melun.

Melun ſurrender'd. P. 29.

During the Siege of Melun ſeveral things fell out to which the Acts in the beginning of this Tome have a Reference; but as they are not all of equal Importance, I ſhall only point out ſome of them, which till theſe Acts appear'd, were not ſufficiently explain'd.

We have obſerv'd that the Dutchy of Bretagne, ſo long conteſted between the Families of Montfort and Blois, was at length by the Aſſiſtance of Edward III. and by the Victory at Auray, ſecur'd to the Family of Montfort. At the time we are now ſpeaking of, there were two Brothers alive of the Blois Family, the eldeſt of which nam'd Olivier, was Count de Ponthieure. Their Submiſſion to John le Vaillant, who govern'd at that time in Bretagne, gave reaſon to think that they had quite forgot the Pretenſions of their Anceſtors to this Dutchy. But when the Duke was leaſt upon his guard againſt them, they invited him to one of their Houſes, on pretence of giving him an Entertainment, but arreſted him by the way, and carry'd him Priſoner to a Caſtle of Poictou; in which Action they had the Countenance of the Dauphin, who was very deep in the Plot. At this News the States of Bretagne conſtituted Alain de Rohan their Lieutenant General, or Regent, in the abſence of Arthur Count de Richemont, Brother to the Duke, who had been Priſoner in England ever ſince the Battle of Agincourt. And at the ſame time they ſent a Deputation to King Henry, to intreat him to grant the Count de Richemont a Furlough, that he might come over to aſſiſt in the Recovery of the Duke his Brother's Liberty. Henry was inclin'd to grant the Count this Favour, on certain Conditions contain'd in a Treaty which they made together, dated July the 22d. 1420*.

Revival of the Quarrel about the Succeſſion of Bretagne.

Duke of Bretagne put in Priſon.

Furlough for his Brother then a Priſoner in England. P. 8.

The chief of theſe Conditions was, that by Michaelmas-day 1422, the Count de Richemont ſhould be at London, and ſurrender himſelf a Priſoner as before; and that he ſhould on that Day make his Appearance before the King or his Succeſſor, and in his abſence, before his Lord Lieutenant, or High Chancellor, or before the Mayor of London.

This Act diſcovers two miſtakes, of which Argentre the Hiſtorian of Bretagne, and ſeveral other Frenchmen copying after him, have been guilty. In the firſt place he affirms, that the King would never conſent to the Furlough thus deſir'd of him for the Count de Richemont; which Aſſertion is Miſtakes of the French Hiſtorians detected.

* At Corbeil.

FOEDERA Tom. X. is flatly contradicted by this Treaty. And moreover, we find here Henry's Letters Patent dated January the 17th, 1421, at his Caſtle of Roan, after the Deliverance of the Duke of Bretagne, whereby he conſents, that in caſe he be oblig'd to make War againſt the Duke of Bretagne, who had not yet ſworn to the Peace of Troyes, the Count de Richemont ſhall not therefore be bound to take Arms againſt the Duke his Brother. But he adds, that the Count ſhall be oblig'd, happen what would, to perform the Conditions upon which he obtain'd his Furlough.

HENRY V. dying on the 31ſt of Auguſt 1422, juſt a Month before the Expiration of the Count's Furlough, he did not think fit to perform his Engagement; which led Argentre, and ſome other French Hiſtorians, into a ſecond Error, viz. That the Count de Richemont's Engagement to Henry V. was perſonal, with regard to that Monarch, and that he was clear of the ſaid Engagement by his Death, contrary to the Words of the Treaty, which were expreſs, that upon Michaelmas-Day 1422, he ſhould make his Appearance at London, before the King, or his Succeſſor, &c.

As 'tis probable we ſhall have a farther Occaſion to ſpeak of this Affair before we have done with this Tenth Tome of the Fœdera, I think it unneceſſary to ſay any more of it here.

Emperor's Ratification of the Treaty as K. of Bohemia. 14.

HERE is a ſecond Piece that may ſerve for explaining that part of Hiſtory which is tranſmitted to us during the Siege of Melun. 'Tis a Ratification ſent by the Emperor Sigiſmond of the Treaty of Alliance which he had made with Henry, duirng his ſtay in England in 1416. He had already ratified this Treaty as King of the Romans; but having been crown'd King of Bohemia in 1420, and becoming an Elector of the Empire, he confirms the ſaid Alliance in that Quality, as all the other Electors had already done, except the King of Bohemia. This Ratification of his is dated at Prague, July the 31ſt, 1420, the very Day of his being crown'd King.

FORASMUCH as the Treaty betwixt the Emperor and Henry V. was unknown to moſt Hiſtorians, ſome have ſuſpected that Father Maimbourg, who mentions it, had no grounds for it: But this Author is juſtify'd by the Treaty itſelf, which may be ſeen in the Ninth Tome of the Fœdera, and by the Ratification here mention'd.

Approbation of the Peace of Troyes by the Emperor and the Elect. Palatine. 14. 15.

AFTER theſe Acts come two others, which are Letters-Patent of the ſaid Emperor, and Lewis Elector Palatine, whereby they approve of the Peace of Troyes, and wiſh to be included in it, according to the room that was left them by the Terms of that Treaty. Sigiſmond adds this Exception in his Patent, ſaving the League and Confederacy betwixt us and our Brother the King of England, &c. Theſe Acts are of the ſame Date as the former.

Commiſſion for including the States of Bretagne in it. 15.

NEITHER the Duke nor the States of Bretagne, having yet ſworn to the Peace of Troyes, Henry appointed Commiſſioners to negotiate with them for their acceding to the ſaid Treaty, and for receiving their Oaths *.

Confirmation of the Treaty by the Aſſembly of the States. 30.

IMMEDIATELY after Melun was taken the two Kings, Charles and Henry, went to Paris, where there was a general Aſſembly of the States, to confirm the Peace of Troyes. We find here the Act of Confirmation, dated December 6. 1420. by which the States order the ſaid Peace to be obſerv'd as a public Law, and that all the French ſhould be oblig'd to ſwear to it. But the whole Aſſembly was made up only of the Partiſans of the King of England, and the Duke of Burgundy.

Sentence upon the Aſſaſſins of the Duke of Burgundy. P. 33.

AFTERWARDS we find the Sentence, which was pronounc'd at Paris the 23d of December 1420, againſt the Aſſaſſins of John Duke of Burgundy, who was murder'd at Montereau in 1419. All the French Hiſtorians ſay unanimouſly, that the Dauphin was ſummon'd to the Marble Table; and that upon his Non-appearance, he was declar'd attainted, and convicted of the ſaid Murder, baniſh'd the Kingdom, and depriv'd of all manner of Right of Succeſſion, namely to the Crown, which is the very Expreſſion of Mezeray. I am loth to accuſe that eminent Hiſtorian, and ſo many others, of being miſtaken in a Fact of ſuch importance, and as extraordinary as any that happen'd in France from the beginning of its Monarchy. But I know not what Judgment to make of it, when I conſider that the Sentence, which is here inſerted entire, ſays no ſuch thing, at leaſt particularly of the Dauphin. It is conceiv'd in general Terms againſt all thoſe in the lump that were guilty of the Duke's Murder, without ſpecifying either the Dauphin, or any body elſe in particular. The Reader perhaps will be pleas'd to ſee it inſerted here at length.

Given at Paris the 23d Day of December, in the Year of our Lord 1420, and of our Reign 41.

By the King in Council,

MILET.

It can't be ſaid that this Sentence was paſs'd againſt the Dauphin in particular, becauſe he is not ſo much as mention'd in the Purview or Decretory part of the Sentence, but only in the Recitative part. It can only affect him by ſuppoſing him guilty of the Crime in queſtion, and in that reſpect indeed it confounds him with all the others. 'Tis true, there is one place where the Sentence declares the Dauphin guilty, viz. That, where 'tis ſaid, that the Duke of Burgundy was kill'd by him and his Accomplices; which word Him refers to the Dauphin, named a great deal higher. 'Tis not unlikely that this Expreſſion was inſerted there, to the end that no body might make a Doubt of the Dauphin's being one of the Murderers. But however that be, if they had been diſpos'd to have paſs'd a Sentence directly againſt him, they would have worded it after quite another manner. Beſides, there's no ſuch Clauſe in it, as the French Hiſtorians have put in, namely, from the Succeſſion to the Crown. Therefore 'tis certain, that either they had never ſeen the Sentence it ſelf, or that there was another, particular and direct againſt the Dauphin. But in this Caſe it would be aſtoniſhing, that Henry V. ſhould take care to have the leaſt important Sentence committed to his Archives, and neglect the principal one.

Henry V.

After this Sentence, we find an Agreement betwixt Henry V. and the Houſe of Albret in Guyenne, dated January the 16th 1421*. In the Reign of Edward III. the Lord of Albret, with ſome other Noblemen of Guyenne, had exhibited an Appeal to the Court of Peers in France againſt the Prince of Wales, who was then Prince of Aquitain. This Appeal being receiv'd, tho' directly contrary to the Treaty of Bretigny, in which Guyenne had been declar'd independent of the Crown of France, caus'd the Renewing of the War. From that time the Families of Albret, Armagnac, and ſome others of the ſame Country, had conſtantly adher'd to the Intereſt of France, till the Death of the Conſtable d'Armagnac. As ſoon as he was kill'd, the Lord of Albret, and the other Gaſcoigne Nobility of the ſame Party, deſir'd a Truce, and obtain'd it. At laſt, after the Peace of Troyes, the Lords of the Houſe of Albret, and ſome others, thought fit to beg the King's pardon, and to return to their Duty. The Act above-mention'd ſettles the Conditions of their Accommodation. It is follow'd with a Pardon of the ſame date, which the King granted them for the Crime they had committed in adhering to the Appeal of their Anceſtors. It was a cunning Fetch in Henry to detach thoſe Lords from his Enemy's Intereſt; for by that means he had no more of thoſe Diverſions in Guyenne, which had been very troubleſome to him.

was to call a Parliament, which was to confirm the Peace of Troyes according to the Tenor of the Treaty. Moreover, his Intention was to desire a Subsidy to carry on the War against the Dauphin. The third Affair related to Scotland. When he set out from France, he left the Command of his Troops to his Brother the Duke of Clarence [a].

AS to the Supply, there was some Difficulty in obtaining it. At least, the House of Commons presented an Address to the King, complaining that England was ruin'd by the Conquest of France. Nevertheless, they at last granted him what he desir'd.

Estimate of the Revenues and Disbursements of the Crown. 113.

We have here a Fragment of an Estimate, or Abstract of the publick Revenues, and of the Expences to which the Crown was liable. It appears by this Memorandum that the ordinary Revenues and Perquisites amounted but to 55,743 l. Sterling, and that the Disbursements were 52,235 l. besides some extraordinary Articles for which no Provision was yet made. 'Tis not improbable that this Estimate, which is dated May the 6th [c], was drawn up to be laid by the Treasury before the House of Commons [d].

Passp. for the Countesses of Hainault. P. 67.

DURING the Interval betwixt the Arrival of the King and the Session of the Parliament, we find two Pieces in this Tome which may be of some use. The first is a Passport for Margaret of Bavaria and Jaqueline her Daughter, Countesses of Hainault, Holland, Zealand, and Friseland, dated at Westminster, March the 1st, 1421. It must be observ'd, that tho' Margaret the Mother came of the House of Burgundy, yet Henry, according to the Custom of England, gives her in this Passport the Name of Bavaria, because she was Dowager of the Earl of Hainault, of the Bavarian Family. Her Daughter Jaqueline, who was left a Widow by the Dauphin John, second Son to Charles VI. took to her second Husband John Duke of Brabant, her Cousin of the House of Burgundy; but he not having the Talent to please her, she elop'd with some Gentlemen to England. There is room to suspect that the Passport we were speaking of, was design'd to facilitate her Escape; and that by consequence Henry was not ignorant of her Intentions. What seems to support this second Conjecture, is the Honours which were paid to her in England, and an Act in this Tome, dated at Westminster, July the 10th, 1421, wherein the King grants her a Pension of 100 l. Sterling per Month for her Subsistence. Moreover, the Tenor of this Passport was for her travelling into the County of Ponthieu, belonging, says the King, to the said Jaqueline. This may serve as another Proof that Henry was no Stranger to this Princess's Intention. The County of Ponthieu belong'd to the King of England after the Reign of Edward I. but upon the Breach of the Treaty of Bretigny, the King of France had confiscated it, and Charles VI. had given it to John his Son, when he married him to Jaqueline, with whom it probably remain'd as her Dowry. Nevertheless, this Confiscation we have just mention'd was no sufficient reason to oblige Henry to own that the County of Ponthieu belonged to Jaqueline. It was an Inheritance of his Ancestors, to which he had a Right far more indisputable than to the Crown of France, the Title to which he had disputed with the King his Father-in-law; consequently 'tis not to be imagin'd what could oblige him to own that the County of Ponthieu belong'd to Jaqueline, unless it was to shew that he only gave a Passport to that Princess to go to her own Country, and that he might have by that means an excuse ready, in case he should be upbraided with having favour'd her Elopement. But at the same time, this Excuse shews that he knew her Design; and the Sequel of Jaqueline's History entirely explains it. When she arriv'd in England, she caus'd her Marriage with the Duke of Brabant to be dissolv'd by Pope Benedict XIII. tho' he had been depos'd in the Council of Pisa. She afterwards marry'd the Duke of Gloucester, Henry's Brother, not indeed during the King's Life, but immediately after. Therefore there's scarce any room to doubt but the Elopement of this Princess was concerted before-hand with Henry, and the Duke of Gloucester, in a view to this Marriage. 'Tis true that some Precaution was us'd, and that at first they did not act openly, because the King was loth to disoblige the Duke of Burgundy, who was Cousin-German to the Duke of Brabant. No wonder that the rich Dominions, of which Jaqueline was in possession, fir'd the Ambition of the English Prince. We shall have occasion hereafter to make a Remark, that this fatal Marriage was the chief Cause of the Decay of the English Power in France. When Henry V. thought to aggrandise his Family by establishing the Duke his Brother in the Netherlands thro' this Marriage, he little thought that this unjust Project would one day be the Ruin of his Son's Affairs.

THE second Piece which we have during the Interval we are speaking of, is a Convention betwixt the King and the Duke of Bourbon, whereby the said Duke, who had been a Prisoner in England ever since the Battle of Agincourt, was to have his liberty upon certain Conditions; the first of which was, that he should swear to the Peace of Troyes. But this Convention [e] did not take place, because the King died before it was executed by the Duke.

WHILE Henry was in England, the Duke of Clarence his Brother was killed at Bauge in Anjou[a], in a Battel with the Earl of Buchan, who had brought 7000 Scotſmen out of his Country to aſſiſt the Dauphin. This Battel was fought upon Eaſter-Eve in 1421. The Dauphin gave the Earl of Buchan the Conſtable's Sword as a Reward for this Service.

THIS Supply from Scotland was the third Affair which call'd over Henry to England. The State of the Caſe in ſhort was this. The firſt James that ever was King of Scotland, became ſo during his Confinement in England, where he had been a Priſoner ever ſince the Year 1406, when he was arreſted as going to France from the King his Father. But tho' he was very unjuſtly detain'd after his Acceſſion to the Regal Title, Henry IV. would never let him go. And Henry V. when he aſcended the Throne, being reſolv'd on a War with France, thought it his beſt way to keep this Prince as a Hoſtage, in caſe the Scots ſhould happen to give him any Diverſion upon his Frontiers. He had been alſo prevail'd on to detain him by the perſuaſion of the Duke of Albany, Regent of Scotland, who was King James's Uncle. This Prince fearing that the King his Nephew would be ſet at liberty, had made a ſecret Agreement with Henry, ſays Buchanan, whereby he engag'd himſelf not to diſturb his Expedition to France, on condition that he would keep his Priſoner. Which Agreement had been perform'd on both ſides 'till the Year 1419. But after the Death of the Conſtable d'Armagnac, the Dauphin being expell'd from Paris, and the Duke of Burgundy having ſeiz'd the Government of France, the Dauphin deſir'd Succours of the Scots; whoſe Regent was ſo importun'd by the great Men of his Country, that he could not avoid ſending him 7000 Men, under the Command of his Son the Earl of Buchan.

Hiſtory of James I. King of Scotland's Releaſe from his Impriſonment.

HENRY perceiving that the Scots began to ſtir in favour of France, reſolv'd to enter into a perſonal Negotiation with the King of Scotland his Priſoner, with a view of inclining him to make uſe of his Authority for depriving the Dauphin of any Benefit from thoſe Succours. We have an Act in this Tome of the Fœdera, which mentions an Agreement made between the two Kings, whereby Henry engag'd to give the King of Scotland a limited Furlough to go to his Kingdom, on condition that he ſhould firſt of all accompany him to France; and that he ſhould deliver up certain Hoſtages to him three Months after their Return. This Act is dated the 31ſt of May, 1421[b]; and by conſequence after the Defeat and Death of the Duke of Clarence at Bauge. Henry's View in taking James along with him to France, was to incline him to order the Scotch Troops in the Dauphin's Service to return to their own Country; and we find in Hiſtory, that James actually gave ſuch an Order to his Troops: But the Earl of Buchan did not think himſelf oblig'd to obey his Sovereign, while he was in the hands of the Engliſh. So that Henry's Policy prov'd abortive.

Agreement betwixt Henry and his Priſoner the King of Scotland. P. 125.

THERE's a Treaty of Alliance here[c], betwixt Henry and the Republick of Genoa. But 'tis of no great Importance, becauſe it did not bind the Parties to give each other mutual Aſſiſtance when there was occaſion. Nevertheleſs it ſhews the King's great Care to deprive the Dauphin of all manner of Aſſiſtance from the Allies of France, of which he had ſo much need; for we don't find that any Foreign Prince or State meddled in the War which was carried on in France, tho' it laſted above thirty Years after it was renew'd by Henry.

Henry's League with the Genoeſe. P. 117.

AFTER Henry V. had diſpatch'd all his Affairs in his own Kingdom, he return'd to France about the middle of June, leaving his Queen at home big with child; and he conferr'd the Dignity of Guardian or Regent upon the Duke of Bedford his Brother[d]. His Preſence was neceſſary in France, where the Dauphin began to make great progreſs, inſomuch that he kept the City of Paris in a manner block'd up. That Metropolis being ſet free by his Arrival, he made a pompous Entry into it, but did not ſtay there long; for about the Beginning of Auguſt, he ſet out with a deſign to give Battel to the Dauphin, who had then beſieg'd Chartres. The Dauphin retiring upon his approach, Henry purſued; but not being able to overtake him, he ſell at laſt upon Dreux, and made himſelf Maſter of it. He was before that Place on the 20th of Auguſt. His Forces being afflicted with a Dyſentery, he was oblig'd to put them into Quarters of Refreſhment, and himſelf return'd to Paris. Towards the middle of October he ſet out to beſiege Meaux. Mezeray places this Siege before that of Dreux, and even before King Henry's Voyage to England[e]. His Chronology is ſo confus'd in the Events of the Years 1420, 1421, and 1422, that it would be endleſs almoſt to correct all his Errors. The Siege of Meaux commenc'd the 25th of October, according to Monſtrelet, and laſted above ſeven Months; for according to the publick Acts it did not capitulate 'till the 2d of May, 1422, tho' Mezeray ſays that it held out but three Months. [e] 'Tis certain that the Siege did not commence 'till four Months after the King's Return. Mr. Rapin obſerves in his Hiſtory of England, Vol. III. of the French Edition, that Mezeray was led into this Miſtake by Juvenal des Urſins in his Reign of Charles VI.

to the Division of Meaux into two Parts, viz. the Town and the Market-place. The Town indeed was taken during the Winter, after which they were oblig'd to lay fresh Siege to the Market-place. The Capitulation of this Place, which is inserted at length in the Fœdera, may serve to vindicate Henry from certain Acts of Cruelty charg'd upon him, as if he had caus'd some of the Officers of the Garrison to be hang'd. 'Tis plain from the Articles, that he had expressly stipulated for the Delivery of certain Persons therein mention'd into the hands of Justice, for some Crimes of which they were guilty. For example, Vaurus was there hang'd upon a Tree which was call'd by his Name, because he had hang'd on it all the Burgundians that fell into his hands[a].

The Governor hang'd.

AMONG the Acts of the Year 1421, there are two of the King's Commissions to the Ambassadors whom he sent to the Emperor Sigismond[b]. The first was to treat with him for the Purchase of the Dutchy of Luxemburg. The second related to the Purchase of all that Prince's Rights in Dauphiny and Languedoc.

Henry's Negotiations with the Emperor for the Sale of Luxemburg, &c. P. 143, 144.

THERE's another Commission[c] to treat with the Marquis of Baden for the Ransom of Olivier de Blois, who was his Prisoner. This Olivier de Blois was the very same Count de Ponthieure who had carried off the Duke of Bretagne; after whose Deliverance he was oblig'd to fly his Country, and he design'd to retire to his Estate at Avesnes in Hainault; but fearing to take the direct Road thither, lest he should be apprehended by the way; he went thro' Switzerland and Germany, where the Marquis of Baden arrested him, on account of some Pretensions, which, as Argentre reports it, he had form'd upon Avesnes. 'Tis hard to conjecture what Henry could mean by wishing to have the Count de Ponthieure in his own hands; whether it was to do a Pleasure to the Duke of Bretagne, by giving up his Enemy to him, or rather to oblige him forthwith to sign the Peace of Troyes, for fear he should make a Tool of the Count to molest him in the Possession of the Dutchy; or finally, whether he had a Design to make use of the Name of Olivier de Blois to invade Bretagne for himself, just as Edward III. formerly made use of the name of Edward Baliol to render himself Master of Scotland.

AMONG the Acts of this Year we likewise find certain Instructions given by Henry to his Ambassadors, whom he sent to Germany to desire Succours of the Emperor and the Electors[d]. What is particularly observable in these Instructions, is, that after he had guarded them against all Objections that might be made, by furnishing them with proper Answers, he ordains them, in case the Electors were very obstinate, to open a certain seal'd Commission which he had put into their hands. This is a Demonstration that he did not trust even the Ambassadors themselves with the real Secret of their Embassies, except in cases of great necessity. But this Instance of his precaution came to nothing, by reason of the religious Quarrels in Bohemia, mention'd in a Letter from one of the Envoys to the King[e].

ON the 6th of December 1421, the Queen was deliver'd of a Prince, who was christen'd by the name of Henry. Jaqueline of Hainault was his Godmother.

AMONG the Acts of the Year 1422, there are several Patents from King Charles, whereby he confers the Government of Languedoc and Bigorre upon John Count de Foix. But it was a Government from which there was a necessity to remove the Count de Clermont, whom the Dauphin had establish'd there, while Henry was employed at the Siege of Melun. At the bottom of these Patents we find this Subscription, By the King, on the Report of his Grand Council, held by the King of England, Heir and Regent of France.

TOWARDS the middle of April, Queen Catherine went over from England to France, accompanied by the Duke of Bedford, who left the Regency of the Kingdom to his Brother the Duke of Gloucester.

THE Duke of Bretagne seeming at length inclin'd to swear to the Peace of Troyes, Henry sent him a Safe-Conduct to repair to Paris with a Retinue of 1000 Persons. 'Tis dated April the 24th, 1422[f].

THIS Safe-Conduct was immediately follow'd by another of the same Date, wherein 'tis said, that the Duke of Bretagne not being in a condition to repair to King Charles in Person, Henry grants Protection to his Envoys, on condition that they have a power to swear to the Peace of Troyes, and to engage their Master to do the same. Nevertheless this Prince started several other difficulties to hinder his taking this Step: He had been Neuter ever since the beginning of the War, and was loth to declare himself of either side 'till it was ended, for fear of making his Country the Seat of the War. In short, he acted so warily, that he never swore to the Peace as long as the two Kings liv'd.

He shuffles it off.

THE Dauphin having laid Siege to Cosne upon the Loire, in the Month of July, the Besieged agreed to surrender the Place if the Duke of Burgundy did not relieve it by the 18th of August. The Duke being inform'd of this Agreement, desired Succours from King Henry, in order to go and raise the Siege. Henry made answer, that he would go upon that Enterprize himself; and he

But being overtaken with a Dyſentery by the way, he was oblig'd to ſtop, and to give the Command of his Troops to the Duke of Bedford his Brother, who went and join'd the Duke of Burgundy; on whoſe Approach the Dauphin return'd the Hoſtages which were ſent him from the Town, and retir'd.

Henry's Sickneſs and Death. P. 253. MEAN time, Henry perceiving that his Diſtemper grew worſe and worſe, caus'd himſelf to be carried to Bois de Vincennes, whither the Duke of Bedford poſted immediately, and ſaw him reſign his laſt Breath. Thus died this great Prince on the 31ſt of Auguſt 1422, after a glorious Reign of nine Years and odd Months. By his Will he order'd that the Duke of Bedford ſhould be Regent in France, and the Duke of Glouceſter in England, during the Minority of the Prince his Son, who was hardly yet nine Months old. Moreover, he very earneſtly preſs'd it, that the French Princes, who were Priſoners in England, might not be ſet at liberty 'till young Henry was of Age to govern his Dominions himſelf, unleſs it might be a means for procuring Peace. Mezeray was miſtaken a few Days, in placing Henry the Fifth's Death on the 28th of Auguſt; for there's a Memorandum in this Tenth Tome of the Fœdera, which ſays poſitively, that he died on the 31ſt of Auguſt, 1422 *.

Mezeray's Miſtake of the Day of his Death.

His Laſt Will.

* There are various Accounts of the Diſtemper which carried him off. The French Hiſtorians (as Mr. Rymer obſerves in his Dedication of this Tome) ſay, 'twas the Diſeaſe de St. Fiacre, which is a Flux accompanied with the Hemorrhoids. Monſtrelet ſays, he died of St. Anthony's Fire. According to Walſingham, the King, by the Hardſhips he endur'd in the War, had brought on himſelf an acute Fever, attended with a violent Dyſentery. But Peter Baſſet Eſq; who was of his Bedchamber at the time of his Death, as well as his Attendant in all his Triumphs, and who 'tis ſaid carefully recorded his Exploits, affirm'd that he died of a Pleuriſy.

Before we paſs to the next Reign, we are tempted to give the General Character of this Great Prince, from the before-mentioned Third Volume of Mr. Rapin's Hiſtory, wherein the Author, by judiciouſly connecting his Actions with their Circumſtances, has diſcovered the falſe Colourings thrown upon his Character by the Engliſh Hiſtorians, who will not allow that he had any one Defect, and renov'd ſome Shades caſt over it by the French Writers, on purpoſe to ſully the bright Parts of it.

" In the firſt place, ſays he, as to the Government of his Kingdom of England, it muſt be own'd that he " ſteer'd wide of the Paths of Richard II. and even his own Father Henry IV. and never invaded the Liberties and Pri- " vileges of the People, of whoſe Happineſs he always ſhewed his Tenderneſs, by never refuſing his Aſſent to any " Bill of Parliament for the Publick Good. Yet in this reſpect he was facile to a Fault, when againſt his own " Inclination and Judgment too, he conſented to the Perſecution of the Lollards, out of pure Complaiſance to " the Clergy; for conſidering his excellent Senſe, he could not but ſee that there was little or no ground for the " Accuſation brought againſt them in the beginning of his Reign: But rather than he would openly retract his " Opinion, he always pretended as if he thought the Accuſation juſt, and at that very time too, when he pardon'd " ſuch of the condemn'd Perſons as pleaded not Guilty of the ſuppos'd Crime.

" Then as to his Military Atchievements, this part of his Conduct is perhaps, modeſtly ſpeaking, not ſo much " to his Credit as ſome have cried it up, notwithſtanding the glorious Succeſſes of his Arms. Indeed the Con- " queſt of France, conſider'd in itſelf, had ſomething in it which was great and wonderful: But upon a par- " ticular View of the then State of Affairs in that Kingdom, the thing cannot appear quite ſo extraordinary as it " ſeems to be, when taken apart from all its Circumſtances. He form'd his Enterprize at a time when the Di- " viſions of the French render'd them too weak to defend themſelves againſt him; for the very Places he took, " were only defended by the Beſieged, without any appearance of Troops to relieve them; and yet ſome of " thoſe Places held out ſeveral Months, 'till they were even ſtarv'd into a Surrender.

" The Battel of Agincourt therefore is the greateſt, and almoſt the only warlike Exploit for which he was juſtly " extoll'd; for in that celebrated Action he gave ſuch Proofs of Conduct, Courage and Valour, as are not com- " mon. But even this Battle, which to him prov'd ſo glorious, ſeems to call his Prudence very much in " queſtion. It may be ſaid, that tho' he conquer'd, it was becauſe he had put himſelf under an abſolute ne- " ceſſity either of vanquiſhing or periſhing, which is a Dilemma that a General never expoſes himſelf to, without " being liable to ſevere Reflections on his Conduct, whatever be the Succeſs. His Retreat to Calais, without " conſidering the Difficulties that attended it, and without ſecuring a Paſſage over the Soame; his Obſtinacy in " paſſing that River, and forcing his Retreat thro' an Enemy's Army ſo ſuperior in number to his own, ſeem " only excuſable by the Succeſs of the Battel of Agincourt, which was a ſort of Miracle; for if he had been " beat, than which nothing ſeem'd more probable, the World would not have fail'd to reproach him with Folly " and Raſhneſs. The Extremity to which he was reduc'd during his March (if the French Authors may be be- " liev'd) in being forc'd to offer the Reſtitution of Harfleur, and Reparation of the Damages he had caus'd in " France, ſhews how much he was convinc'd in his own mind that he had taken a raſh Step. Conſequently, " this Battel was owing more to his Perſonal Valour, than his Skill in the Art of War; for it muſt be confeſs'd, " that never Prince expos'd himſelf more in Battel, or gave more ſignal Proofs of true Valour, than Henry did " in this Action.

" As to his other Tranſactions in France, a Perſon may ſafely commend him for his fine Genius and his ſolid " Judgment. He manag'd the great Deſign he had form'd with wonderful Addreſs, by making a cunning Uſe of " the ſeveral Revolutions which happen'd in France, and turning them all to his own advantage. Few Princes " would have had the Temper he had, to halt after ſo glorious a Victory as that of Agincourt, and to prefer In- " action, which tho' not ſo glorious in appearance as if he had carried on the War, was in the main moſt to his " advantage. I cannot help thinking this Maſter-ſtroke of Policy one of the fineſt Paſſages of his Life, and one " of thoſe which give the cleareſt Evidence of the Soundneſs of his Judgment. The Negotiations which he " carried on at one and the ſame time with the Dauphin and the Duke of Burgundy, and the Inſtructions he gave " to his Ambaſſadors, plainly diſcover his Abilities, and how difficult it was to over-reach him. Some Writers " have been ſo laviſh in their Panegyric upon this great King, as to compare, nay, prefer him to David, " Alexander and Caeſar, forgetting a Parallel much nearer to their own Times and Country, which I think " would have been more juſt, namely, Edward III. his Great Grandfather, tho' for my own part I ſhould be " inclin'd to grant Edward the Preference; for he had to do with all France united againſt him; and the Diffi- " culties he met with in his Conqueſts were incomparably greater, and requir'd more Skill to ſurmount than thoſe " did which thwarted the Progreſs of Henry V.

" As for this King's Perſonal Qualities, both of Body and Mind, he had all that could make up the Character of " a great Man: He was robuſt, nimble, chaſte, temperate, could bear the Extremity of Hunger, Thirſt and " Weather, was a great Lover of Juſtice, devout without Guile, conſtant in Piety, ſerious in his Devotions, a " great Patron of the Church and Clergy, prudent in Council, daring in Enterprizes, and reſolute in their Execution. " He gave new Vigor to Military Diſcipline, which had been in a manner loſt in England ſince the Reign of

" Edward

" Edward III. Never did the Engliſh Nation ſhine with ſo much Luſtre as under this illuſtrious Prince, who was " moreover ſo happy as to end his Life in the middle of his Proſperities, and not to ſee, as Edward did, the Fruits " of all his Labour blaſted.

" After having mention'd what the Engliſh have ſaid to the Advantage of this Prince, the Impartiality of Hiſtory " demands that we ſhould not paſs over in ſilence ſome Faults with which the French have tax'd him, perhaps either " out of Ill-nature or Envy. Firſt of all they have charg'd him with Cruelty and Barbarity in his Management of the " War. This Accuſation they have founded not only upon the Maſſacre of the Priſoners at the Battle of Agincourt, " but on his putting to death ſome of the Officers who had ſignaliz'd themſelves in the Defence of Caen, Melun " and Meaux. But as to the Priſoners taken at Agincourt, there is no doubt that the Maxims of War, and the " Neceſſity of his own Security, might be an Excuſe for the Order he gave upon that Head, ſuppoſing that it was " not too precipitant. As to his Treatment of the Burghers and Garriſons of the Places he took, 'tis not impoſ- " ſible but there might be a Mixture of Revenge in it, on account of the Time which thoſe brave People had made " him loſe; but this I can only ſpeak by Conjecture. 'Tis certain that he was ſevere to ſome, but the Reaſons " are altogether unknown. And to clear up ſuch things, one ſhould know more Circumſtances than have as yet " come to light. Nevertheleſs, with reſpect to the People of Meaux, 'tis known that they had render'd them- " ſelves guilty of ſeveral Murders, for which without doubt they deſerv'd to be puniſh'd. It was neither Injuſtice " nor Barbarity to hang up the Baſtard de Vaurus, upon the very ſame Tree where he himſelf hung up all the Duke of " Burgundy's Creatures that he could lay his hands on. I know nothing of the three others that were executed at " the ſame time, but 'tis not likely that they were ſingled out of all the reſt of the Garriſon, to make them feel the " Conqueror's Severity. As to the Engliſh and Iriſh Subjects of the King, who ſerv'd his Enemies, no wonder if " they were excepted out of the Capitulation. And it were only to be wiſh'd for Henry's Reputation, that it were " as eaſy to apologize for his refuſing to give Quarter to the Scots, becauſe they would not yield Obedience to " their King at the time when he was actually his Priſoner.

" The French alſo accuſe this Prince of exceſſive Pride, to ſuch a degree, that, as they ſay, he ſent the Mar- " ſhal de L'Iſle Adam to the Baſtile, for having preſum'd to look him in the Face when he ſpoke to him. 'Tis " true, that if the King had no other reaſon for committing him, this was carrying an Air too ſtately and auſtere. " But who will ſay that a Look or a bare Geſture is not ſometimes very provoking? And who knows whether " there was not ſomething in the Marſhal's Addreſs, ſome aggravating Circumſtance, or ſome unguarded Ex- " preſſion which might intitle him juſtly to that Puniſhment, tho' they have taken care to conceal it?

" Avarice is another Fault, with which they charge him home. They ſay, that after he was declar'd Regent " and Heir of France, he never did a generous Action to the Burgundians, who had ſerv'd him, nor to the Dau- " phin's Party who made their voluntary Submiſſion to him. I will not undertake to juſtify him upon this " Head, the rather becauſe it does not appear that he was very liberal to the Engliſh themſelves that ſerv'd him, " either for want of Ability or Inclination. Tho' he had a great number of good Officers and excellent Generals, " we don't find that he rewarded them according to their Merit and Services, excepting only the Earl of " Dorſet, whom he created Duke of Exeter, with a Penſion of 1000 l. a Year; Falſtaff, to whom he gave a " conſiderable Eſtate in the Neighbourhood of Harfleur; and the Earl of Salisbury, whom he put in poſſeſſion " of the County of Perche. But however it be, perhaps the Want of Liberality in this Prince was an Argument of " his Wiſdom. I have already mention'd that the whole Revenue of the Crown amounted but to 56,000 l. " Sterling, and that he was oblig'd to pawn his Jewels to make up the Deficiency of what ſcanty Supplies the " Parliament granted him, to ſupport the Expences of the War. Was it proper for him to be laviſh under " ſuch Circumſtances? It were to be wiſh'd that on many occaſions Sovereigns would be more ſparing of their " Bounties, which are but too often a Burden upon their poor Subjects.

" Laſtly, another Fault which the French think fit to charge him with, is an unbounded Ambition. In order " to come at the truth of this Accuſation, one ſhould examine into the reaſon he had for renewing, or rather " continuing a War againſt France, which ſhe herſelf not only gave occaſion for, by the Violation of the " Treaty of Bretigny, but which France itſelf actually begun; tho' ſuch an Enquiry would be altogether needleſs, " after what has been ſaid in the Reign of Edward III. Mean time it cannot be denied, but Henry V. was " very ambitious. His firſt Aim at ſetting out was only to reſtore the Treaty of Bretigny; but as ſoon as he " had a Proſpect of aſcending the Throne of France, his Ambition did not ſuffer him to keep within thoſe Bounds " which he preſcrib'd to himſelf at the beginning of the War, as has been made appear by his Deſign of making " one of his Brothers King of Naples, and the other King of Sicily, of procuring four Provinces in the Nether- " lands for the Duke of Glouceſter, of purchaſing the Duchy of Luxemburg, and of treating for Dauphiny and the " Duchy of Bretagne."

Some of the French Writers have been ſo juſt indeed as to give this Prince that due Praiſe, which others of their Countrymen had not Good-nature enough to beſtow upon their Conqueror. " Never any Prince, ſays Juvenal des Urſins, " knew better how to conquer, or to keep what he had gain'd by his Victories: And his noble " Soul had deſign'd greater and more glorious Enterprizes, but he did not live to accompliſh them. He was " exact and impartial in his Adminiſtration of Juſtice, which made him rever'd by all, ſo that his Death was not " only lamented by the Engliſh his natural Subjects, but by the French too, who when they had felt the mild In- " fluences of his moderate Government, no longer regarded him as their Conqueror, but as their Father and Pro- " tector: For, ſays Peter de Fenin, he diſtributed Juſtice without Partiality or Favour, by which he entirely gain'd " the Affections of the People; for he protected 'em from the intolerable Violences and Oppreſſions which the " Nobles and Gentlemen caus'd them to ſuffer in all Parts of France. He made himſelf be exactly obey'd, ſay " Monſtrelet and Fevre, inſomuch that the ſtricteſt Order imaginable was obſerv'd in his Army; and he ſeem'd " to have reviv'd that antient martial Diſcipline of the Romans, by which they conquer'd the World. And to theſe " natural Endowments, ſays our Goodwin, were added the Advantages of Learning, for his firſt Youth was ſpent in " the Univerſity of Oxford, where his Father had plac'd him under the Tuition of his Uncle Henry Beauford, " Chancellor of that Univerſity, Biſhop firſt of Lincoln, then of Wincheſter, and afterwards a Cardinal, with the " Title of Euſebius."

Another Engliſh Writer, viz. the anonymous Author of the Hiſtory of England, which was firſt printed in two Volumes Octavo, above 20 Years ago, has mentioned ſome Peculiarities in his Character, with which we ſhall conclude.

" He was ſo nimble-footed, that with two of his Lords, without Bow or other Engine, he could take a wild " Buck or Doe in a large Park. He was a great Lover of Muſick both Inſtrumental and Vocal; and in his " Chapel, among his other private Devotions, he uſed certain Pſalms of David, tranſlated into Engliſh Verſe by " John Lydgate a Monk of Bury. What was ſaid of Æneas, may be truly affirm'd of him:

———Quo juſtior alter
Nec Pietate fuit, nec Bello major & Armis.

" For he ſeldom fought a Battle where he did not gain the Victory, and never won a Victory, where he did not " give the Glory to God by a publick Thankſgiving. He was a better Man, and a much better King than a " Subject: Till then, he was not in his proper Orb; and then no wonder that his Motion was irregular. He " was merciful in his Nature, but not to the prejudice of Wiſdom or Juſtice; and therefore eſteem'd wiſe Se- " verity better than fooliſh Pity. He was ſo temperate in his Diet, and ſo free from Affectation or Vain-Glory, " that it might be truly ſaid he had ſomething in him of Cæſar that Alexander the Great wanted, Sobriety; and " ſomething of Alexander that Cæſar had not, and that was, he would not be flatter'd. He was indeed a great " lover of Glory, but not that empty Bubble made up of popular Breath, but what was real and ſubſtantial, and " would laſt till Time be no more."

The

The Reign of HENRY VI.

FOEDERA Tom. X.

Having done with thoſe Acts in the Tenth Tome of the Fœdera, which relate to the two laſt Years of the Reign of Henry V. I proceed to the Remaining Acts, which take in the nineteen firſt Years of Henry VI. from the firſt of September 1422, to the latter end of October, 1441.

THE Affairs of France, and the Domeſtick Tranſactions being the principal Subject of the Hiſtory of theſe nineteen Years, one muſt have a juſt Idea of both theſe Branches in particular, to be able to comprehend the Motives of the Acts contain'd in this Tome: Not but there are a great many other things, ſome of which naturally depend on theſe; but to treat of ſuch in particular, would run out our Extract to an exceſſive length.

BEFORE I ſpeak of the Acts in this Tenth Tome, which are uſeful for the explaining of Hiſtory, 'tis abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew what was the State of the Engliſh Affairs at the time of Henry the Fifth's Death, and what turn they took afterwards, during the nineteen firſt Years of Henry VI.

State of Affairs at the Death of Henry V.

HENRY V. had put his Affairs both in England and France into a very advantageous Situation. In England he was belov'd, fear'd, and eſteem'd by all his Subjects. There was not the Appearance of any one Seed of Rebellion lurking amongſt them. The Crown ſeem'd to be eſtabliſh'd for ever in the Houſe of Lancaſter. As to France, every thing ſucceeded to that Monarch's Wiſhes, and even far beyond his Hopes. After the Battel of Agincourt, moſt of the Princes of the Blood Royal of France, or the chief at leaſt of thoſe whom he included in the number of his Enemies, were his Priſoners in England. By the Peace of Troyes he had acquir'd the Titles of Regent and Heir of France, with the Right of ſucceeding to the Crown after the Death of Charles VI. his Father-in-law. And it may be ſaid, that during the two laſt Years of his life he was really King of France, tho' he had not the Royal Style and Title, becauſe he abſolutely govern'd in the Name of Charles, who was no more than the ſhadow of a King. But in order to have a right Idea of the Extent of this Prince's Dominion in France, it muſt be remember'd, that immediately after the late Duke of Burgundy had made himſelf Maſter of Paris, and of the Perſon of King Charles, the Dauphin, who had a wonderful Eſcape, aſſum'd the Title of Regent, and that ſeveral Cities and Provinces rang'd themſelves under his Obedience. Conſequently, Henry V's Authority as Regent, extended no farther than the Iſle of France, la Brie, Champagne and Picardy. And even in thoſe Provinces there were ſeveral good Towns which ſided with the Dauphin. Henry alſo poſſeſs'd Guyenne and Normandy; not as Fiefs of the Crown of France, but in full Propriety and Sovereignty; at leaſt he claim'd it as ſuch. The firſt of thoſe two Provinces had been in his Family for almoſt 300 Years, and he had reconquer'd the ſecond ſince the renewing of the War. He alſo reckon'd the two Burgundys with Flanders and Artois, to be his Dependencies, becauſe they belong'd to the Duke of Burgundy, who own'd him for Regent and Heir of France, and was moreover his firm Friend.

HENRY VI.

Diviſion of France under Henry V. and the Dauphin.

THE Dauphin had under his Obedience Languedoc, Dauphiny, Poictou, Saintonge, the Angouleſme, Limouſin, Perigord, Auvergne, Lionois, Berry, la Touraine, la Beauſſe, and all the other Countries in general along the Loire. He was alſo own'd in Provence, Anjou and Maine, which belong'd to his Brother-in-law Lewis of Anjou, King of Sicily. And Bretagne was the only Province in all France that obſerv'd a Neutrality. By this Diviſion of the Provinces in the Intereſt of each of the Parties, 'tis eaſy to gueſs that their Forces would not have been unequal, if England which continually ſupply'd Henry with Troops and Money, had not made the Balance turn on his ſide.

IT was no eaſy Task for Henry to eject the Dauphin out of the Provinces of which he was in poſſeſſion, or which own'd him for lawful Heir to the King his Father: notwithſtanding the Peace of Troyes which excluded him from the Succeſſion. To ſucceed in this Deſign, it was abſolutely neceſſary, in the firſt place, to make himſelf Maſter of the Towns which the Dauphin retain'd in the Iſle of France, and the neighbouring Provinces: And this was Henry's principal Care during the two laſt Years of his Life. If he had liv'd longer, 'tis very probable that he would not only have put that Project in execution, but that he would alſo have carry'd his Arms into the Southern Provinces, beyond which his Enemy could have had no ſhelter.

THIS Monarch had another Care upon him too, and that was to oblige the Duke of Bretagne to ſwear to the Peace of Troyes.

SINCE the War was renew'd, the Duke had obſerv'd an exact Neutrality: But as ſoon as the Peace was proclaim'd, he ſaw himſelf neceſſarily oblig'd either to ſubmit himſelf to it, or to take part with the Dauphin. He was very ſenſible that Henry, being become Regent, would not ſuffer a Vaſſal of the Crown to remain in a ſtate of Neutrality. For the Neutrality of the Duke of Bretagne which was advantageous to the King of England while he diſputed the Crown of France, was no longer ſo after the

FOEDERA Tom. X.

Quarrel was decided in his Favour. Conſequently, the Duke of Bretagne could neither remain neuter, nor take part with the Dauphin who was not in a Condition to protect him, without bringing the War into his Country. Theſe Conſiderations made him determine to ſend Ambaſſadors to Henry, to give him to underſtand that he was diſpos'd to ſwear to the Peace of Troyes. Henry accepted his Offer; but the Duke made ſo many Delays, that before he did it he heard of Henry's Death; ſo that contrary to his Expectation he ſaw himſelf at liberty, either to continue neuter, or to eſpouſe that Party which beſt ſuited with his Intereſts.

Duke of Bretagne dallies with Henry V.

HENRY V. died the 31ſt of Auguſt, 1422, at a time when he was employ'd in the Conqueſt of thoſe Places which the Dauphin was poſſeſs'd of near Paris, and in negotiating with the Duke of Bretagne for his Acceptance of the Peace of Troyes. His Father-in-law Charles VI. ſurviv'd him but 50 Days, or 'till the 21ſt of October. The Death of thoſe two Princes, which happen'd ſo near each other, entirely chang'd the face of Affairs. As ſoon as the Eyes of Charles VI. were clos'd, the Duke of Bedford, Brother to the late King Henry V. caus'd Henry VI. his Nephew, tho' but ten or eleven Months of Age, to be proclaim'd King of France. At the ſame time, the Dauphin caus'd himſelf to be crown'd at Poictiers, by the Name of Charles VII. Thus the ſame Reaſon which Edward III. formerly had for beginning the War, and Henry V. for renewing it, after a very long Interruption, ſtill ſubſiſted to incline Henry VI. or his Council to continue it, tho' with a better Foundation than his two Illuſtrious Predeceſſors. For Edward III. and Henry V. began it on Pretenſions which were never determin'd; but Henry VI. had the Treaty of Troyes in his favour, which adjudg'd the Crown of France to him, after the Death of Charles VI. his Grandfather by the Mother-ſide. On the other hand, Charles VII. far from owning the Authority or Validity of the Peace of Troyes, alledg'd on the contrary, that it was purely owing to the Malice and Preſumption of the Queen his Mother, and the Duke of Burgundy, who had impos'd on the Weakneſs of the King his Father, known to the whole World. He inferr'd from thence, that this pretended Peace made by an infirm King, and which had been only ratified by a few of the States of France, could not be regarded as a Fundamental Law, the rather becauſe it ſapp'd the real Foundations of the Succeſſion to the Throne. This is the Ground of that War which was carried on for above 30 Years longer, 'till mere Force of Arms decided the Quarrel in favour of Charles VII. And this is the Subject of the Acts of this Tenth Tome, which relate to the Affairs of France. The major part of thoſe Acts are of no great uſe for explaining the Military Actions, which are particularly reported in all the Hiſtories of that Period. But ſome of them are very uſeful, with regard to State-Affairs and Negotiations. Mean time, as they ſuppoſe ſuch Conſequences as were produc'd by the War during the 19 Years included in this Tome, 'tis abſolutely neceſſary to give a general Account of what paſs'd in that Interval, becauſe thoſe Acts are founded thereupon. And afterwards it will be altogether as neceſſary to mention a Word of the Domeſtick Affairs of England; theſe two Branches having ſo near a Correſpondence with one another, that to ſeparate them would be leaving them in ſome Obſcurity.

I. Affairs of France.

THE Duke of Bedford, the eldeſt of Henry the Fifth's Brothers, who had been appointed Regent of France by the King his Brother on his Death-bed, directed all Affairs, both Military and Political, 'till his Death, which happen'd in 1435. He was a Prince endow'd with very excellent Qualities: To compleat his Praiſe in one word, 'tis ſufficient to obſerve that he perfectly reſembled the late King his Brother. Under his Conduct the Affairs of the King his Nephew proſper'd every day more and more 'till the fatal Siege of Orleans, of which we ſhall take notice hereafter.

Character of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France.

IN 1423, the Earl of Salisbury won the Battel of Crevant, and in 1424 the Duke of Bedford gain'd a great and ſignal Victory at Verneuil *. Theſe two Shocks which Charles receiv'd one upon the back of another, would have put him out of a Capacity to have ſtood his ground any longer, if ſeveral unforeſeen Events had not contributed to re-eſtabliſh his Affairs on a better Footing.

Battles of Crevant and Verneuil.

THE firſt of theſe Events was a Quarrel which happen'd between the Duke of Burgundy and the Duke of Glouceſter (who was Brother to the Duke of Bedford, and Regent in England) upon account of Jaqueline of Hainault. This Princeſs, who was Widow of Dauphin John, ſecond Son of Charles VI. having married the Duke of Brabant, was ſo unhappy with this ſecond Husband,

* This Battel was fought the 28th of Auguſt, according to the Compleat Hiſtory of England, which, in a Note from Hollingſhead, ſays, that Mountjoy King at Arms, and the other Engliſh Heralds there preſent, reported that there were 9,700 French and Scots kill'd, and 2,100 Engliſh; the number ſlain on the ſide of the Enemy being as great as that of the Engliſh Army, which conſiſted but of 1,800 Horſe, and 8000 Foot. The Compleat Hiſtory adds, that the Duke of Alenſon, the Lords Tajeſt and Hermit, Sir Pierce Harriſon, and above 300 other Gentlemen, beſides common Soldiers, were taken Priſoners: And that the Viſcount Narbon, tho' ſlain in the Fight, was afterwards hang'd on a Gibbet, becauſe he had been one of the Murtherers of the Duke of Burgundy. And that the Enemy alſo loſt moſt of their beſt Commanders, as well Scots as French, viz. The Earls of Aumerl, Douglas, Buchan, Ventadour, Foreſt and Marie, the Lords Gravile, Fountains, Ambois, Gaules, Touars and Poiſy.

Husband, that at length she resolv'd to retire to England. As soon as she was there, she sent to Pope Benedict XIII. tho' he had been depos'd by the Council of Pisa, to dissolve her Marriage; which Divorce she no sooner obtain'd, but she married the Duke of Glouceſter, who put himself in possession of Hainault. That was the real Cause of the Rupture betwixt him and the Duke of Burgundy, who adher'd to the Cause of his Cousin-German the Duke of Brabant; and their Quarrel rose to such a height, that they agreed to decide it by single Combat; but they did not stand to their Agreement. Whatever was the matter, the Duke of Glouceſter minding only his private Affairs, and the Acquisition of Hainault, Holland, Zealand and Friseland, which were Jaqueline's Inheritance, neglected to send to the Regent of France his Brother those Succours, by the help of which he would probably have compleated the Conquest of France, considering the then desperate Condition of Charles's Affairs.

Duke of Gloucester marries her.

THE second Event which made well for King Charles, was the Defection of the Duke of Bretagne from his late Attachment to England. In 1423, the Dukes of Bedford and Burgundy had gain'd over the Count de Richemont, who carried the Duke of Bretagne his Brother to Amiens, where he sign'd a Treaty of Alliance with those two Princes. At the same time they concluded a Marriage between the Duke of Bedford, and Anne Sister to the Duke of Burgundy, and another between the Count de Richemont, and Margaret another of the Duke of Burgundy's Sisters, and Widow of the Dauphin Lewis. Some time after, the Count de Richemont quarrelling with the Duke of Bedford, prevail'd on his Brother the Duke of Bretagne to side with King Charles, and receiv'd the Sword of the Constable of France as a Reward of his Service. Consequently, the Duke of Bretagne, being now become an Enemy to the English, suffer'd the Constable his Brother to raise an Army of 20,000 Men in his Country to act against them.

Marriages of the Duke of Bedford and the Count de Richemont to the Duke of Burgundy's Sisters.

AT the same time a very warm Quarrel betwixt the Duke of Glouceſter and his Uncle Henry Beaufort Bishop of Wincheſter, so embroil'd the Court of England, that the War with France was entirely neglected. It was carried to such a heighth on both sides, that the Duke of Bedford was oblig'd to hasten over to England, to endeavour to accommodate it, at the very time when the Constable de Richemont was preparing to invade Normandy with an Army of 20,000 Men. These three Events which I have just mention'd, gave King Charles time to recover breath, and robb'd the English of a fair Opportunity to push him beyond the Loire, and perhaps to drive him out of the Kingdom.

Duke of Bedford goes over to England to pacify it.

THE Duke of Bedford stay'd in England all the Year 1426. And the Constable de Richemont taking advantage of his Absence, and of the Disturbances at the Court of England, enter'd into Normandy, and made himself Master of Pontorson; but afterwards going to besiege St. James de Beuvron, he there lost his Baggage and Artillery, by means of a Panic Terror which seiz'd the Troops as they were making an Attack: And not long after, his Army disbanded themselves, because he had no Money to pay them. On the other hand, the Earl of Warwick, who commanded in France in the Regent's absence, receiv'd a terrible Shock at the Blockade of Montargis, where the Bastard d'Orleans beat two of the three Bodies into which the English Army was divided the better to block up the Place. The weak Condition which the English were in at that time, might have been of vast advantage to King Charles, if it had not been for the Troubles at his own Court, owing to the high Spirit of the Constable.

IN 1427, the Duke of Bedford return'd to France with a great Reinforcement of Troops; and therewith oblig'd the Duke of Bretagne to renounce his Treaty with King Charles, and to promise that he would do Homage to Henry, according to the Peace of Troyes.

Duke of Bedford returns to France.

He reduces the Duke of Bretagne.

BY the Duke of Bedford's Return, the Face of Affairs was quite alter'd. In 1428, the English had 20,000 Men on foot in France, besides their Garrisons, while King Charles had not an Army to take the Field with. Moreover, the Earl of Salisbury arriv'd from England in July with a Reinforcement of 5000 Men.

Earl of Salisbury carries over more Forces from England.

THE Regent finding himself vastly superior, resolv'd upon the Execution of that Design, which he had long form'd, of carrying the War into the Heart of the Provinces which own'd King Charles. For this end he put 16,000 Men under the Command of the Earl of Salisbury, and order'd him to advance towards the Loire. This General being Master of the Country without any danger of Opposition from Charles, held a great Council of War, in which they resolv'd upon the Siege of Orleans; but before he commenc'd it, he thought fit to take in several little Places in the Neighbourhood, which might have incommoded him. While he spent time in these trifling Conquests, the French provided Orleans with all manner of Necessaries for its Defence; and at the same time a great number of Generals and other Officers threw themselves into the Place. The English Army did not come before it 'till the 12th of October.

Siege of Orleans.

IT would be spending time to no purpose to give a particular account of this famous Siege, the Circumstances of which are related in all the Histories both of France and England;

Mr. Rapin, who dates this Battle on the 16th of August, says, that the French and Scots left above 5000 Men kill'd in the Field of Battle, besides a great number of Wounded, and Prisoners, among the latter the Marshals de la Fayette and Gaucour; and that the English, who lost about 16 or 1700 of their bravest Soldiers, found all the Baggage of the French, Scots, and Italian Officers in Verneuil, with the Money design'd to pay their Army.

FOEDERA Tom. X.

and such a Detail would be yet more unnecessary here, because there are but few Acts in this Tome which mention it. However, since the Success of this Siege serves as the Basis and Foundation of what is to follow hereafter, 'tis impossible to avoid giving some account of it.

Earl of Salisbury kill'd before it, and the Earl of Suffolk commands in his room.

THE Earl of Salisbury, General of the English Army, was kill'd with a Cannon-Ball at the beginning of the Siege, and the Earl of Suffolk took on him the Command of the Forces. During the Lent Season of the Year 1429, the Duke of Bedford sent a Convoy of Salt-Fish from Paris; which was attack'd by the French, but they were repuls'd with great Loss. This Action was call'd the Herring Battle[a].

Herring Battle.

HITHERTO every thing fell out as the English would have it. As King Charles was not able to bring an Army into the Field, there were no Hopes of his saving Orleans. But one of the most extraordinary Incidents that ever happen'd, procur'd him what in the nature of the thing he could never have expected. While he was at Chinon in Poictou, despairing of being ever able to maintain himself longer in the Northern Provinces, and contriving how to make a Retreat to Dauphiny, a Country-woman of Lorrain, who was 28 Years old, and call'd Joan of Arc, came to his Court and told him, that she had an express Order from Heaven to raise the Siege of Orleans, and to have him crown'd at Rheims. This Story is so well known, that it would be superfluous to enter into the further Particulars of it. And it would be still more unnecessary in this Place to examine from what Motive this young Woman acted, who they said was rais'd up by a Miracle for the saving of France, and to whom they afterwards gave the Name of The Maid of Orleans. It shall suffice to say in a few words, that Charles having resolv'd, as the last Remedy, to attempt the throwing of a Convoy into Orleans, Joan of Arc desir'd to be one of the Party: That the Convoy enter'd the City in spite of all the Besiegers could do to hinder it: That two Days after, the Maid putting herself at the head of a great Detachment of the Garrison, attack'd the chief Forts which the English had rais'd about the Place, and carried them Sword in hand. And finally, that this vigorous Action forc'd the Besiegers to raise the Siege in Disorder, after having been seven entire Months before it.

Duke of Bedford's Letter about her to the King. P. 408.

THE following is the Fragment of a Letter from the Duke of Bedford to the King his Nephew, after the raising of the Siege; which shews how much he and all the English were astonish'd at this unexpected Event. 'Tis without Date, and is improperly inserted among the Acts of 1428, tho' 'tis plain it could not be wrote before the raising of the Siege of Orleans, which was in May 1429.

HENRY VI.

"ALL things here prosper'd for you 'till "the time of the Siege of Orleans, under- "taken by whose Advice God only knows. "Since the Death of my Cousin of Salis- "bury, whom God absolve, there fell by "the Hand of God, as it seemeth, a great "Stroke upon your People, that was as- "sembled there in great number, caus'd in "great part, as we trow, by the Confidence "they had in a Disciple and Limb of the "Devil, call'd Pucelle, (i. e. Maid or Vir- "gin) that us'd false Inchantments and "Sorcery.

"THE which Stroke and Discomfiture "not only lessen'd in great part the number "of your People here, but also sunk the "Courage of the Remainder in a wonder- "ful manner, and encourag'd your Enemies "to assemble themselves forthwith in great "numbers."

Decay of the English Affairs in France.

AFTER that time, the English Affairs fell into such a State of Decay, as was perfectly astonishing. They soon lost all the Places which they had taken about Orleans, and the Earl of Suffolk was made Prisoner in Gergeau. And in this very Year of 1429, they were defeated at Patay, and their General Talbot was left a Prisoner in the hands of the French. In fine, King Charles in a little time went to Rheims, where he was crown'd, after having travell'd through 50 Leagues of the Enemy's Country, and taken possession of many Places upon the Road, which voluntarily surrender'd to him.

Charles's Coronation at Rheims.

THE Duke of Bedford being without an Army, stay'd at Paris expecting fresh Troops that were to come from England; during which Charles did not fail to improve his Advantage, and, without striking a Stroke, took possession of a great many Places which voluntarily fell off from the English. At last, Succours arriving from England, the Regent made considerable Draughts from his Garrisons; and having therewith form'd an Army, march'd directly against the Enemy: but no Battel ensued that bout, because each of them was willing to fight with advantage, and without running a Risque. Mean time, the Duke of Bedford had the mortification to see himself robb'd of his Towns without being in a Condition to hinder it, because having been compell'd to draw out some entire Garrisons, and to weaken others, they were only left to the Guard of the Inhabitants. Thus pass'd the Year 1429, which was so fatal to England.

IN 1431, this famous Maid being tried by an Eccleſiaſtical Court, was declar'd a Witch, a Heretic, and a Schiſmatic, and condemn'd to be burnt; which Execution was perform'd accordingly at Roan, upon the 30th of May.

Her Trial, Sentence, and Execution.

ABOUT the beginning of the Year 1432, King Henry return'd to England, while thro' the Weakneſs of both Parties the War in France was carry'd on but faintly.

Henry's Return to England.

THE Years 1433, 1434 and 1435, were almoſt entirely ſpent in a Negotiation, wherein the Engliſh were always bubbled. As this has a reference to one of the moſt curious Pieces in this Tenth Tome of the Fœdera, which contains ſuch Particulars as are not to be met with in Hiſtory, it will not be improper to give the Key of it in this place, for the better underſtanding of the Act it ſelf, the Subſtance of which ſhall be given hereafter.

UPON the Decline of the Engliſh Affairs, the Duke of Burgundy thought of making his ſeparate Peace with King Charles. 'Tis true, that in 1430, he ſent, or rather brought an Army himſelf into France to the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh. But this was becauſe he was not yet fully determin'd which way to ſteer. Beſides, his third Marriage with Iſabel of Portugal, Henry's near Relation, contributed not a little to continue him for a while in his Alliance with England. Be this as it will, in 1433 he reſum'd his firſt deſign. King Charles being inform'd how his Pulſe beat, caus'd this Affair to be negotiated with him ſo ſecretly, that the Engliſh had no knowledge of it. In fine, their Accommodation was concluded by the means of the Conſtable de Richemont, who took an opportunity to go and confer with the Duke about an Affair relating to the Count de Clermont. There only remain'd one difficulty to get over, and that was to furniſh the Duke of Burgundy with a fair Pretext for making his ſeparate Peace, that his Reputation might ſtand clear with the Publick. For this purpoſe it was agreed, that ſome third Perſon ſhould propoſe to the Engliſh Council a Congreſs of Ambaſſadors for treating of a Peace; and that Henry ſhould be put in hopes of ſuch conſiderable Advantages, that whether the Peace was concluded, or whether the Conference ſhould break up re infecta, he might be ſure of being a very great Gainer. The View of this Propoſal was to engage the Engliſh to enter into a Negotiation upon theſe Hopes, to the end that afterwards when they ſaw nothing came of it, they might be provok'd to break off the Conference abruptly. And from thence the Duke of Burgundy was to take an occaſion to ſay, that it was plain the Engliſh had no deſire for Peace, and that he was not oblig'd to carry on the War eternally for their ſakes. This is not the only time that this ſame trick has been play'd, as might be prov'd from Examples of a much later date.

Duke of Burgundy negotiates with King Charles.

THE Duke of Orleans, who had been a Priſoner in England ever ſince the Battle of Agincourt, was reckon'd the fitteſt Tool to decoy the Engliſh into the intended Snare. That Prince, notwithſtanding the Character of Probity, and even of Sanctity, for which the French Hiſtorians have ſo much celebrated him, proſtituted himſelf without ſcruple to act his Part in the Fraud. In 1433, he ſignify'd to the Council of England, that the Queen of Sicily Mother-in-law to K. Charles; Charles of Anjou, his Son, who was at that time the ſaid King's Favourite; and many other Grandees had acquainted him that all France was ſo weary of the War, that it was a proper time to think ſeriouſly of a Peace; and that for the obtaining ſo great a Bleſſing he had a Commiſſion to make the ſaid Propoſal to the King of England and his Council. Having thus broke the Ice, he offer'd to uſe all his Intereſt for promoting the Work, in hopes that if it had the good ſucceſs which he expected from it, he ſhould gain his Deliverance, which he could not poſſibly obtain without a Peace; for Henry V. had poſitively recommended it on his Death-bed, not to releaſe this Priſoner, unleſs his Liberty might be a means for procuring Peace. Mean time, as the Duke of Orleans was very ſenſible that ſo general a Propoſal would not come to much, he made other particular Overtures, by which he demonſtrated, that whether a Peace was concluded or not, great Advantages would nevertheleſs ſtill redound to the King of England from the Conference which the French deſired. Thoſe Advantages were of this nature.

IN the firſt place, he made believe that he did not queſtion but a Peace might be concluded, provided an honourable Appannage was granted to the Dauphin; and he inſinuated that the Queen of Sicily, Charles of Anjou, and the other Grandees were of the ſame Opinion: by which he left it to be inferr'd, that this was alſo the Sentiment of King Charles, becauſe the Perſons he named were ſuch as had the largeſt ſhare of his Confidence. In the ſecond place, in caſe that there ſhould not be a Peace, he offer'd to own Henry for King of France, to pay him Homage, to deliver him up Orleans, Blois, and in general all the Places in his Domain, with many others which did not belong to him, as Rochel and Mount St. Michael. To this he alſo added other Offers very advantageous to the King, as may be ſeen in the Piece it ſelf, which I juſt now mention'd. The Council of England being dazzled with theſe fair Offers, which they believ'd would really take place, whether there was a Peace, or whether the Negotiation miſcarry'd, conſented to enter into a Treaty. The City of Calais was immediately pitch'd on for the place of Congreſs, in order to ſhew the Engliſh that they were in earneſt: But afterwards, the Duke of Burgundy, who had his particular Views, manag'd ſo dexterouſly, that he obtain'd that the Conference ſhould be held at Arras.

Congreſs at Arras.

THIS Affair ſpun out a long time before it could be adjuſted; for the Congreſs was not open'd at Arras till the 6th of Auguſt 1435. At firſt, the Plenipotentiaries of Charles, as if they had ſtrain'd a great Point of Generoſity, offer'd to leave Guyenne and Normandy to Henry, on condition that he would do Homage for them to King Charles, and reſign the Title of King of France: which was the ſame thing as if they had ſaid that they were willing to let Henry have a couple of Provinces, of which he was actually in poſſeſſion, and where King Charles had not one Foot of Land, except Mount St. Michael in Normandy; and that the purchaſe of this mighty Favour muſt be the Reſignation of all his other Poſſeſſions in the Kingdom, and of the Title of King of France. The Engliſh being ſurpriz'd with a Propoſal ſo wide from the Hopes which the Duke Orleans had made them conceive, would hear no more, and retir'd very much diſguſted. Then it was that their ſudden Departure was loudly proclaim'd, as an evident Proof that they were not for Peace, ſince they refus'd ſuch reaſonable Offers. From thence alſo the Duke of Burgundy took occaſion to make his ſeparate Peace, or at leaſt toſign it in publick, for it was all concluded before. Never did any King of France make ſo ſcandalous a Peace; but Neceſſity, which has no Law, was his Excuſe. On the other hand, the Duke of Orleans did not perform a tittle of what he had promis'd.

Charles's Peace with the Duke of Burgundy.

WE obſerve in this Tenth Tome of the Fœdera, that the Council of England was ſo far from ſuſpecting the Duke of Burgundy of Treachery, that he was nominated by the King to be chief of the Embaſſy on the part of England, and that nothing ſhould be concluded without him [a].

Duke of Burgundy's Commiſſion from Henry as Chief of his Embaſſy. P. 611.

WE find likewiſe in the ſame Tome, that they had had ſecret Advice in England, that this Duke had deſir'd the Pope's Diſpenſation for the Oaths which he had taken to the late and preſent Kings of England. Upon this Intelligence, an Ambaſſador was ſent to the Pope, to know the Truth of it. Eugene IV. anſwer'd in ambiguous Terms, that no French Prince had deſir'd ſuch a Diſpenſation from him. And in his Letter to the King [b], he adds, In futurum autem, credere debes, nos, in ea parte & reliquis, honorem & deſiderium tuum concernentibus, ita diſpoſituros, ut de nobis merito contentus debebis remanere: i. e. And for the futere thou mayſt be aſſur'd, that in that or other things wherein thy Honour or Requeſt may be concern'd, we ſhall ſo order it that thou ſhalt have reaſon to reſt ſatisfy'd with us. Theſe laſt Words were ſo general, that they ſignify'd nothing, but left the Pope at his liberty to do what he pleas'd. And his Legates, who aſſiſted at the Congreſs of Arras, made no ſcruple to ſet the Duke of Burgundy looſe from his Oaths.

Pope's Letter about him to Henry. P. 620.

THE Offers which the French had made at Arras, and the Negotiation which the Duke of Burgundy continued with them, having convinc'd the Duke of Bedford that the King his Nephew, the Council, and himſelf had been impos'd on, he took pet and died at Roan, a few days before the Duke of Burgundy ſign'd his Peace.

Duke of Bedford's Death.

IN 1436 the Duke of Burgundy openly took part with King Charles againſt England, and ſent a Body of Troops to the Conſtable de Richemont, who with thoſe Succours made himſelf Maſter of Paris.

THE Duke of York went over to France ſoon after, with the Title of Regent. By his Valour and Conduct, and the Aſſiſtance of the brave Talbot, who had been exchang'd with Xaintrailles, this Prince ſettled the Engliſh Affairs upon a better Footing than they had been ever ſince the Duke of Bedford's Death.

Duke of York goes over to France as Regent.

THE Duke of Burgundy perceiving the Progreſs of the Duke of York, and that King Charles was too much addicted to his Pleaſures, and groſſly negligent of his Affairs, was apprehenſive of ſome fatal Revolution: And in order to prevent the worſt, he reſolv'd to make a conſiderable Effort againſt the Engliſh, by beſieging Calais with an Army of 40,000 Men. But the Duke of Gloceſter going over from England to France, with a Reinforcement of 15,000 Men, made him raiſe the Siege with diſgrace, and purſu'd him as far as the Netherlands, from whence he carry'd off a great Booty.

Calais beſieg'd.

IN 1437, the Pope having ſtrongly ſolicited the two Kings to a Peace, it was reſolv'd on both ſides to make a new Attempt for obtaining an End ſo neceſſary for both Kingdoms. The Council of England zealouſly wiſh'd it, contrary to the Opinion of the Duke of Gloceſter; but he had no longer any Credit at Court, his Uncle the Cardinal of Wincheſter having entirely ſupplanted him: So that notwithſtanding the Trick which the Duke of Orleans had play'd in the Affair of the Congreſs at Arras, that Prince was look'd upon as an impartial Mediator, and choſen to act in that Quality jointly with the Duke of Bretagne.

Duke of Orleans choſen Mediator of a Peace.

IN 1438, the Duke of Burgundy endeavour'd to ſurprize Calais. But miſſing his Aim, he ſat down before Guiſnes, from whence the Earl of Huntingdon oblig'd him to retire in Confuſion.

IN 1439, a Place was agreed on between Calais and Gravelin for holding a new Congreſs. We ſhall find in the Sequel, by the Inſtructions which were given to the Plenipotentiaries of England, how deſirous the Engliſh Council was of Peace. But the few Advances which the French made on their part, render'd this Conference of no effect.

A new Congreſs appointed.

IN 1440, the Duke of Orleans did at laſt obtain his liberty, after an Impriſonment of 25 Years. He had ſo firmly ſecur'd the Cardinal of Wincheſter, and the whole Council of England in his Intereſts, that he was releas'd without being requir'd to perform any one Offer he had made before the Congreſs at Arras. 'Tis true, he enter'd into new Engagements to pay 200,000 Crowns for his Ranſom; but 'tis highly probable, that the ſaid Sum, or at leaſt the beſt part of it, was never actually paid. The Duke of Gloceſter ſtrenuouſly oppos'd the Vote of the Council in favour of this Captive Prince, and actually enter'd his Proteſt in form againſt it; but no Regard was had to it.

Duke of Orleans ſet at liberty, after being 25 Years a Captive.

Duke of Gloceſter oppos'd it.

THAT ſame Year a new Congreſs for the Peace was agreed on to be held at St. Omer: But the Duke of Burgundy expecting no good from it, provided for his own Safety by a particular Truce which he made with the King of England.

A new Congreſs appointed.

Duke of Burgundy's Truce with Henry.

IN 1441 the Plenipotentiaries of the two Kings repair'd to St. Omer; but the Count de Vendome, Chief of the French Embaſſy, who 'tis probable had ſecret Inſtructions, refus'd to open the Conferences, on pretence that the Ambaſſadors of England were not Perſons of ſufficient Diſtinction.

AFTER having thus in general repreſented the Situation of Affairs in France during the 19 firſt Years of the Reign of Henry VI. 'tis neceſſary briefly to remark the then State of the Court of England; that being a thing altogether as neceſſary for underſtanding a great many Pieces in this Tome.

II. Domeſtick Affairs.

Regents of France and England.

HENRY V. had order'd on his Death-bed, that during the Minority of his Succeſſor, the Duke of Bedford ſhould be Regent of France, and the Duke of Gloceſter Regent or Protector of England: But the Parliament did not think fit to ratify this Order without ſome Reſtriction. The Duke of Bedford was the eldeſt of the two Brothers, and by conſequence had a Right to the Adminiſtration of the Affairs of England, preferably to his younger Brother. Therefore the Parliament made an Order, that the Duke of Bedford ſhould be Protector in England as long as he was actually reſiding in the Kingdom; and that in his Abſence the Duke of Gloceſter ſhould enjoy all the Prerogatives annex'd to that Dignity as his own Right, and not as Deputy or Lieutenant.

HENRY VI.

Thomas Beaufort Duke of Exeter, and Henry Beaufort his Brother, Biſhop of Wincheſter, who were the King's Great Uncles, were made his Governors. They were the Sons of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, by his third Wife Catherine Roet. But as they were born before their Father and Mother were married, the Parliament had legitimated them by the Name of Beaufort. John Duke of Somerſet their elder Brother was dead, having left four Sons, who were too young to have a Share in the Government of the Kingdom, or of the Perſon of the King.

The King's Governors.

BESIDES theſe Princes of the Houſe of Lancaſter, there were many others in England who were deſcended from Edward III. by other Branches. But here it ſhall ſuffice to ſpeak only of two: Edmund Mortimer Earl of March was the firſt, as being a Deſcendant of a Daughter of Lionel Duke of Clarence, ſecond Son to Edward III. He muſt have ſucceeded to the Crown after the Depoſition of Richard II. if the Parliament had not thought fit to tranſfer the Succeſſion to the Houſe of Lancaſter.

Pedigree of Edmund Mortimer Earl of March.

RICHARD Duke of York was the ſecond, whom I propoſe to treat of. He was Son to Richard Earl of Cambridge, who was executed at Southampton in 1415, for the Crime of High-Treaſon. This Prince, who came to ſo tragical an end, was the Son of Edmund de Langley Duke of York, and Brother to Edward Duke of that Name, who died not many Months after at the Battel of Agincourt without Iſſue. If his younger Brother had ſurviv'd him, he would have enjoy'd the Title of Duke of York. Upon his deceaſe Richard his Son had that Title, whether it devolv'd to him by Right, notwithſtanding the Attainder of the Earl his Father, or whether it came to him by Grant from Henry V. All Hiſtorians affirm nevertheleſs, that he did not receive this Title 'till the Parliament which was held at Leiceſter under Henry VI. in 1426; but by and by we ſhall find a Proof to the contrary.

Of the Duke of York.

HOWEVER that be, this Prince, who was as yet a Minor at the beginning of this Reign, was the more to be regarded, not ſo much becauſe he was the only Male of the York Family, but chiefly becauſe he was preſumptive Heir to the Earl of March his Uncle, as being the Son of Anne Mortimer that Earl's Siſter. By conſequence, after the Death of his Uncle by the Mother's ſide, he had a Right of admiſſion to all the Prerogatives of the Family of March; and we ſhall ſee hereafter how well he aſſerted it.

THE Parliament having conſtituted the Duke of Gloceſter Protector of the Kingdom in the abſence of the Duke of Bedford, and appointed the King's Governors, took care afterwards to form a Council of the wiſeſt and moſt able Perſons in the Kingdom; particularly

The young King's Council appointed by Parliament.

FOEDERA Tom. X.

ticularly the Princes of the Royal Family. Never was there a Council better compos'd; but it afterwards happen'd that an unhappy Misunderstanding between the Duke of Gloceſter and his Uncle the Biſhop of Wincheſter, caus'd a fatal Diviſion among the Members of this Council, which ruin'd the Affairs of the young King. This Miſunderſtanding broke out at laſt into an open Rupture; which oblig'd the Duke of Bedford to leave the Affairs of France in a very bad ſtate, in order to come over and try what he could do towards paciſying the Broils at Court, which were like to be attended with fatal Conſequences. He had no ſooner ſet his Foot on Engliſh Ground, than he was own'd as Protector, and perform'd all the Functions of that Dignity, purſuant to an Act of Parliament, An. 1422. He immediately ſet about the Accommodation of the Quarrel, which was the cauſe of his Voyage; but it was not poſſible for him to ſucceed. In fine, he was oblig'd to call a Parliament at Leiceſter, in order to put an end to the Diſpute by his Authority. The Duke of Gloceſter then and there exhibited ſeveral Articles of Impeachment againſt his Uncle; but not being able to make due proof of 'em, the Prelate was declar'd innocent. Mean time, the Duke of Bedford, to give ſome ſatisfaction to the Duke his Brother, took away the Great Seal from the Biſhop, and carry'd it with him to France; but on the other hand, to ſweeten that bitter Pill, he permitted him to accept of the Dignity of Cardinal, which the Pope had often offer'd him, but for which he had never been able to obtain the Conſent of the late King, who knew him to be of too intriguing a Diſpoſition. I ſhall hereafter call him the Cardinal of Wincheſter, in compliance with the Engliſh Hiſtorians, who give him no other Title; tho' in the Fœdera he is every where ſtiled Cardinal of England, without doubt becauſe he was of the Royal Family.

The Duke of Bedford comes over from France to reconcile the D. of Gloceſter, and the Bp of Wincheſter.

The Bp impeach'd by the Duke, but declar'd innocent.

He is forc'd to part with the Great Seal, but is made a Cardinal.

THIS freſh Dignity, which the Biſhop of Wincheſter had now obtain'd, furniſh'd his Enemy, the Duke of Gloceſter, with a Pretext to attack him. As he had not taken the Precaution to provide himſelf with an expreſs Licence from the King, by Letters Patent under the Great Seal, to qualify him for receiving the Cardinal's Hat, the Duke of Gloceſter pretended, that by the Statute of Ed. I. againſt Proviſors, he ought to be depriv'd of his Biſhoprick of Wincheſter. He attack'd him ſeveral times on this head, but the Prelate always got off; for being immenſely rich, he often lent Money to the King to ſupply the Exigences of the State: which was no inconſiderable Service at a time when the publick Treaſure was exhauſted by the War of France. And as a Reward of his Zeal, he obtain'd frequent Pardons, which broke all his Enemy's Meaſures.

Duke of Gloc. attacks him on that account.

IN 1429, the Cardinal receiv'd a Bull from the Pope, conſtituting him his Legate in Germany and Bohemia, and General of the Croiſade againſt the Huſſites. As ſoon as he had receiv'd this Bull, he petition'd the Council for leave to publiſh the Croiſade in England, and to raiſe in that Kingdom 500 Men at Arms, and 5000 Archers, beſides ſuch as would engage to ſerve without Pay. The Council granted him part of his Requeſt under certain Reſtrictions, which ſhall be mention'd hereafter. But News arriving in England, not many days after, of the Defeat of the Engliſh at Patay, the Council engag'd the Cardinal to go to France with his Croiſes, and ſerve there under the Duke of Bedford till the end of December.

HENRY VI.

He is made the Pope's Legate in Germany, and General of the Croiſade againſt the Huſſites.

THIS ſame Year, Henry being eight Years of Age, was crown'd in England: And in a few days after, the Parliament ſuppreſs'd the Office of Protector, as ſuppoſing it inconſiſtent with a Crown'd Head. In all appearance the Cardinal by his Intrigues contributed not a little to the mortifying of the Duke of Gloceſter in this Inſtance; for in the Sequel of this very Reign the Parliament did not always nicely follow the Maxim which they had now eſtabliſh'd, with reſpect to the Office of Protector.

Henry's Coronation in England.

Protector's Office ſuppreſs'd.

IN April 1430, Henry ſet out to be crown'd in France, leaving his Uncle the Duke of Gloceſter in England with the Title of Guardian. He was accompany'd by the Cardinal of Wincheſter, who had the Title of the King's Chief Counſellor, with a very great Salary. This was an Expedient made choice of to ſeparate the two Antagoniſts, for fear in the King's abſence their Diviſions might breed new Combuſtions.

The K. ſets out to be crown'd in France, accompanied by the Cardinal.

WHILE the Cardinal was in France, the Duke of Gloceſter had ſeveral flings at him, but could never trip up his heels.

D. of Gloc. attacks him in his Abſence.

IN 1431, he ſtirr'd up the King's Attorney General to demand of the Council that the Cardinal might be depriv'd of his Biſhoprick, purſuant to the Laws of the Realm. But the Council did not think fit to determine this Point during the Prelate's abſence.

'TIS natural to ſuppoſe that the Cardinal in the mean time watch'd all Opportunities to be reveng'd on his Enemy; but he went about it after a more cunning and ſure way, tho' not ſo open. As ſoon as the King was of Age to take ſome Cognizance of his own Affairs, the Prelate began by degrees to poſſeſs him with Suſpicions againſt that ſame Uncle, as if he had form'd a Deſign to keep his Majeſty in perpetual Bondage: And ſuch Hints as theſe, by being often repeated, did not fail in time of producing their Effects. Mean while, till the King was of Age to act for himſelf, the Cardinal by good Management effectually ſecur'd the Lower-Houſe of Parliament in his Intereſt, which gain'd him vaſt Credit: And afterwards by his Intrigues, he got ſeveral of the Duke of Gloceſter's Creatures to be remov'd from the Council, and his own Friends to be call'd into their Places.

The Cardinal requites him in his turn.

By

FOEDERA Tom. X.

By this means the Duke's Credit dwindled to nothing, while the Cardinal's grew every day more powerful.

THE Duke of Bedford's Death did in a great measure hasten the Downfal of the Duke his Brother. While the former was alive, no body durst attack the latter except indirectly. But as soon as the Duke of Gloceſter loſt his powerful Supporter, his Enemies gave him no quarter. Nevertheleſs, ſince by his elder Brother's Death he was become preſumptive Heir of the Crown, in caſe the King died without Iſſue, many of the great Men ſtill adhered to him, thinking that as the King was of a very tender Conſtitution, he might one day or other come to the Crown. For this cauſe his Enemies were not able to compleat his Ruin all at once, but by ſlow degrees. Now though this was reaſon ſufficient for the Council to have carried it exceeding fair to him, yet they teaz'd him every day, in order to provoke him to take ſome falſe Step which might embroil him. But this was no longer that Council which the Parliament had eſtabliſhed at the beginning of this Reign: For in the Year 1437, it was already full of the Cardinal's Creatures.

Henry's Council againſt purſuing the War in Fr.

AFTER the Duke of Burgundy had deſerted the Engliſh Intereſt, the Duke of Gloceſter was for making the greater Efforts, in order to carry on the War with Vigour. The Council, on the other hand, pleaded that his Deſertion was a ſtrong Argument for the Neceſſity of a Peace. But this, properly ſpeaking, was no more than a Pretext; for the true reaſon was, that the Council being full of Clergymen, War was a thing quite out of their way.

BESIDES, as the Engliſh Affairs in France were already on a very bad footing, they ſuppoſed it would be very difficult to prevent greater Loſſes; and that ſuch Loſſes would be charg'd all at their door, becauſe they had the Direction of all Affairs. This was the Maxim by which they regulated all their Steps. And we ſhall find by the Inſtructions which were given to the Engliſh Plenipotentiaries in 1439, that for the ſake of Peace, the Council went ſo far as to perſuade the King to offer to drop his Title of King of France, the only thing for which the War had been carry'd on. Henry was already 18 Years of Age; but to ſay no worſe of him, he had not Penetration enough to diſcern good Advice from bad. Conſequently, being negligent of his own Affairs, he ſuffer'd his Council, and thoſe that were about him to lead him blindfold.

P. 732.

He is led Captive by his Council, &c.

The Cardinal procures the Liberty of the Duke of Orleans.

THE Conference for Peace having been held to no purpoſe, the Cardinal did not fail to cry up the Zeal and Services of the Duke of Orleans, and to procure a Reſolution for his being ſet at liberty, notwithſtanding the Proteſt of the Duke of Gloceſter. And perhaps too his Deliverance was principally owing to the Duke of Gloceſter's obſtinately inſiſting that he ſhould remain a Priſoner.

AT length the King being arriv'd at twenty Years of Age, and having a very mean Genius for Buſineſs, the Cardinal ſo effectually prejudic'd him againſt the Duke his Uncle, that he imagin'd that all his Counſels, and every Step he took, tended to keep him in Slavery, and perhaps to rob him of the Crown. Conſequently, if the Duke did but propoſe any good thing in Council, it was ſure to be interpreted in a bad Senſe. When we come to the next Tome of the Fœdera, we ſhall ſee to what an Extremity this Prince was perſecuted; but we ſtop here becauſe this tenth Volume goes no farther.

He prejudices the K. againſt the Duke of Gloceſter.

WHAT has now been ſaid relating to the Affairs of France and England, is the main Subject of the Acts of that Tome, tho' there are Acts too upon various other matters, which may be of ſome ſervice; but theſe I leave behind, that I may have the more room to give the Subſtance of ſuch as ſeem to be the moſt remarkable, and the moſt proper for clearing up the Hiſtory of that Reign. In doing this I ſhall obſerve the Order of Time.

'Tis very likely that theſe two Circumſtances, viz. the Death of Henry V. and the Infancy of Henry VI. encourag'd the Adherents of the March or Mortimer Family, to take that opportunity to raiſe thoſe Tumults. This ſeems the more probable, becauſe, tho' the Order was directed to the Sheriffs, yet the Council appointed Commiſſioners to ſee it put in execution. This ſhews it was a thing of Conſequence: Moreover it was but too evident at the Cloſe of this Reign, that the People had not forgot the Right of the Houſe of March to the Crown.

5. INTSRUCTIONS given to Garter King at Arms, who was sent from Paris to England by the Duke of Bedford, dated July the 16th[b].

They were in Substance as follows.

HE shall desire the Council to hasten the Departure of the Troops that are to go to France under the Command of the Cardinal, as well as those which are to come with Sir——Radcliff, and to let the Regent know the exact time of their setting out.

HE shall represent that the Dauphin has put himself at the head of a Powerful Army, and that several good Towns, as Troyes and Chalons, have already declar'd their Submission to him. That on that same Day, viz. July the 16th, he is to enter Rheims, there to be crown'd; and that afterwards he designs to march to Paris, where he hopes to be receiv'd; but that he will find more Difficulty there than he is aware of.

THAT all this Week the Regent and the Duke of Burgundy have been employ'd in giving the necessary Orders for the Preservation of Places, and particularly of Paris.

THAT the Duke of Burgundy has honourably discharg'd his Duty, and shewn himself upon all Occasions a true Kinsman, Friend and Vassal of the King; that were it not for him, the City of Paris would be lost, and that he set out that Day for Artois to bring up the Troops.

THAT in two Days the Regent will set forward to draw out the Garisons of Normandy and Picardy, in order to join the Troops which he expects from England.

THAT the Council of France earnestly intreat the King to come and be crown'd at Paris; for if it had pleas'd God to have put it into the King's Heart to comply with the Intreaty twice made to him for that purpose, it would in all appearance have prevented the Inconveniences which have happen'd.

Petition against the Cardinal of Winchester P. 497.

THE Petition of the King's Attorney General, praying that the Cardinal of Winchester may be depriv'd of his Bishoprick, dated November the 6th.

We find in this Petition that the Cardinal had obtain'd of the Court of Rome an Exemption from the Archbishop of Canterbury's Jurisdiction, for himself, for the City, and for the whole Diocese of Winchester. This was what the Duke made a Handle of against him, in order to convince the Council of the Inconveniency there was in permitting Cardinals to enjoy Bishopricks in England.

Offer made by the Duke of Orleans for his Liberty. P. 556.

CONDITIONS offer'd by the Duke of Orleans for his Liberty, which were accepted by the King and his Council[f].

Those Offers, which plainly shew that the Duke of Orleans had no other Aim but to deceive the English, were in Substance as follows:

"IF the King is dispos'd to have a Peace "effectually negotiated betwixt him and "the Dauphin, we engage that the Queen "of Sicily, Charles of Anjou her Son, "the Duke of Bretagne, with Arthur and "Richard his Brothers, the Counts d'Armagnac, Foix and Perdriac the Duke of "Alençon, the Archbishop of Rheims, or "the Archbishop of Ambrun, and the "Count de Clermont, shall repair to Calais, "or some other Place which seemeth best to "the King, there to hold a Congress with "the

" the King's Plenipotentiaries. In which " Congreſs we hope that by God's Aſſiſtance " and our Diligence, a Peace will infallibly " be concluded, conſidering the earneſt " deſire which the ſaid Queen, and the " great Men abovemention'd, have mani- " feſted for the Succeſs thereof, as they " have caus'd it to be ſignify'd to us: Pro- " vided that the Dauphin may have a no- " table and honourable Portion of Lands in " the Kingdom of France."

There are ſeveral things worthy of Remark in this firſt Article, 1. That the Perſons therein mention'd were the moſt entire Confidents of King Charles, by which the Duke of Orleans would have it believ'd that the Propoſal came from Charles himſelf. 2. He gave King Charles only the Title of Dauphin, which was what he never did before nor after. 3. He made as if Charles would be content with a ſmall part of the Kingdom of France, tho' it plainly appear'd at the Congreſs of Arras, that ſuch a Modicum was very far from his Thoughts at that time. 4. The Terms of notable and honourable Portion, left him a Back-door for his Retreat under favour of that ambiguous Expreſſion.

" THO' a Peace ſhould be concluded by " our means, yet we offer to ſtay in England " a Twelvemonth after its execution; upon " the Expiration of which the King ſhall " be oblig'd to ſet us at liberty after we " have perform'd Homage, and taken the " Oath to him."

By this he would have it underſtood, that when the Peace was concluded, King Henry would, without all manner of queſtion, remain ſole King of France.

" IN caſe that a Peace be made, we promiſe " never to own any other King of France " than King Henry, and his Heirs, and their " Succeſſors.

" AND if a Peace be not made, we offer " and promiſe punctually to execute the " Conditions following:"

1. WE will perform Homage to King Henry, our Sovereign Lord, by the Title of King of France, and we will take the Oath of Fidelity to him.

2. WE will cauſe all our Subjects and Vaſſals to own him in the ſame Quality, and to ſubmit to his Authority; which if any one refuſe, they ſhall be puniſh'd as Rebels.

3. WE will cauſe the Duke of Anjou, the Count d'Armagnac, the Count de Perdriac his Brother, the Count d'Angouleme our Brother, and all our Friends in general, to own him as King of France.

4. IF the King thinks fit, we engage the ſame thing for the Dukes of Savoy and Milan.

5. WE will put Orleans, Blois, Chateaudun, La Ferté, Melun, and all the Towns and Caſtles of our Dominion in general, into the hands of King Henry.

6. ALSO as to thoſe Places which do not belong to us, we will cauſe to be deliver'd up to him Rochel, Mont St. Michael, Limoges, Bourges, Xaintes, Chinon, Poictiers, Tournay, Tonneins, Beziers and Loches. And if any thing hinders our giving up ſome of thoſe Towns to him, we will give him others in their room to his ſatisfaction, except Rochel and Mont St. Michael, which may not be chang'd for others.

HENRY VI.

'Tis evident, that it was not in the power of the Duke of Orleans to perform thoſe Conditions, eſpecially if the War continued, becauſe Charles had Garriſons in all thoſe places.

7. IF the King our Sovereign Lord is pleas'd of his Royal Bounty and Munificence to give us any Lands in England, we will perform Homage to him as a Subject of the Crown of England.

8. WE will endeavour with all our power to put him in poſſeſſion of the whole Monarchy of France, and its Dependencies; and will ſerve him at our own Expence, and at the Expence alſo of our Vaſſals.

9. WE will remain Priſoner in England till all theſe Conditions are fully perform'd, and will not depart from thence without the King's expreſs Licence under the Great Seal.

'Tis not eaſy to imagine how the Duke of Orleans could remain a Priſoner in England, and at the ſame time perform all the Conditions he offer'd.

IN conſideration of the Conditions abovemention'd, the King promiſes to receive us, both us and our Vaſſals, into his Obedience, and to take us under his Protection; thoſe only excepted who are guilty of the Murder of the Duke of Burgundy. Moreover, he promiſes to reſtore to our Vaſſals and Subjects their Lands and Poſſeſſions, or at leaſt an Equivalent, after having taken the Oath of Fidelity from them. But he ſhall not be oblig'd to reſtore either in kind, or in equivalent, thoſe that the King his Father or he himſelf have already diſpos'd of, which are expreſſly excepted.

'Tis to be obſerv'd upon this Article, that as to all the foregoing Conditions, which are very advantageous to the King of England, the Duke of Orleans demands nothing but that the King ſhould receive him with his Vaſſals under his Obedience. As to the Reſtitution mention'd in the ſaid Article, 'tis a mere Chimæra, becauſe Henry had nothing left in thoſe Provinces where the Domains of the Duke of Orleans were ſituated. Nothing is a ſtronger Proof of a form'd Deſign to deceive the King.

ON the performance of the Conditions above-ſaid, the King ſhall cauſe us to be ſet at liberty without any Ranſom, and ſhall admit us to Allegiance and Homage.

This, properly ſpeaking, is the only Condition which the Duke of Orleans demands for himſelf, a Condition which is abundantly counterballanc'd by all thoſe which he offers to the King. If we compare the value of all the Places which he promiſes to deliver up to the King, with the

FOEDERA Tom. X.

the Ranſom of three Millions of Crowns which King John oblig'd himſelf to pay to Edward III. we ſhall find that this of the Duke of Orleans is not leſs. This is a clear Proof that there was a ſiniſter Deſign in his Promiſes.

All theſe Articles, which I have very much contracted, are ſet down at length in the Paper of the Duke of Orleans, which is in Latin in form of Letters Patent; the Language of which from the beginning to the end is expreſs'd in the moſt ſubmiſſive, or rather creeping Terms. He never names Henry, but he adds to it King of France, my Lord, my King, or my Sovereign: and when he ſpeaks of King Charles, he calls him the Dauphin, who ſtiles himſelf King of France. All this was to carry on his own Ends.

Inſtructions to the Engl. Ambaſſadors. 724.

1. INSTRUCTIONS for the Engliſh Ambaſſadors who were to meet thoſe of France between Calais and Gravelin, there to treat of Peace; dated May the 21ſt [e].

THESE Inſtructions, which are very long, and circumſtantially ſet down in the Original, were in Subſtance as follows:

"THE Ambaſſadors ſhall demand the whole Kingdom of France, and ſhall ſupport the ſaid Demand with all the proper Arguments; but without ſo much as making a queſtion of the King's original Title.

"IF the French are diſturb'd at this Demand, our Ambaſſadors, after a previous Proteſtation, ſhall offer the Dauphin Lands on the other ſide of the Loire, particularly Languedoc, to the value of 20,000 l. a Year.

"IF the Adverſaries are not therewith content, the Cardinal of Wincheſter, as a Clergyman, ſhall ſet forth to them the Horrors of ſo tedious a War, which has conſum'd more Men than there are to be found at this Day in the two Kingdoms. He ſhall add, amongſt other Conſiderations, that God did not make the People for Kings, but Kings for the People, &c. That before and after Charlemain, there were in France two, three, and ſometimes four Kings together: and from thence he ſhall take occaſion to make the following Offer, That the King will yield to the Dauphin all the Country beyond the Loire, except Guyenne and Poictou, and every thing that the Kings of England were in poſſeſſion of on the other ſide of that River, before the Crown of France devolv'd to them.

"THE Ambaſſadors may extend this Offer to ſuch a degree, that the King will reſerve nothing to himſelf on the other ſide of the Loire, but what he is actually in poſſeſſion of, or what he ſhall be poſſeſs'd of on the Day that the Treaty is ſign'd.

"IF this Offer does not ſatisfy, they may go farther, and even declare that the King will be content with what his Anceſtors enjoy'd in France by Hereditary Right, not as Kings of France, but under the ſame Title as their Predeceſſors, before any of them came to the Crown of France, on condition that Calais, Guiſnes, and the adjacent Marches be thereunto added; the whole according to the Treaty of Bretigny, and without Dependance upon any but God alone.

"AND if it pleaſe God that the Treaty ſhould proceed ſo far that no manner of Objection ſhould remain, but as to the Title of King of France; in that caſe the Ambaſſadors ſhall refer themſelves to the Cardinal of Wincheſter, to whom the King has made known his Intentions."

HENRY VI.

THE reſt of theſe Inſtructions, which I paſs over for brevity ſake, relate to the Overture of a Marriage between King Henry and a Daughter of King Charles; and to a Truce for concluding, on failure of a Peace, the Exchange of ſome Places, and for negotiating the Deliverance of the Duke of Orleans.

Duke of Gloceſter's Proteſt againſt the Liberty of the Duke of Orleans. P. 764.

1. THE Duke of Gloceſter's Proteſt againſt the Vote of the Council for releaſing the Duke of Orleans.

This Proteſt contains ſeveral Arguments, of which I will juſt mention a few.

THE firſt is deduc'd from the Incapacity both of King Charles, and the Dauphin his Son, known to the whole World. Upon this Suppoſition the Duke of Gloceſter ſaid, that it was to be fear'd the States of France, in their general Aſſembly, would give the Adminiſtration to the Duke of Orleans; than which he ſhew'd, that, conſidering this Prince's vaſt Learning and Parts, nothing could be more diſadvantageous to England, the rather becauſe by his having ſtaid here 25 Years, he was thoroughly acquainted with the State of the Kingdom.

The Duke of Gloceſter might with reaſon enough ſet forth the Incapacity of King Charles, who certainly was a Prince of a very mean Genius. But he was undoubtedly miſtaken with reſpect to the Dauphin, who plainly ſhew'd that he had ſufficient Qualities to govern the State, when he reign'd with the Title of Lewis XI.

HE deduced another Argument from the Diſagreement there had been betwixt King Charles and the Dauphin his Son, and the reaſon there was to fear the Duke of Orleans would be a proper Inſtrument to reconcile them.

IN another place he ſhew'd how little it ſignify'd to take an Oath from the Duke of Orleans, becauſe it being notorious to all the World that he own'd King Charles for his Sovereign, the Oath which he took againſt him while he was actually a Priſoner would always be look'd upon as invalid.

HE alſo alledg'd the Reconciliation which the Ducheſs of Burgundy had brought about in the laſt Conference between the Duke her Husband and the Duke of Orleans, as a juſt reaſon to fear that thoſe two Princes would unite together againſt England, inſtead of renewing the old Quarrels in France, as the Council ſeem'd to hope.

IN fine, he inſiſted ſtrenuouſly upon the laſt Orders which the King his Brother had given about the Duke of Orleans on his Death-Bed.

Articles for the Duke of Orleans's Liberty. P. 776.

2. THE Conventions for ſetting the Duke of Orleans at liberty, dated July the 2d[b].

IN theſe Conventions the Duke of Orleans was not requir'd to recognize Henry for King of France, nor any thing like it. In this Paper he does not call him, as he did in the former, King of France, his Lord, or his Sovereign, but only plain King of England. No Places nor Hoſtages were demanded of him, nor was he oblig'd to take an Oath that he would never ſerve againſt the King. He only engag'd to pay 80,000 Crowns for his Ranſom before he left England, and 120,000 in ſix Months after; the whole amounting to 200,000 Crowns. But as to the ſecond Payment, they were content to take ſuch Securities for it as they could not come upon for the Money. Theſe were the Princes and Great Men of France under the Obedience of King Charles, among whom the Dauphin was his Bail for 30,000 Crowns. On the other hand they were content with King Charles's Letters Patent approving thoſe Conventions. All this gives cauſe to ſuſpect that the Duke of Orleans did not pay his whole Ranſom, and that the Price was rais'd up to 200,000 Crowns only to caſt a Miſt before he Eyes of the Publick, and to confute the Reaſons brought by the Duke of Gloceſter in his Proteſt. For we find in the Fœdera the King's Acquittance[c] for 80,000 Crowns, the firſt Payment; but there's nothing in the whole Collection which ſhews that the Duke or his Bail paid any part of the Sum of 120,000 Crowns, which ought to have been depoſited ſix Months after his Releaſe. If this Sum had really been paid, 'tis very probable we ſhould have found ſome Acquittance for that, as well as for the former Sum, in the Fœdera, where there are Receipts for much ſmaller Sums. I own, however, that this is only a Conjecture founded on negative Proof, and on the Diſpoſition of the Council to do a Service to the Duke of Orleans, tho' it was to the prejudice of the King and Kingdom. The Cardinal of Wincheſter acted with a world of Zeal upon this Occaſion to ſerve the Duke of Orleans, who was at length ſet at liberty the beginning of November 1440, after having been 25 Years a Priſoner.

THE French Hiſtorians have done the Duke of Burgundy the Honour to ſay, that he lent his Enemy, to whom he was ſo lately reconcil'd, Money to help pay his Ranſom; but I know not what Ground there is for it. In the firſt place, 'tis certain that the Duke of Burgundy was not one of the Duke of Orleans's Bail for the Sum of 120,000 Crowns. Secondly, we find in this Tome a Piece which might perhaps have given occaſion for what the Hiſtorians have advanc'd, but yet is far from proving any ſuch thing, viz. That the Dauphin having engag'd to give his Bond for 30,000 Crowns, the Duke of Burgundy conſented that his Ducheſs ſhould engage by an expreſs Act to deliver up the ſaid Dauphin's Bond to the King of England, or to make her ſelf liable to pay the whole Sum[d]. But as the Dauphin made no difficulty to ſend his Bond, neither the Duke nor Ducheſs of Burgundy ſtood engag'd for the Money.

4. A TRUCE betwixt the King of England and the Duke of Burgundy, for all their Countries reſpectively [a].

I SHALL conclude my Account of the tenth Tome of this Collection with a word or two concerning thoſe Affairs of Scotland, which are the Subject of ſeveral Articles in that Tome.

JAMES I. King of Scotland, had been a Priſoner in England ever ſince the Reign of Henry IV. His Uncle, the Duke of Albany, to ſecure the Regency of the Kingdom to himſelf, had made a ſecret Treaty with Henry V. whereby the King engag'd on the one hand to keep his Priſoner, and the Duke on the other to give no manner of Aſſiſtance to France. Henry V. and the Duke of Albany being both dead, the Scots began to take vigorous Reſolutions for the Support of King Charles VII. which was the Cauſe that the Council of England was determin'd at laſt to ſet the captive King at liberty, upon certain Conditions. This Negotiation was begun and ended in the three or four laſt Months of the Year 1423, when it was agreed that King James ſhould be releas'd on paying 40,000 Marks Sterling towards his Maintenance in England during his Impriſonment [b]. Moreover, a Truce was concluded betwixt England and Scotland at Durham, March the 28th, 1424, by which each of the two Kings engag'd to give no Aſſiſtance to the Enemies of the other; which was the grand View of the Engliſh Council in the whole Negotiation. The better to attach the King of Scotland to the Intereſts of England, it was contriv'd to marry him to Jane Beaufort, Siſter to the Duke of Somerſet, and Niece to the Duke of Exeter, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter.

A Miſtake of the Engliſh Hiſtorians about the Homage of the Kings of Scotland to England.

ALL the Engliſh Hiſtorians are unanimous that James, before he left England, did Homage to young Henry at Windſor for the whole Kingdom of Scotland, and that he took an Oath of Fidelity to him; nay, they go ſo far as to report the very Expreſſions both of the Homage and the Oath: But 'tis proper to obſerve upon this Head, that in the Light which the Affair of the Homage betwixt England and Scotland then ſtood, James could not perform ſuch Homage, but in conſequence of ſome new Treaty. From the time that Robert Bruce aſcended the Throne of Scotland, all his Succeſſors had refus'd this Homage to the Kings of England, excepting only Edward Baliol, whom Edward III. plac'd upon the Throne by force, and who did not ſit there long. And it was but lately that Robert III. Father of James I. peremptorily refus'd ſuch Homage to Henry IV. and ſince that time no Regulation had been made about it. Conſequently James had not a power to perform this Homage, but by virtue of ſome new Agreement; yet we find no Treaty or Convention to this purpoſe in Mr. Rymer's Fœdera. There's not the leaſt Hint of it, either in the Conventions for the liberty of James I. nor in the Treaty of Truce, nor in above 30 Acts of this Tome relating to the Affairs of Scotland; nor is there ſo much as one ſingle Word that can allude to it. And if there had been a Treaty of ſuch conſequence, would it not be very aſtoniſhing if it ſhould not be found in this Tome, where there's ſuch a Multitude of Acts of much leſs Importance? But this gives cauſe to ſuſpect, that what the Engliſh Hiſtorians have advanc'd relating to the pretended Homage perform'd at Windſor by James I. might perhaps be owing to the Prejudice of Hollingſhed the Hiſtorian, who was the firſt that mentioned it, and has been follow'd by all the other Writers.

* THE Eleventh Tome of the Fœdera contains the Acts of the reſt of Henry VI's Reign, from Nov. 1441, to the end of that Reign, and the 14 firſt Years of Edward the Fourth. But I ſhall firſt give an account of what relates to Henry VI. by purſuing the two principal Subjects of this Reign, viz. the Affairs of France, and Affairs Domeſtick.

I. The Affairs of France.

The ill Effects of the Quarrel betwixt the Duke of Gloceſter and the Cardinal.

THE Quarrel betwixt the Duke of Gloceſter and the Cardinal of Wincheſter was the principal Cauſe of the ill Succeſs of the Engliſh Affairs in France, to the very end of the War. The Cardinal, who thought of nothing

* Having done with the Tenth Tome of the Fœdera, we proceed to the next, which Mr. Rymer thus dedicates to the Queen, in the Year 1710.

" May it pleaſe your moſt Excellent Majeſty,

" In this Eleventh Tome you give the Tranſactions from 1440 to 1474.

" Beſides what in common you give to other Nations, your Allies in the North receive a great Light; and, in " a more ſpecial manner, your antient Kingdom, by this your Royal Bounty, is pull'd out of the dark, and brought " to a new Life and Luſtre: you give them their Share in the publick Treaties, even their Language you authen- " ticate, and give it a Currency.

" Whether Peace, War, Marriages, or Commerce is to be negotiated, who make a more goodly Appearance, " who ſhew a more numerous Train and Equipage than the Ambaſſadors of Scotland?

" Within this Compaſs of Time, Negotiations were always upon the Carpet: England and France were much- " what about the ſame diſtance as they are at this Day; no Wind could blow, no Ship paſs without ſome Pleni- " potentiary.

" The Burden of the Song was PEACE, a FINAL PEACE, a PERPETUAL PEACE.

" In thoſe Days alſo roſe up great plenty of Philoſophers; no Lord Chancellor, or Keeper of the Great Seal, " but did paſs ſome Patent out of the King's ſpecial Grace, granting a Licence to exerciſe their Skill, to make " Elixir of Life, or to tranſubſtantiate Metals, to turn Copper and Iron into Gold and Silver, any Act, Law or " Statute to the contrary notwithſtanding.

" But there were ſhewn no Miracles in thoſe Days; ſplendid Embaſſies, Negotiations, Communications and " Appunctuations without end, but no ſolid Peace, nor yet any memorable Atchievement of War.

" No Blenheim, no Ramillies, no Audenard, no Blaregnies Battles and Victories, by the Divine Providence ap- " propriated to crown with Glory the Beginning of your ſo happy and auſpicious Reign. " This, thing but how to ruin his Enemy, found means to fill the King's Council with his Creatures, who were for moſt part Clergymen, and Perſons of no Experience in the Affairs of War. From thence proceeded that mighty Fondneſs which the Council ſhew'd for Peace, and that Indifferency of theirs when the Point under conſideration was to endeavour the retrieving of former Loſſes. Beſides, many other Motives induc'd the Cardinal and the Majority of the Council to wiſh for a ſpeedy end of the War. In the firſt place, they were afraid leſt that while the War continued, ſome things would fall out which might render the Duke of Gloceſter neceſſary. Secondly, they could not endure to hear themſelves perpetually reproach'd for the Errors which were committed every day, with reſpect to the Affairs of France, either by neglecting to ſend timely Succours to the Regent, or by giving him ſuch confus'd or ambiguous Orders as diſcover'd their Ignorance in the Affairs of War. And laſtly, as all things grew worſe and worſe every day, they were very ſenſible that a Day of Reckoning would come, when they muſt be anſwerable for all Events, eſpecially when they had ſo watchful an Eye over them as the Duke of Gloceſter. All theſe Reaſons made them heartily wiſh for a Peace. And it was with this View that the Duke of Orleans was careſs'd, and even ſet at liberty, as a proper Tool to bring the Project to bear. The Council being thus diſpos'd, 'tis eaſy to judge that the War was but faintly carried on in France; ſince whatſoever Progreſs the Engliſh Arms might have made there, would only have put the Peace farther back inſtead of procuring it.

HENRY VI.

Reaſons of the Engliſh Council's being for a Peace with France.

THO' Henry VI. was now about 20 Years of Age, yet ſo unfit was he to take the Reins of the Government into his own hands, that he only lent his Name to what his Council thought fit to order. As he had a Genius even far below the middling Claſs, he blindly receiv'd all Impreſſions which thoſe who had acceſs to him were pleas'd to give him; and the Cardinal of Wincheſter was cunning enough to make his Advantage of ſuch a Poverty of Spirit, for he had no ſooner began to diſcard the Duke of Gloceſter, than he made the King believe that this Uncle of his had form'd a Deſign to keep him in perpetual Bondage, if not to deprive him of the Crown. And by degrees the Duke loſt all his Credit with the King, who valued his Counſels no longer.

Henry's Unfitneſs for Government.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Impatience which the Court of England diſcover'd for Peace, the War was carried on during the Years 1442 and 1443, under the Conduct of the Duke of York, who was Regent in France for Henry VI. The Duke was a Man of Wiſdom and Valour, and ſo thoroughly underſtood the nature of the War, that if he had been but duly ſupported, he would have given K. Charles a world of Trouble: But for the Reaſons already mention'd he receiv'd very ſmall Aſſiſtance from England.

Duke of York's Character.

IN 1442, King Charles VII. having a Deſign to relieve Tartas (a Place in Guyenne which had capitulated to ſurrender on certain Conditions, in June 1443, if not reliev'd by that time) ſpent the Winter at Tholouſe, where he diſpoſſeſs'd the Count d'Armagnac of a part of the County of Cominges which he had uſurp'd. The Count d'Armagnac, who had always been attach'd to the ſervice of France, was ſo exaſperated by the King's ſevere Treatment of him, that he made an Offer to King Henry of one of his Daughters in Marriage, together with the beſt part of his Dominions, which included Gaſcoigne, properly ſo call'd, Auvergne, Rouergne, and ſeveral other Domains. Henry accepting the Propoſal, ſent Ambaſſadors to him with full Power to betroth one of his Daughters in his Name, which was done accordingly. But the Count being not long after entirely ſtript of his Dominions, Henry thought no more of the Match.

AT laſt, in 1444, Charles VII. and Henry VI. concluded a Truce of two Years at Tours, that they might be at leiſure to negotiate a Peace. This Truce was often prolong'd and renew'd, 'till 1448, that it was broke by the ſeizing of Fougeres, a Town belonging to the Duke of Bretagne, which the then Governor of the lower Normandy for the Engliſh * ſurpriz'd, and took in the midſt of the Truce, with a very great Booty. Charles VII. who had caus'd the Duke of Bretagne to be included in the Truce, took this Affair very much to heart. He demanded 1,600,000 Crowns Damages for the Duke of Bretagne, even before it was poſſible to compute what the Damage was; and in ſhort, becauſe his Demand was not complied with ſo ſoon as he deſir'd, he caus'd ſeveral Places belonging to the Engliſh to be ſurpriz'd, and enter'd Normandy with four Armies. The War being now renew'd, the Affairs of the Engliſh ſucceeded ſo ill in France, that in the very firſt Campaign they loſt half of Normandy, together with Roan the Capital of that Province. And in the ſecond Year, which was 1450, Charles took the reſt of that Province, together with all the Conqueſts of the Engliſh in France; after which he carried his Army into Guyenne, where he made ſome

"And as for his Hereditary Right to the Crown of France, King Lewis offers an EQUIVALENT in Gold, and "gives Security to pay the Sum agreed upon in London, yearly, during the Lives of the two Kings, and the long"eſt Liver of them, and to his Succeſſors, Kings of England, for an hundred Years after."

some Progress; and in 1451, he finish'd the Conquest of that Province. In 1452, the Gascons revolted from their Obedience to him, and brought the English into Bourdeaux. But next Year they were again drove out of every Corner of the Province. And thus ended this long War, when of all the Conquests which the English had made in France, they had nothing left but Calais, Guisnes, and some little Places in the Neighbourhood. Above all they lost Guyenne, the ancient Inheritance of their Kings.

It happens that this Tome is very barren of Acts relating to these Events: At least I don't find any material Piece in it, which can be of any great service to the clearing up of the History, excepting only in the Dates, which may really prove of some advantage.

The most important Pieces here, are, 1. The full Power from Henry VI. to his Ambassadors, to conclude his Marriage with one of the Daughters of the Count d'Armagnac, dated the 28th of May, 1442 [a].

2. Treaties of Truce between Henry and Isabel of Portugal, Dutchess of Burgundy, acting for the Duke her Husband [b].

II. Domestic Affairs.

The Cardinal's Enmity against the Duke of Gloucester.

The Cardinal of Winchester's only View being to ruin the Duke of Gloucester, he had for this end brought to Court the Earl of Suffolk, who became the King's Favourite, and John Kemp Archbishop of York, for whom he procur'd a Cardinal's Cap. These three Ministers, who directed all Affairs, were the Duke of Gloucester's mortal Enemies. As this Duke made a great Clamour against the Ministry for releasing the Duke of Orleans, contrary to the late King's express Orders, they contriv'd a way to stop his Mouth, by one of the most cruel Mortifications that Flesh and Blood could suffer. In 1442, the Dutchess his Wife was accus'd of a design to take away the King's Life by Witchcraft; and she was condemn'd to Imprisonment all the rest of her days, after having publickly done Penance in St. Paul's Church. Some time after, the Duke impeach'd the Cardinal of High-Treason; but he got off by a fresh Pardon, which he obtain'd from the King.

His Dutchess accus'd of Witchcraft.

The Cardinal impeach'd of High-Treason, and pardon'd.

Marriage propos'd betwixt the King and the Daughter of Anjou.

I have already observ'd, that the Ministry wish'd to make a Peace with France upon any Terms, and I gave their Reasons for it. To carry their Point with the more ease, they contriv'd to marry the King to Margaret of Anjou, Daughter to Rene of Anjou, and Niece to the Queen of France and the Count du Maine, who was a Favourite of Charles VII. But the bare desire of Peace was not the only Motive that put them upon this Marriage, for they had another which was equally pressing: The King might die, and in that case the Crown would devolve indisputably to the Duke of Gloucester their Enemy. Besides, as Henry was but an infirm Prince, they thought it would be better for them to have a Queen to undertake the Government of the Realm, for fear the Parliament should commit the Regency to the Duke of Gloucester. Margaret of Anjou was a Princess perfectly qualified for this purpose; for she was witty, bold and enterprising, and at the same time had so poor an Estate, that she could not but be highly oblig'd to them for the change of her Fortune. They propos'd therefore to place her at the Head of Affairs, and to support her with their joint Credit, that they might be protected by her in their turn; by which means they hoped to keep their Posts, and effectually ruin the Duke of Gloucester, not in the least doubting that the new Queen would unite with them for the same purpose.

HENRY VI.

Ambassadors sent to treat about it.

This Affair was secretly negotiated during the whole Year of 1443; and at last in 1444 it was agreed, that the King should send Ambassadors to Tours, where King Charles then resided, there to conclude a Truce, and at the same time to settle the Articles of his Marriage. The Earl of Suffolk was appointed Chief of the Embassy, and he receiv'd his Instructions in Writing. Tho' 'tis probable he was the very Man that drew them up, yet as he plainly perceiv'd that for the Step he was going to take he might some day or other be call'd to a severe Account, he petition'd the King, that he would please to excuse him from the said Embassy, or at least to give him the necessary Security. The King granted him the latter part of his Petition by a Commission, wherein he enjoin'd him punctually to observe his Instructions, not only those relating to the Good of the State, but to his own Person and Marriage.

Sign the Truce.

Propose the King's Marriage with Margaret of Anjou.

The Ambassadors meeting at Tours, there sign'd the Truce which I have already mention'd. Afterwards the Earl of Suffolk propos'd, or caus'd to be propos'd, the Marriage of the King his Master to Margaret of Anjou; and instead of stipulating a Portion, he engag'd in the King's Name, to restore the City of Mans, and the whole County of Maine to Lewis of Anjou King of Sicily, on condition that this Prince should make a Present of it to the Count du Maine his Brother.

Which is approv'd by the King and Council.

'Tis uncertain whether the Earl of Suffolk had it in his Instructions to restore Maine, or whether he did it of himself, tho' I think the latter most probable. Be it as it will, he return'd to England in order to get the Conditions, which had been agreed to for the King's Marriage, approv'd by the King and Council. The Duke of Gloucester oppos'd it to the utmost of his power, by shewing that Maine was the Key of Normandy. But do what he could, every thing that the Earl of Suffolk had done was approv'd of; and in a few days after, the Earl return'd to France with a Proxy from the King to marry Margaret, and with the Title of Marquiſs, with which the King honour'd him before he ſet out.

And ſolemniz'd by Proxy.

IN November 1444, the Marriage was ſolemniz'd at Tours, where the King of France, as is ſaid above, then reſided. And not many Months after, in 1445, the new Queen arriv'd in England, and according to the Scheme already concerted, took the Government upon her in the name of the King her Husband, the Miniſters affecting to receive thoſe Orders from her in public, which ſhe before-hand concerted with them in private; for as to the King, all that he did was to ſet his hand to every thing they brought him, without informing himſelf what it was about, tho' every thing was tranſacted in his Name. This Beginning promis'd a happy Regency to the Queen and the Miniſtry; and the rather, becauſe the Parliament which met in 1446, thank'd the Marquiſs of Suffolk for the great Service which he had done to the Kingdom, and made him amends for the Expences he had been at in his Embaſſy. Yet there were two Perſons ſtill remaining, who hung very heavy upon the Adminiſtration of the Queen and the Miniſtry, viz. the Dukes of Gloceſter and York. As to the former, there was ſo little probability of ever gaining him over, that his Ruin was reſolv'd on: but as for the Duke of York, who was lately arriv'd from France, they endeavour'd to ſecure him in the Intereſts of the Court, by heaping Careſſes on him, and the King continued the Regency of France to him for five Years longer. Nevertheleſs the Duke being not ſo pliable afterwards as the Miniſtry would have had him, the Regency was taken from him before the Expiration of that Term, and given to the Duke of Somerſet.

The new Queen arrives, and manages all Affairs.

THE Duke of Gloceſter's Enemies perceiving themſelves ſo well fix'd, and having a Parliament at their Devotion, reſolv'd at laſt to execute the Project they had contriv'd to ruin him. Firſt of all they got him remov'd from the Seat which he held in Council, as firſt Prince of the Blood. Afterwards they caus'd him to be impeach'd of ſeveral Crimes, which it was pretended he had been guilty of during his Regency. But he defended himſelf ſo well, that the Council did not think fit to refer the Affair to the deciſion of the Peers: conſequently the Duke was for this time acquitted, but in ſuch a manner that he could get no Satisfaction from thoſe who had accus'd him. This Affair made a mighty Noiſe at London, where the Duke was extreamly belov'd, and the People ſeem'd one and all reſolv'd to protect him openly againſt all his Enemies. But this Affection of the Populace to him only ſerv'd to haſten his Ruin; for not long after, when the Parliament was aſſembled at St. Edmundsbury in 1447, the Duke of Gloceſter was there arreſted on the firſt day of their Seſſion *, committed to a cloſe Priſon, without any of his Domeſticks to attend him; and next day he was found dead in his Bed. It was then given out that he had contriv'd to murder the King; and ſeveral of his Domeſtics being apprehended, were all condemn'd to die as his Accomplices in this pretended Crime; but the King pardon'd every one of them. There was no body that made the leaſt doubt that the Queen, and the three Miniſters had put this Duke to ſome violent death; which drew that public Hatred upon them, of which they all afterwards felt ſevere Effects, excepting only the Cardinal of Wincheſter, who eſcap'd the Puniſhment he deſerv'd by his death, which overtook him ſoon after.

THEN it was that the People's Eyes began to be open'd; they plainly ſaw what the Marquiſs of Suffolk was driving at, and accus'd him publickly of having betray'd the King and Kingdom, as well in reſpect to the King's Marriage, as to the Truce which he had ſign'd at Tours. The Marquiſs being no Stranger to theſe Complaints, obtain'd the King's Letters Patent, which fully juſtify'd him as a Perſon that had done no more than what he had been expreſſly order'd. But as the Subjects knew very well that the King did nothing of his own head, this was not enough to cancel the Impreſſions they had already receiv'd. At the ſame time, in 1448, the Queen, on purpoſe as it were to brave the People, and to ſhew that ſhe valued not their Murmurings, created the Marquiſs of Suffolk Duke of that Name.

THIS very Year the Truce with France happen'd to be broke by the Surprize of Fougeres, of which Surienne, already mention'd, made himſelf Maſter, while the Duke of Somerſet Regent in France, was at Roan. Whoever ſeriouſly conſiders Surienne's Action, cannot help being of opinion that he had ſecret Orders to ſurprize this Place, in order to give Charles VII. an Opportunity to regain all that the Engliſh poſſeſs'd in France, as actually happen'd. There are many Reaſons to ſupport this Suſpicion; I will but juſt mention them, becauſe 'tis needleſs to enlarge upon them. 1. There was no apparent Reaſon for taking away the Regency of France from the Duke of York during the Truce, if there had not been ſome Deſign carrying on, for which he was not thought a fit Tool. For this Prince had thoroughly diſcharg'd his Duty during the War, and hitherto there had been no reaſon to complain of him. 2. There is no probability that Surienne durſt have undertaken to ſurprize Fougeres, as it were under the Regent's Noſe, and at a time when the Truce was juſt renew'd, if he had not been ſure of doing it with Impunity. 3. The Heat Charles VII. diſcover'd in this Affair, which did not affect him in particular, ſhews that it was a far-fetch'd Pretence for breaking the Truce.

Truce. 4. His Obſtinacy in inſiſting upon 1,600,000 Crowns Damages for the Duke of Bretagne, without any Deduction, before a juſt Eſtimate could be made of the Damages, is a plain Sign that he intended to put England out of a condition to accommodate this Affair. 5. It appear'd that, in a little time after, he had no leſs than four Armies on foot to invade Normandy, for which ſome Preparation muſt neceſſarily have been made before the taking of Fougeres. 6. The Duke of Somerſet and the Court of England did indeed diſown Surienne, but they never made any poſitive Offer to the Duke of Bretagne by way of Amends: They did not reſtore Fougeres to him, and gave him no Satisfaction by puniſhing the Author of that Undertaking. 7. When King Charles enter'd Normandy, the Places of that Dutchy had neither Proviſions, Ammunition, nor ſufficient Garriſons; and moſt of the Governors were in England, by leave either from the Court or the Regent. 8. There was no manner of Preparation made in England to carry on the War, which was juſt broke out again. 9. The Duke of Somerſet, who did not want Bravery, made but a wretched Defence, and even ſurrender'd the City of Caen contrary to the Advice of the principal Officers of the Gariſon. 10. Laſtly, the Duke of Suffolk was afterwards impeached by the Houſe of Commons, for having held a Correſpondence with the King's Enemies, to make a Sacrifice to them of Normandy, and all his Poſſeſſions in France.

Diſcontents of the People, who talk of the D. of York's Right to the Crown.

KING Charles having made ſo great a Progreſs in Normandy in 1449, as to be Maſter of Roan, the People's Diſſatisfaction with the Court grew to a very great height; and they began to talk of the Right which the Duke of York had to the Crown, as Heir of the Family of March. This coming to the Ears of the Queen and the Miniſtry, they thought fit to ſend the Duke of York into Ireland, on pretence of appeaſing ſome Diſorders there.

He is therefore ſent to Ireland.

D. of Suffolk impeach'd of High Treaſon, and committed to the Tower.

THE Parliament being aſſembled in 1450, the Commons ſent up an Impeachment of High Treaſon to the Houſe of Peers againſt the Duke of Suffolk, which imported, that he had held a Correſpondence with the French, and betray'd the Intereſts of his King and Country; whereupon the Duke was ſent to the Tower. But to prevent this matter from being puſh'd too far, the Queen thought fit to adjourn the Parliament to Leiceſter; and immediately after, the Duke of Suffolk was releas'd out of the Tower, and reſtor'd to his old Station at Court: And when the Parliament was actually re-aſſembled at Leiceſter, the King and Queen went thither, being accompany'd by the Duke of Suffolk. This ſo diſguſted the Commons, that they preſented an Addreſs to the King, praying him to ſend the Duke back to the Tower. The Queen forſeeing by this Puſh that it would be a hard matter to ſave him, prevailed on the King to baniſh him out of the Realm for five Years. But as the Duke was going to retire to France, he was met at Sea by an Engliſh Man of War, whoſe Captain caus'd his Head to be cut off without any Form of Tryal.

Releas'd and reſtored to his Place at Court.

Commons addreſs the K. to recommit him to the Tower, whereupon the D. gets him baniſh'd.

But he was met at Sea by a Man of War, whoſe Captain beheaded him.

MEAN time, the Duke of York, who was in Ireland, imagining that the Diſguſt of the People of England againſt the Queen and Miniſtry might make well for him, reſolv'd to improve the Opportunity. For this purpoſe he choſe a fit Tool, one Jack Cade an Iriſhman, who taking the Name of John Mortimer, Brother to the late E. of March, went into the County of Kent, where he aſſembled a vaſt number of People: And when he thought himſelf ſtrong enough, he march'd towards London, which open'd its Gates to him; and he caus'd the Head of the Lord High Treaſurer to be ſtruck off, while the Court was retir'd to Kenilworth. But the Rebels miſcarry'd thro' the Imprudence of Cade, who being abandon'd by his Troops, was kill'd in a place to which he went to hide himſelf. Probably the Duke of York only ſet up this Man to ſound the Inclinations of the People in favour of the Mortimer or March Family, to which he was Heir by his Mother.

Cade's Rebellion.

He enters London, and takes off the Lord High Treaſurer's Head.

He abſconds, is taken, and kill'd.

THIS ſame Year Charles VII. finiſh'd the Conqueſt of Normandy, and caus'd his Army to march into Guyenne, by which means the Duke of Somerſet loſing the Regency, return'd to England, and arrived there while the Parliament was ſitting. The Clamours againſt him were ſo loud, that the Lower Houſe could not avoid addreſſing the King to ſend him to the Tower; but the Parliament was no ſooner broke up than the Duke return'd to the Court, where he had the Poſt of the Duke of Suffolk.

D. of Somerſet diſmiſs'd from the Regency.

Clamours againſt the D. of Somerſet.

IN the Year 1451, Guyenne was entirely loſt; which occaſion'd ſuch ſevere Murmurings in England, that the Duke of York thought it high time for Action, but took care nevertheleſs to conceal his Aim at the Crown. He repair'd to England, notwithſtanding the Orders which the King had iſſued to hinder his landing: and retiring to his Seat at Wigmore, he there took Meaſures to have an Army ready in caſe of need. Then he wrote to the King, complaining of the ill State which the Kingdom was fallen into by the Miſconduct of his Miniſters, and demanding that the Duke of Somerſet might be puniſh'd as he deſerv'd. Tho' the King return'd him a very mild Anſwer, yet in 1452, he march'd towards London, where he had hopes of being admitted; but he found the Gates ſhut, and therefore went and poſted himſelf on the other ſide the Thames. The King, who was already prepar'd, purſu'd him, and paſs'd the River at London. When the two Armies were near each other, they came to a Parley, in which the Duke promis'd to lay down his Arms, provided the Duke of Somerſet might be ſent to the Tower. The King taking him at his word, the Duke diſbanded his Troops, and went to Court without any manner of Precaution, where, as he was ſailing to the King againſt the the Duke of Somerſet, he was very much ſurpriz'd to ſee his Grace come out from behind the Tapeſtry, where he conceal'd himſelf, and to hear him not only to make his own Defence, but alſo to accuſe him (the Duke of York) of having enter'd into dangerous Deſigns againſt the King. Upon this, the Duke of York was arreſted as he was going out of the Room; and 'tis probable he would have paid very dear for his Indiſcretion, if ſeveral Reaſons, too long to mention here, had not ſav'd his Life. The Court only requir'd an Oath of him, that he would never take Arms againſt the King, provided he were ſet at liberty; upon which he retir'd to his Eſtate at Wigmore, waiting for a better opportunity to put his Deſigns in execution. Mean while the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet ſtill govern'd all in the King's Name.

He is ſet at liberty, and retires to his Eſtate in the Country.

Rights of the Houſes of Lanc. and York to the Crown.

IF we only conſider the common Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm, the Duke of York's Right to the Crown was indiſputable; for he was Heir to the Houſe of March, which deſcended from the ſecond Son of Edward III. whereas the Lancaſter Family was only deſcended from the third Son. But then the latter had the Crown ſettled on it by an Act of Parliament, and had been above 50 Years in poſſeſſion of it. The Duke of York did not dare to diſpute the Parliament's Settlement; but on the contrary, propos'd to come at the Crown by their means. For this end he was under an abſolute Neceſſity of ſtarting ſuch Pretences, as might give him an Opportunity of puſhing Things to the end he had in view. The Queen and the Duke of Somerſet, by their manner of governing, furniſh'd him with a plauſible Motive for acting under the ſole pretence of the public Welfare, while he was prepar'd to make his advantage of the Conſequences which this Quarrel might produce. With this View, he procur'd to himſelf the Friendſhip of two Noblemen, who were the ableſt Heads in the Kingdom, viz. the Earl of Salisbury of the Nevil Family, Son-in-Law to the Earl of the ſame Name, who was kill'd at the Siege of Orleans, and the Earl of Warwick his Son. He had alſo other Friends at Court, who pretending to be devoted to the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet, only waited for an opportunity to do him ſome conſiderable Service.

TOWARDS the cloſe of the Year 1453, an Occaſion naturally preſented. The King falling into a Conſumption, which endanger'd his Life, and the Queen being brought to bed of a Prince, the Duke of York, by the Advice of his Friends, pretended an extraordinary Submiſſion to the King, and did not ſhew the leaſt Inclination to ſtir. The Affairs of the Nation requir'd the Calling of a Parliament; but by reaſon of the King's Sickneſs, it had been adjourn'd to the Month of Febr. 1454. During this Adjournment, the Duke of York's Friends at Court repreſented to the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet, "That

His Friends make a Repreſentation to the Q. and the D. of Somerſet.

"while the King continued in Health, it "was lawful for them to govern in his Name, "becauſe it was ſuppos'd that the King "would have it ſo, and that all Orders "came from him; but that as he was now "not in a Capacity to take cognizance of "Affairs, their Authority had no longer "any good Foundation to ſtand upon. "That as there were too many Malecontents "in the Kingdom, it was to be fear'd that "the Parliament would appoint other Go-"vernors. For this reaſon they adviſ'd "them to do ſomething which might con-"vince the World that they did not pretend "to the Uſurpation of all Authority; and "that for this end it would be proper to "call to Council the Duke of York, the Earls "of Salisbury and Warwick, and ſome "other Noblemen of the greateſt Diſtinc-"tion." The Queen and the Duke of Somerſet cloſing with this fatal Advice, the Duke of York and his Friends gain'd ſuch an Aſcendant in the Privy Council, that the Queen and the Duke her Miniſter loſt all ground there: And the firſt Step of the new Privy Counſellors was to ſend the Duke of Somerſet to the Tower.

HENRY VI.

Duke of Som. ſent to the Tower.

THE Parliament aſſembling in 1454, the Commons impeach'd the Duke of Somerſet of High Treaſon; and the Duke of York was declar'd Protector during the King's Sickneſs. Not long after, the Government of Calais was taken from the Duke of Somerſet, and the Duke York ſeiz'd it into his own hands, or rather got a Patent in the King's Name inveſting him with it.

THE Regency of the Duke of York continued no longer than the Remainder of this Year; for the King recovering his Health in the beginning of the next Year, reſum'd the Government into his own hands, or rather the Queen govern'd as before in the King's Name; and in a very little time ſhe diſcharg'd the Duke of Somerſet from the Tower, and put him in the ſame Poſt which he held before his Impriſonment.

The Q. governs again, and releaſes and reſtores the Duke of Somerſet.

MEAN time ſome of the moſt moderate Lords, fearing that theſe Broils would at laſt produce ſome fatal Revolution, laid their Heads together in 1455, to accommodate the two Dukes, and at length inclin'd them to refer their Differences to Arbitrators. But this Precaution had not its Effect, becauſe of the Duke of Somerſet's Impatience to have the Duke of York remov'd from the Government of Calais. The King under colour of obſerving a Neutrality between theſe two Dukes, who diſputed for that Government, depriv'd the Duke of York of it, and declar'd himſelf Governor of the Place. The Duke of York feign'd a Submiſſion with a good Grace, but he ſoon after retir'd to Wales, where he rais'd an Army; and the King having aſſembled a Body of Troops on his part, march'd to give the Duke Battle.

The K. marches to fight him, but is defeated in the Battle of St. Albans, wounded and taken Priſoner.

THE two Armies met very near St. Albans, where happen'd the firſt of the thirteen Battles that was fought in this Quarrel.

Quarrel. The Duke of Somerſet was there kill'd, and the King being defeated, and wounded in the Neck with an Arrow, fell into the Hands of the Duke of York, who conducted him to London with all the Reſpect poſſible, and always carry'd it to him as his Sovereign; for he did not as yet think it time to make known his Intentions.

THE Parliament aſſembling not long after, cenſur'd the Conduct of the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet, and deſir'd the King to appoint a Protector. But the Duke of York, for fear it might be ſuſpected that the King was forc'd to it, caus'd the Nomination to be put off, and the Parliament was prorogued to the 12th of November.

Duke of York is again choſe Protector.

THE ſame Day that the Parliament met again, the King appointed the Duke of York Protector of the Realm, with this Clauſe, that he ſhould enjoy all the Prerogatives of the ſaid Dignity, till the Parliament ſhould diſcharge him of it. The new Protector relying altogether upon this Clauſe, liv'd in a State of perfect Security, leaving the King and Queen at as full liberty as they could wiſh. Mean time, the Queen having concerted Meaſures with Henry the new Duke of Somerſet, the Son of him who was kill'd at St. Albans, found means to put a Period to this Regency, which the Duke of York hop'd to enjoy as long as the King liv'd. The Parliament meeting again in 1456, the King went thither unexpected, and declar'd that being thro' the Grace of God in good Health, he did not think the Realm had need of a Protector, and deſir'd the Parliament to diſcharge the Duke of York from that Employ. The Queen had ſo well link'd her Party, that the Parliament immediately order'd the Protector's Dignity to be ſuppreſs'd; and not long after, the Duke of York, with the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick left the Court, and retir'd into Yorkſhire. A Tumult that was rais'd at London on a very trifling occaſion, giving the Queen cauſe to ſuſpect that the Duke of York's Friends were the ſecret Authors of it, ſhe carry'd the King to Coventry, on pretence of giving him change of Air. She had laid ſuch a Trap for the Duke and the two Earls, that ſhe narrowly miſs'd drawing them to Court; but as they were forewarned of their danger, they had time to eſcape it; and the Earl of Warwick went to Calais, the Government of which was given to him after the Battle of St. Albans.

And again removed.

The Q. ſuſpects him, and endeavours to ſurprize him with the two Earls, but they eſcape.

THE whole Year 1457 paſſed away without any domeſtic Commotion, becauſe People were only intent upon the Invaſions which the French made upon the Southern Coaſts, and the Scots in the North.

French and Scotch Invaſions.

THO' the Duke of York was far enough from Court, yet the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet could not be eaſy. On the other hand, the Duke of York ſaw well enough, that it would be no hard Task for him to dethrone the King by force. Whſle both Parties were thus diſpos'd, certain Lords who met in 1458, on purpoſe, found it very eaſy to reconcile them, which they did accordingly at London, in the beginning of April 1458; and on the 5th of the ſame Month there was a Proceſſion to St. Paul's, in which the Lords walk'd in Pairs, viz. one of each Party by the other, and the Duke of York led the Queen. By the Agreement it was ſtipulated, that the Duke of York, the Earl of Salisbury, the Earl of Warwick, and ſome others of their Friends, ſhould be admitted into the King's Council. But whether they were afraid to truſt the Queen, or whatever elſe was the Motive, they left the Court upon various Pretexts. The Earl of Warwick departing for Calais, had a Skirmiſh with ſome Ships from Genoa and Lubeck, which he thought fit to carry off; and Complaints being made thereof to Court, he return'd thither to juſtify his Conduct. One day while he was in Council, it happen'd that one of his Domeſtics quarrell'd with one of the King's Domeſtics, and wounded him; and, as he was going out, he was immediately ſurrounded by all the loweſt Order of the King's and Queen's Domeſtics, who pretended to revenge their Comrade's Quarrel, but went about it in ſuch a manner that the Earl plainly perceiv'd they had a deſign upon his Perſon. However he eſcap'd, tho' he was ſoon after confirm'd in his Thought by the Intelligence given him, that there was an Order from the King to carry him to the Tower. Then he no longer doubted but it was a Contrivance of the Queen to get him diſpatch'd without her ſeeming to have any hand in it, or at leaſt to accuſe him of having rais'd this Tumult in the King's Palace. This made him reſolve to go and find out the Duke of York and the Earl his Father, in order to concert with them the neceſſary Precautions to be taken againſt ſuch Snares.

Proceſſion thereupon to Paul's.

Duke of York and his Friends leave the Court.

Earl of Warwick attacks ſome Ships of Genoa and Lubeck.

King deſigns to commit him to the Tower, but he eſcapes.

And goes to conſult with the Duke of York, and the Earl of Saliſbury.

IMMEDIATELY after, in the Year 1459, the Earl of Warwick repair'd to Calais, and the Duke of York and the Earl of Salisbury went to raiſe Troops, the Duke in Wales, and the Earl in Yorkſhire. On the other hand, the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet aſſembled an Army without loſs of time. Mean while, the Queen being inform'd that the Earl of Salisbury had a deſign to march to London, detach'd Lord Audley to ſtop his March, and bid him make all poſſible haſte, in order to hinder the Earl of Salisbury from joining the Duke of York. Audley being advanc'd as far as Shropſhire, met the Earl there upon Boreheath, where a Battle enſued, in which the King's Toops were defeated, and their General kill'd. Nevertheleſs, the Earl of Salisbury, as victorious as he was, did not care to force his way to London; but contented himſelf with joining the Duke of York in Wales, where they ſtaid for the Earl of Warwick, who brought them a Detachment from the Garriſon of Calais.

The ſecond Battle between York and Lancaſter.

Reconciliation between the Duke of York and the Court.

FEODERA Tom. XI.

THE King could not march into the Field againſt the Malecontents till October. As ſoon as he came near them he offer'd 'em an Amneſty, but they demanded Securities which the Court was not in a humour to grant them. At the ſame time, the King gave the Government of Calais to the Duke of Somerſet, but the Earl of Warwick would not eaſily part with it.

Duke of Somerſet made Governor of Calais.

THE Duke of York and his Friends finding that the King was reſolv'd to give them Battle, wrote a very ſubmiſſive Letter to him, to which he return'd no anſwer; but caus'd a Proclamation to be diſpers'd in their Army, whereby he promis'd an abſolute Pardon to all thoſe who ſhould abandon the Rebels Party. This Proclamation had ſuch an effect that the Malecontent Lords were that very Night abandon'd by the greateſt part of their Troops, and oblig'd to retire with all poſſible diligence, for fear of being deliver'd up to the King. The Duke of York fled to Ireland, and the two Earls of Salisbury and Warwick poſted to Calais whither they carried with them the Earl of March, who was the Duke of York's eldeſt Son.

Duke of York &c. abandon'd by their Forces, and take flight.

The Parliament's Sentence againſt them.

THE Parliament which met ſoon after declar'd the Duke of York and his Adherents guilty of High Treaſon, and incapable of ſucceeding to any Inheritance to the fourth Generation, and confiſcated all their Eſtates. As ſoon as the Parliament was broke up, the Duke of Somerſet ſet out to take poſſeſſion of his Government of Calais, but was repuls'd by the Cannon of the Forts, &c. and obliged to retire to Guiſnes. Some time after, in the Year 1460, the Queen having ſent him Troops and Shipping, the Earl of Warwick found means to take them out of the Port of Sandwich, where they were waiting for a Wind. The Earl made uſe of this ſame Fleet to go to Ireland, and conſult with the Duke of York about the proper Meaſures for their common defence. And as he return'd from thence, he met the King's Fleet, commanded by the Duke of Exeter, which did not dare to attack him.

THE Court naturally ſuppoſing that the Malecontents would not ſtay long before they took Arms again, reſolv'd to weaken them by making away with all thoſe that were moſt attach'd to their Party. For this end the King gave a Commiſſion to the Earl of Wiltſhire and the Lord Scales to make a Circuit over the whole Kingdom, in order to proſecute all thoſe who had taken part with the Duke of York. The Severity with which theſe Commiſſioners acted in ſome places, ſo affrighted the Inhabitants of the County of Kent, who knew themſelves more guilty than the others, that they implor'd the Protection of the Earls of March, Salisbury and Warwick, and invited them to come into their County, where they promis'd to live and die with them. This Invitation being joyfully accepted, thoſe Lords march'd ſoon after to Sandwich, where they found 4,000 Men arm'd, all ready to follow them. In a few days this Army increas'd to the number of 40,000 Men, with whom the Lords march'd to London, which open'd its Gates to them, after having refus'd admittance to the Troops that had been ſent by the Queen.

HENRY VI.

MEAN time the Court having loſt no time in Preparations, the King and Queen were at Coventry at the Head of a Powerful Army, and march'd towards London. On the other hand, the Earls of March and Warwick having left the Earl of Salisbury at London, advanc'd towards the King, and both Armies met very near Northampton, where a bloody Battle was fought, in which the Royal Army was entirely defeated, and the King himſelf taken Priſoner. The Queen and the D. of Somerſet had the good fortune to get ſafe to the North. The victorious Lords paid the King all the Honours that he could poſſibly have deſir'd in his greateſt Proſperity, and conducted him to London, where the Parliament was call'd. Mean time the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet retired to Scotland. The King being in the power of the Lords, did every thing they would have him, and put forth Proclamations to juſtify their Conduct.

The third Battle betwixt York and Lancaſter in which the King is taken Priſoner, and carry'd to London.

WHILE theſe things paſs'd in England, the Duke of York, who little expected this happy Revolution, had engag'd James II. King of Scotland, to make an Incurſion into England, in order to harraſs the Court: And not many days after the Battle of Northampton, James went and beſieg'd Roxburgh, which was in the Hands of the Engliſh; but he was unhappily kill'd at this Siege by the burſting of one of his own great Guns. James III. his Son, who was about ſeven Years of Age, ſucceeded him, and his Mother carry'd on the Siege till the Place was taken.

James II. King of Scotland kill'd at the Siege of Roxburgh.

CHARLES VII. King of France died ſome Days before, leaving his Son Lewis XI. his Succeſſor.

THE Duke of York could not be at London till a Day or two after the opening of the Parliament. Then he landed at Weſtminſter, and going into the Houſe of Lords, he ſtood upright for ſome time hard by the Throne, with his Hand upon it, as if he waited for being intreated to place himſelf in it. But the Silence of the Lords convincing him that it was in vain for him to expect it, he withdrew in the greateſt Confuſion imaginable. Next day he ſent a Memorial to the Parliament, containing his Claim to the Crown. After many Days Debate upon this Queſtion, the Parliament came at laſt to a Reſolution, to which they gave the form of an Act, declaring, that notwithſtanding the undeniable Right which the Duke of York had to the Crown, they were willing to conſent that Henry

Duke of York comes to the Houſe of Lords, expecting to be plac'd in the Throne.

Sends his Claim to it to the Parliament Houſe. Reſolution of the Parliament about it.

Henry ſhould enjoy it during his Life; but that after his Death it ſhould devolve to the Duke, or his Heirs; and that if the King ſhould in any manner whatſoever violate this Agreement, he ſhould thereby loſe all his Rights.

JUST as the Duke of York was arriv'd at the very height of all his Wiſhes, he heard that the Queen was raiſing Troops in the North. As it was of the utmoſt Importance to nip her Deſigns in the Bud, he ſet out from London with no more than 5000 Men, and ſent the reſt of the Army to Wales, under his Son the Earl of March, juſt to refreſh themſelves there, and then to come and join him. The farther he advanc'd into the North, the worſe News he receiv'd every day of the Queen's Succeſs in her Levies. At laſt, when he entered Yorkſhire, he heard that the Queen was marching towards him, at the head of 18000 Men. This News made him reſolve to throw himſelf into the Caſtle of Sandal, where the Queen, who had no Artillery, would never have been able to have forced him, if he had had the Patience to have ſtay'd for the Earl of March, whom he had ſent for. But ſhe ſo provok'd him by her Bravadoes, that at laſt he went out, and put himſelf in a poſture of Battle in the Plain of Wakefield, where about the End of December 1460, a Battle was fought, in which the Duke of York's Army was routed, and himſelf kill'd on the ſpot, with his ſecond Son the Earl of Rutland. The Queen caus'd the Duke's Head to be put upon the Walls of York, together with that of the Earl of Salisbury, who had the Misfortune to be taken Priſoner.

The fourth Battle, in which the D. of York is killed.

THE Earl of March, who was not above 20 Years of Age, was not diſcourag'd by the Death of the Duke his Father. He had 23,000 Men with him, beſides what Forces ſtay'd at London with the Earl of Warwick; and theſe were enough in all conſcience to have given Battle to the Queen, who had no more than 18,000. And hearing that ſhe was on the March towards London, he reſolved to make all the haſte poſſible to be there before her; but upon Intelligence that the Queen was ſending Gaſpar Tudor Earl of Pembroke againſt him, with a Detachment of her Army, he went out of his Road to go and fight him. He met him juſt by Mortimer's-Croſs in Herefordſhire, attack'd, defeated him, and kill'd 2000 of his Men; after which he turned about into the Road for London.

The fifth Battle.

MEAN time the Queen march'd alſo to that City in 1461, with extraordinary Diligence, not in the leaſt doubting but the Inhabitants would turn out the Earl of Warwick, as ſoon as they ſaw her at their Gates, with the victorious Army of the Duke of York. But the Earl of Warwick, who was undoubtedly afraid that the Citizens Minds were alter'd, thought it would be leſs dangerous for him to go and meet the Queen whom he found juſt by St. Albans, in a place call'd Bernard's-Heath, where the two Armies engag'd.

THE Earl of Warwick, who carried the King with him to the Field was totally routed, with the loſs of 2800 of his Men; and the Queen, beſides the pleaſure of being the Conqueror, had the Satisfaction to deliver the King her Husband: but her Imprudence, or rather Poverty robb'd her of the Fruits of this Victory; for, wanting Money to pay her Troops, ſhe gave them leave to plunder the Town of St. Albans, tho' perhaps it was out of her power to prevent them. This Act of Violence ſo alarmed the Citizens of London, that they reſolv'd to ſhut the Gates of their City againſt her. The Queen hearing of their Reſolution, ſpent ſome time in treating with the Mayor, in hopes that at laſt ſhe ſhould have Admittance into the City. During this, the Earl of March, who made long Journeys, being arrived near London, the Queen's Negotition was more unlikely to ſucceed than ever. And at laſt the Earl was received into London as it were in Triumph. The Queen having no hopes left of being admitted into the City, retir'd Northwards, and the Earl did not think fit to purſue her.

The ſixth Battle.

Sr. Albans plundered.

The Queen ſhut out of London, and the E. of March admitted.

IN a few days after, the Earl of Warwick having aſſembled the Army and the People, did with a loud Voice read the Act of Parliament to them, which was lately made concerning the Succeſſion, and in conſequence thereof the Earl of March was proclaim'd King by the Name of Edward IV. Thus have I given the Subſtance of the Acts in the eleventh Tome of the Fœdera, to the end of the Reign of Henry VI.

E. of Warwick reads the Succeſſion Act to the Army and People, and E. of March is thereupon proclaim'd King.

FOR the right Underſtanding of the Acts of this Eleventh Volume, it muſt be conſider'd, that Henry VI. was always in a State of Tutelage, from the beginning of his Reign to the end of it; one while under the Duke of Gloceſter his Uncle, as has been already ſeen; another while under the Cardinal of Wincheſter; afterwards under the Duke of Suffolk; then under the Queen his Wife, aſſiſted by the Duke of Somerſet; at laſt he was under the Government of the Duke of York, the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury, and again under that of the Queen. I am of opinion, that the beſt way of accounting for the Acts I am to ſpeak of, is diſtinctly to mark out thoſe ſeveral Stages of Government, becauſe by that means we ſhall be enabled to ſee at once the View and Motives of the Acts relating to domeſtic Affairs.

Henry's Governours.

WHILE Henry was under the Government of the Cardinal of Wincheſter, Cardinal Kemp Archbiſhop of York, and the Earl of Suffolk, we have,

1. AN Order to conduct Eleanor Cobham Dutcheſs of Gloceſter from Cheſter Caſtle to that of Kenilworth; dated October the 26th 1443 [b].

Order for the Dutcheſs of Gloceſter's Removal to Kenilworth Caſtle. 45.

2.

FOEDERA Tom. XI.

2. LETTERS Patent on account of the Earl of Suffolk's Scruples touching his Embaſſy to France, whereby the King orders him to follow his Inſtructions, and ſays that his own Marriage is one of the chief Affairs in queſtion. They are dated the 20th of February 1444 [a].

Commiſſion to the E. of Suffolk. 53.

THIS ſhews that an Agreement was made with the Court of France for the King's Marriage, before the Departure of the Ambaſſadors.

THERE is alſo a Commiſſion to the Marquiſs of Suffolk to go and fetch the new Queen; dated October the 28th, 1444 [b].

Another to fetch the Queen. 74.

3. A COMMISSION to diſpoſe of the Eſtate of the late Duke of Gloceſter, who died, as they ſaid, inteſtate; dated March the 24th, 1447 [c].

Another for diſpoſing of the Eſtate of the D. of Gloc. 160.

4. LETTERS Patent for acquitting the Duke of Suffolk from the Charge of having engag'd the King to reſtore Maine and Anjou, without Authority for it. The King declares that the Duke did no more than what he was order'd, and forbids all Perſons to defame him; dated June the 18th, 1447 [d].

D. of Suffolk. vindicated by the K. 172.

Pardon to the D. of Gloceſt's Domeſtics. 178, 179.

5. A PARDON to Thomas Herbard Eſq; and three others of the Duke of Gloceſter's Domeſtics, condemn'd to die for a Conſpiracy againſt the King; dated July the 14th, 1447 [e].

IT appears by this Act, that thoſe Perſons had been try'd by Commiſſioners, of whom the Duke of Suffolk, one of the Authors of the Duke of Gloceſter's Death, was the Preſident.

AS it would not have ſignify'd any thing to put to death thoſe People, who perhaps were corrupted to make them own the pretended Conſpiracy of the Duke of Gloceſter, or who were at leaſt innocent of any ſuch thing, the King granted them their Pardon founded upon four Motives, which plainly ſhew the Wickedneſs of his Prompters.

Motives of the King's Pardon.

1. BECAUSE God reſerves Vengeance to himſelf.

2. BECAUSE the Day, in which the King granted his Pardon to the Criminals, was Friday; the Day on which Jeſus Chriſt ſuffer'd Death for us.

3. BECAUSE the Aſſumption of the Holy Virgin was very near at hand; a Feſtival to which the King had always from his Leading-ſtrings paid a great Veneration.

4. IN conſideration of many Favours which God had heap'd upon the King the preceding Year.

While Henry VI. was govern'd by the Queen and the Duke of Suffolk, we have,

1. A PROTEST made in the King's Name, at the time when Mans was reſtor'd, that he did not deſign to give up his Right of Sovereignty [f].

Proteſt about the Reſtitution of Mans. 204.

2. A DISCHARGE for thoſe who had deliver'd up Mans to the French, as having done it by the King's Order; dated the 12th of June 1448 [g].

Diſcharge for thoſe who had deliver'd up Mans. 216.

HENRY VI. P. 268.

3. A PROCLAMATION againſt ſuch as ſpread ſeditious Libels; dated April the 14th, 1450 [h].

THIS was at the time when the Duke of Suffolk was impeach'd.

While Henry VI. was govern'd by the Queen alone, after the Duke of Suffolk's Death, we have,

1. AN Order to pay 1000 Marks out of the Rebels forfeited Eſtates, to Alexander Iden who brought the Body of Jack Cade to London; dated July the 15th, 1450 [i].

Grant to the Man that brought the Body of J. Cade 275.

2. AN Aſſignment of 500 Marks out of the Sums due to the King from the Duke of Orleans, for paying the Ranſom of Thomas Kyriel, who was taken Priſoner at the Battle of Fourmigni; dated Auguſt the 12th, 1451 [k].

Order for the Ranſom of T. Kyriel 287.

THIS is a Confirmation of what has been already ſaid, that the Duke of Orleans had not paid this Ranſom.

While Henry VI. was under the Duke of York, and the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, after they were admitted to Council, we have,

1. A COMMISSION to the Duke of York to hold a Parliament in the Name of the King, who was ſick; dated February the 13th, 1454 [l].

Commiſſion to the D. of York to hold the Parliament. 344.

2. LETTERS Patent for appointing the Duke of York Protector of the Kingdom; dated the 3d of April following [m].

3. THE like Letters Patent of the ſame Date in favour of Edward the King's Son, then not quite ſeventh Months old, to be Protector when he comes of Age.

The like for P. Edward. 346.

THIS ſhews that the King was incapable for Government at that time, and that there was no likelihood that he ever would be qualified. By conſequence this muſt have been rather a Diſtemper of the Mind than of the Body, becauſe otherwiſe ſuch a Precaution would have been unneceſſary 20 Years beforehand.

4. A PATENT appointing the Duke of York Governor of Calais for ſeven Years; dated July the 28th, 1454 [n].

D. of York's Patent as Governor of Calais. 351.

While Henry VI. was govern'd by the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet, we have,

1. BAIL offer'd and taken for the Duke of Somerſet, a Priſoner in the Tower; dated February the 5th, 1455.

D. of Somerſet's Bail. 361. His Releaſe.

2. ORDER by the King and Council, the Duke of York, the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury preſent, to releaſe the Duke of Somerſet; dated as above.

Duke of York's Bond to the Duke of Somerset. 363.

4. THE Bond given by the Duke of York to the Duke of Somerſet, to pay him 20,000 Marks, in caſe that he, the Duke of York, refus'd to ſtand by the Judgment of the Arbitrators appointed to determine their Differences; on condition that Sentence ſhould be given before the 21ſt of June; dated March the 4th, 1455 [b].

Duke of York remov'd from the Government of Calais. 363.

5. ANOTHER of the ſame Nature given by the Duke of Somerſet; dated as above.

6. THE Act for removing the Duke of York from the Government of Calais, which ſays it was done at his Requeſt, tho' he was certainly forc'd to reſign it; dated March the 6th, 1455 [c].

369.

2. A PATENT appointing the Duke of York Protector 'till the Parliament thinks fit to diſcharge him; dated November the 19th, 1455 [f].

WHILE Henry VI was again govern'd by the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet, we find,

Order to the Duke of York to lay down the Protectorſhip. 373.

1. AN Order to the Duke of York to deſiſt from the Functions of Protector, according to the Reſolution of the Parliament; dated February the 25th, 1456 [g].

Henry's Anſwer to the King of Scotland, 383.

2. A VERY haughty Letter from Henry VI to the King of Scotland, in anſwer to a very provoking one which he had receiv'd from that Prince. He calls the King of Scotland his Vaſſal, and maintains that he has the Right of Sovereignty over the Kingdom of Scotland, which it is probable King James had denied; it is dated July the 26th, 1456 [h].

A Miſtake of Mr. Rymer about it.

MR. Rymer has committed a Miſtake here, in the account he gives of this Letter, which, he ſays, was written during the Government of the Duke of York, who did it to mortify the King of Scotland, the Duke of Somerſet's Nephew. But this Letter is dated the 26th of July, 1456, and the Duke of York had been removed from the Regency in the February preceding. Moreover, the Duke of Somerſet had been killed a Year before, at the Battel of St. Albans.

IT appears by an Act dated January the 28th, 1457, at Weſtminſter, that the King created Prince Edward, his Son, Prince of Wales, about that time. Creation of the Prince of Wales. 383.

IN this Tome we alſo find ſome other Acts, of which I will juſt mention the Contents.

Henry's Commiſſion to treat with Pope Eugene. P. 3.

IN 1442, Henry VI ſent an Ambaſſador to Rome, with a Commiſſion and Power to make a Treaty of Alliance and Confederacy with Eugene IV. This was at the time of thoſe Broils which happen'd betwixt the ſaid Pope and the Council of Baſil. Mean time England own'd the Legality of the ſaid Council; afterwards France did almoſt the ſame thing, only while ſhe acknowledg'd the Council of Baſil, ſhe adher'd nevertheleſs to Pope Eugene IV, whom the ſaid Council had depos'd. The Commiſſion is dated the 12th of March, 1442 [s].

IN 1451, the Ambaſſadors of England and Scotland being met to conclude a Truce, the former made a ſolemn Proteſtation touching the Right of Sovereignty which their King pretended to over the Kingdom of Scotland. They declar'd that whatever they ſaid or did, during the Treaty, they did not intend the leaſt Prejudice to the Right which their Maſter had or pretended to the Sovereignty of Scotland. This ſhews that the Scots had no mind that this Matter ſhould be touch'd upon in the Negotiation of the Treaty. If King James I had perform'd Homage to this ſame King for Scotland, as is pretended, it was natural to make mention of ſuch Homage in the Proteſtation. But even tho' this Homage were as real as they would have it, this ſhews that it would have been diſown'd afterwards, becauſe in the Negotiation which we are ſpeaking of, the Scots would not conſent that it ſhould be ſo much as mention'd. Conſequently the Engliſh could have reap'd no great Advantage from the Homage perform'd by a Captive King, and afterwards diſown'd [y].

The REIGN of EDWARD IV.

FOEDERA Tom. XI.

THE latter part of the Eleventh Tome of the Fœdera contains the Acts which refer to the Fourteen firſt Years of the Reign of Edward IV, viz. from the 10th of March, 1461, to the 22d of February, 1475. Domeſtick and Foreign Affairs being the Subſtance of theſe Acts, as well as thoſe of the preceding Tomes, it is by Conſequence neceſſary to relate with all poſſible brevity the principal Events of thoſe Fourteen Years, before we come to mention the Acts themſelves. I ſhall begin with,

I. Affairs Domeſtick.

IT has been already obſerv'd, that when Queen Margaret, Wife to Henry VI, could not get admittance into the City of London, tho' ſhe had won two Victories, ſhe retir'd into the Northern Counties with the King her Husband, and the Prince of Wales their Son, who was but eight Years of Age. It has alſo been obſerv'd, that after the Duke of York was kill'd in the Battel of Wakefield, the Earl of March his eldeſt Son, who was in Wales, ſet out for London; and that when he was about twenty Years of Age he was receiv'd and proclaim'd King there, by the Name of Edward IV, through the Care and Diligence of the Earl of Warwick.

EDWARD IV.

Edward IV proclaim'd King of England.

NOT many Days after his Proclamation, viz. in March, 1461, Edward was oblig'd to march towards the North to oppoſe the Progreſs of Queen Margaret, whoſe Forces were ſo increas'd that ſhe was at the Head of 60,000 Men.

FOEDERA Tom. XI.

The 7th Battel betwixt Lancaster and York.

The two Armies met at Towton [z], where, on Palm-Sunday *, after a bloody Battel, Edward gain'd the Victory; and according to the Report of ſome Hiſtorians the Queen loſt there 37,000 Men †. After this Battel, Henry VI, the Queen and the Prince retir'd to Scotland, and King Edward went to London to be crown'd.

Parliament owns the King's Title.

THE Parliament which met ſoon after, repeal'd all the Acts paſs'd againſt the late Duke of York, approv'd of every thing that had been done to place Edward his Son upon the Throne, and own'd him for true and lawful King of England. Thus the York Family was put in Poſſeſſion of the Crown by the Authority of Parliament, tho' not long before, the Duke of York was excluded from it with all his Poſterity. It is proper to remark, that in this Quarrel betwixt the two Families of York and Lancaſter, the Parliaments always took care to declare on the ſide of the Victor, becauſe they never had the liberty of acting otherwiſe. They were not conſulted 'till the Queſtion was already decided by Arms; conſequently it was in vain to alledge Acts of Parliament to ſupport the Rights of either the one Houſe or the other.

His Offer of a Truce to Scotland fruſtrated by Queen Margaret.

ONE of the firſt Things that Edward took care of after his Victory, was to cauſe a Truce to be offer'd to the Regents of Scotland, in order to hinder them from giving Aſſiſtance to the ejected King. But Queen Margaret broke off the Negotiation by delivering up Berwick to the Scots, and concluding a Marriage betwixt the Prince her Son, and a Siſter of the King of Scotland. But as all the Aſſiſtance ſhe might promiſe herſelf from thence, was not ſufficient to replace the King her Husband on his Throne, ſhe made a Voyage to France in 1462, to implore the Protection of Lewis XI. The Lancaſter Family having alſo a great number of Friends in England, the Queen did not deſpair of reaſſembling an Army there, provided that Lewis XI, who was her near Kinſman, would aſſiſt her.

She goes to France for Help to reſtore her Huſband.

EDWARD IV.

AND ſoon after, in the Year 1463, ſhe return'd to the North of England, where ſhe rais'd a new Army, and ſent for the King her Husband and the Prince to come to her. Edward hearing this, immediately ſent away the Lord Montague, Brother to the Earl of Warwick, with the beſt Part of his Troops, to endeavour to ſtop the Queen's Progreſs, while himſelf prepar'd to follow with a powerful Reinforcement. Montague finding he had a fair Opportunity, attack'd the Queen on a ſudden, and put her Army to the Rout ‡. The Duke of Somerſet and many other Nobility of the Lancaſtrian Side, having the Misfortune to be taken Priſoners, were ſacrific'd to Edward's Revenge, who caus'd them to be beheaded. Edmund, the Duke of Somerſet's Brother, ſucceeded him. King Henry, Queen Margaret, and the Prince of Wales fled to Scotland.

The Queen returns and raiſes a new Army.

The Queen is routed in the eighth Battel betwixt the Houſes of York and Lancaſter.

She flies with the King and Prince to Scotland.

To reward Montague, Edward created him Marquis of that Name; and at the ſame time William Herbert was made Earl of Pembroke, though Jaſper Tudor, who was King Henry's Brother by the Mother's ſide, bore that Title. But the latter was ſuppos'd to have forfeited it by his Rebellion, in the Service of the King his Brother.

Creation of a Marquis of Montague and Earl of Pembroke.

A TRUCE which Edward concluded with Scotland the Year following, viz. 1464, having depriv'd Henry and the Queen of all Hopes of further Protection from the Scots, they reſolv'd to quit that Country; and accordingly the Queen and Prince went to France. But Henry, for what reaſon is not known, ventur'd to return to England, perhaps in hopes of being conceal'd there; but whatever was his Motive, there he was diſcover'd, apprehended, carry'd to London, and committed to the Tower ‖.

Edward's Truce with Scotland, upon which the Queen and Prince fly to France, and King Henry to England, where he is taken and impriſon'd.

EDWARD being in all appearance well eſtabliſh'd upon the Throne, reſolv'd to marry, and therefore ſent the Earl of Edward's Marriage.

[z] Yorkſhire.

* THIS was March 29.

† BIONDI, an Italian Author, who wrote a Hiſtory of theſe Civil Wars, has the following Reflection upon this Battel, viz. that if France or Scotland had attack'd England at that Juncture, when it had loſt ſo much Blood, it would infallibly have been conquer'd; but Mr. Rapin, in his other Hiſtory, obſerves from the many Battels which were fought after this in the ſame War, that the Engliſh had a great deal of Blood to ſpare before they could expire.

‡ THIS Battel was fought near Hexam.

‖ MR. William Habington, who has given the beſt Account of theſe Times of moſt remarkable Confuſion, and in whoſe Hiſtory, printed A. D. 1640, we have (ſays Biſhop Nicholſon) as agreeable a Copy of this King's Picture, as could be expected from one ſtanding at ſo great a diſtance from the Original, ſays, that King Henry was apprehended in Lancaſhire, by Thomas Son of Sir Edward Talbot of that County, as he ſat at Dinner at Waddington-Hall: Who tying the King's Legs to his Stirrups, convey'd him in that ignominious Manner to London. The new Duke of Somerſet and the Duke of Exeter fled to the Netherlands, where they bore all the Hardſhips that Perſons of their Character could ſuffer from a wretched Exile and extreme Poverty, inſomuch, that Philip de Comines, that noble Hiſtorian, who was Secretary to Lewis XI, and to Charles VIII, of France, and who has left us thoſe invaluable Memoirs which have been tranſlated into the Engliſh and ſeveral other Languages, ſays, he ſaw the Duke of Exeter, who was there incognito, following the Duke of Burgundy's Train bare-footed and bare-legged, begging an Alms; though he was the next of the Houſe of Lancaſter, and had marry'd Anne of York, King Edward's eldeſt Siſter, who obtain'd a Divorce from him. See the Memoirs, with Sleidan's Notes tranſlated by Mr. Uvedale, and printed for our Bookſellers, Vol. I. p. 240.

Warwick

FOEDERA Tom. XI.

Warwick to demand Bona of Savoy, who was Siſter to the Queen of France. But while his Ambaſſador was employ'd in making the Match, the King fell in Love with Elizabeth Woodville, and in 1465 marry'd her. This Lady was the Daughter of Sir Richard Woodville, and of Jaqueline of Luxemburg, Widow of the famous Duke of Bedford; ſhe had for her Husband Sir John Gray, a great Stickler for the Lancaſter Family, by whom ſhe had ſeveral Children *.

His Favours to his new Relations.

THE Concluſion of Edward's Marriage in ſuch a Hurry, and his Defiance to the violent Oppoſition made againſt it by his Mother the Dutcheſs of York, was the Source of all his Misfortunes. The Favours which he preſently heap'd on all the Queen's Relations, rais'd the Envy of the great Men. Sir Richard Woodville, the Queen's Father, was created Earl of Rivers, and by the King's Favour Anthony Woodville his Son marry'd the richeſt Heireſs in the Kingdom †. At which the Duke of Clarence the King's Brother was offended, becauſe he had not procur'd that Match for him; and therefore was provok'd to enter into Conſpiracies, which brought Edward within an Inch of his Ruin. But the Perſon who was moſt of all nettled at the King's Marriage was the Earl of Warwick, the Marriage having not only been concluded without his Privity, but alſo at a time when himſelf was employ'd at the Court of France in negotiating another which had actually been reſolv'd on before. Such ſtrange Carriage as this towards a Nobleman of that Diſtinction, who had plac'd the Crown upon the King's Head, and who 'till then was look'd upon as his Right-hand, was very hard to digeſt. Beſides, there were ſeveral other Reaſons which ſerv'd to inflame the Earl againſt him. Lewis XI incens'd him as much as poſſible againſt Edward, and gave him ſatisfactory Aſſurance that if he ſtood in need of his Aſſiſtance he ſhould have it. He was provok'd at the Affront which had been put upon the Princeſs his Siſter-in-Law as well as himſelf; but ſuch was then the Situation of Affairs, that it did not permit him to manifeſt his Reſentment. On the other Hand, when the Earl of Warwick was return'd into England, he found the King very cool towards him, and the Earl of Rivers ſole Favourite and Director of all Affairs, nothing being done at Court but by and through his Means: Conſequently, Warwick was a Cypher now in compariſon to what he was before his Voyage to France. Nevertheleſs, he diſſembled his Vexation, and his Hatred of the King, 'till a fair Opportunity offer'd to diſplay them with Violence. But the King, who knew his Reſentment, notwithſtanding all his care to hide it, conſider'd him in no other Light than his mortal Enemy, and heap'd ſuch Mortifications upon him as at laſt made him reſolve to quit the Court in 1467, and retire to his Seat in the Country.

EDWARD IV.

He is forced to leave the Court.

IN 1468, Charles Duke of Burgundy married Margaret of York, who was Edward's Siſter.

Duke of Burgundy marries Edward's Siſter Margaret.

WHILE Edward was heaping Favours upon the Queen's Father, Brothers and Children, the Earl of Warwick was ſtudying how to be reveng'd on him; but he was not able to begin the Execution of the Projects which he had form'd in his Retirement, 'till the Year 1469. His firſt Step was to bring his Brothers the Archbiſhop of York and the Marquis of Montague into his Views and Schemes for dethroning the King. The Archbiſhop ran headlong into the Plot; but Montague was a little more upon the Reſerve; and at laſt when he did go into it, ſeem'd to do it more out of Complaiſance to him, than any deſire to be inſtrumental towards the Succeſs of it. Afterwards the Earl of Warwick addreſs'd himſelf to the Duke of Clarence the King's Brother, and found Means to engage him in the Conſpiracy, by giving him his eldeſt Daughter in Marriage. The Duke, who was diſguſted with the King his Brother, was eaſily drawn into an Undertaking which was calculated for the King's Ruin, and, as he hop'd, for his own Advantage. It ſeems that about this time Edward began to repent of having too much diſguſted the Earl of Warwick: At leaſt we find in the Fœdera that he gave him ſeveral Marks of his Favour. But this was not enough to make the Earl relinquiſh his Deſign.

Earl of Warwick engages his Brothers in a Plot to dethrone the King, and the Duke of Clarence.

Earl of Warwick diſguſted.

IN September this ſame Year, there was a Riſing in Yorkſhire upon account of a certain Hoſpital in the City of that Name, to the Maintenance of which, Contribution was demanded from the whole County. Though it was a very trifling Cauſe, the People took fire as if it had been an Affair of the laſt Importance. This gives cauſe to judge that the Inſurrection was fomented by the Emiſſaries of the Earl of Warwick, who did it no doubt to try the Temper of the People. However that be, there were no leſs than 15,000 Men aſſembled, who march'd with one Robert Huldurn at their Head directly to York. But the Marquis of Montague being inform'd of their Deſign, went out Inſurrection in Yorkſhire.

* THIS was Sir John Gray of Grooby, who was kill'd at the Battel of St. Albans; upon which his Widow petition'd the King for certain Lands her Husband had given her in Jointure; when his Majeſty was ſo ſmitten with the Petitioner's Perſon and Behaviour, that he was reſolv'd to have her, and accordingly marry'd her on the Firſt of May, contrary to the Practice of his Anceſtors; it being obſerv'd that he was the firſt of our Kings ſince the Norman Invaſion, that ever marry'd one of his own Subjects.

† THIS was the Daughter of the Lord Scales, and he was created a Lord with that Title.

FOEDERA Tom. XI.

of the City with a few Troops, and attacking them when they leaſt expected it, put them to the Rout, took their Leader, and caus'd his Head to be cut off. It might be preſum'd from hence, either that the Earl of Warwick was not at the bottom of this Inſurrection, or that he had not inform'd his Brother of it. But Montagu's Conduct was ſo unaccountable, that there is no forming any Judgment of it with certainty.

The Rebels are routed by the Marquis of Montague.

WHEN the King heard of the Riſing in Yorkſhire, he was afraid the Conſequence of it would be fatal. The Houſe of Lancaſter's Party, though humbled, was ſtill numerous, and in all Appearance the Inſurrection was owing to another Cauſe than was at firſt imagin'd. But he did not ſuſpect the Earl of Warwick to be the Author of it; and ſuppoſing that it had been rais'd by the Partiſans of Henry VI, he order'd William Herbert Earl of Pembroke to raiſe an Army in Wales, and to hold himſelf ready for a March upon the firſt Command.

The King ſends the Earl of Pembroke to raiſe an Army in Wales.

WHILE the Earl of Pembroke was making the neceſſary Preparations, the Yorkſhire Rebels took Arms again, and inſtead of marching towards York, as they did before, bent their Courſe to London, though the King had no Hand in the pretended Grievance which they complain'd of. As their number increas'd continually the nearer they advanc'd to the Metropolis, the Earl of Pembroke haſten'd to meet them before they grew too ſtrong for him. The Malecontents perceiving at that time they could not continue that Rout without Danger, becauſe they had Information that the King was preparing to march againſt them, and were therefore afraid of being hemm'd in betwixt two Armies, reſolv'd to retreat to Warwick. But the Earl of Pembroke overtaking them juſt by Banbury, they were compell'd to halt, and to come to a cloſe Engagement with him. After a very obſtinate Battel they gain'd the Victory, and having taken the Earl of Pembroke and Sir Richard Herbert his Brother Priſoners, they cut off their Heads, and then continued their March towards Warwick, which they enter'd without Oppoſition.

He marches againſt the Rebels.

The ninth Battel near Banbury, wherein he is defeated, taken Priſoner, and beheaded.

NOT many Days after the Battel of Banbury there was another Inſurrection in Northamptonſhire, where the Populace aſſembling, went and inveſted the Country Seat of the Earl of Rivers the Queen's Father, whom they ſeiz'd when he knew nothing of their Deſign, and led him in Triumph to Northampton, where they cut off his Head.

Inſurrection in Northamptonſhire. Earl of Rivers beheaded by the Populace.

ALL this was enough to make the King believe that the Earl of Warwick was the ſecret Fomenter of theſe Diſturbances. The poor Pretext for the Rebellion in Yorkſhire, the March of the Rebels towards London, their Retreat to a Town belonging to this Earl, and above all things the Execution of the Earl of Rivers, to whom he was a ſworn Enemy, were Reaſons ſufficient to give the King a Suſpicion of this Nobleman, the only Perſon who had Intereſt enough at that time to raiſe Commotions in the Kingdom. Nevertheleſs, he did not ſuſpect him, tho' no doubt that which deceiv'd him was the Conſideration that the Earl of Warwick was then with the Duke of Clarence his Son-in-Law at Calais, of which he was Governour.

The King's Blindneſs with reſpect to the Earl of Warwick and the Duke of Clarence.

AFTER the Battel of Banbury, which was fought in October 1469, to the Spring of the Year 1470, there was a perfect Ceſſation of Arms; for the King wanted time to make the neceſſary Preparations, and the Malecontents had as yet no Perſon of Note at their Head to direct them. It does not appear that the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick return'd to England 'till towards the Month of February 1470. The King was ſo far from the leaſt Suſpicion of 'em, that on the 7th of March he gave them a joint Commiſſion to raiſe Troops againſt the Rebels: but not many Days after, the Duke and the Earl declaring themſelves Heads of the Malecontents, the King could no longer doubt of their Deſign, and then Preparation was made on both ſides for War with all the Vigour poſſible. Edward, for what cauſe I know not, vainly imagined that the Duke and the Earl durſt not ſtand before him, and that their Deſign was to retire to Ireland; whereas nothing was farther from their Thoughts: for, on the contrary, when they heard that the King was marching towards them, they reſolv'd not to ſtir 'till he came.

EDWARD IV.

He gives them a Commiſſion to raiſe Troops, but they head the Malecontents.

THE two Armies being but a ſmall diſtance from one another, both ſides expected that nothing leſs than a Battel would enſue, when ſeveral of the Nobility of both Parties interpoſed to mediate a Peace. This was what Edward wiſh'd for heartily, becauſe he had a vaſt deal to loſe in a Battel, and could be no Gainer by a Victory. The two Heads of the Malecontents were uneaſy to ſee the King much ſtronger than they expected. While a Peace was negotiating, Edward, being made to believe that his Ememies wiſh'd for it even more than he, neglected the Guard of his Camp, as if the Treaty had been actually concluded. The Earl of Warwick being inform'd of this, march'd in the night time, and after a ſudden Attack of the King's Army, entirely routed it, took his Majeſty Priſoner, and ſent him to the Caſtle of Midleham, belonging to the Archbiſhop of York his Brother, whom he intruſted to take care of him.

Earl of Warwick ſurprizes the King's Camp by Night, takes him Priſoner, and ſends him to Midleham.

THIS unexpected Event having, as it was thought, put an end to the War, and the two victorious Lords having now nothing to fear when the King was their Prisoner, disbanded their Troops, and thought of nothing else but how to enjoy their good Fortune. It did not appear that they had a mind to replace Henry VI upon the Throne, because they still left him in Prison.

FOEDERA Tom. XI.

EDWARD IV.

He escapes.

BUT another Accident, as little expected, chang'd the Face of Affairs again. Through the Neglect of the Archbishop of York, Edward found means to get out of Prison, and went to London, where he was very well belov'd, and where the Earl of Warwick had neglected to secure an Interest. Thus both Parties were in the same Situation as at the first beginning of the Troubles, that is to say, they were oblig'd to re-assemble the Troops that were scatter'd up and down the Kingdom; and this was what each Party strove to do without loss of time. The Diligence which Edward shew'd upon this Occasion, was of great Advantage to him. His Army being ready before his Enemies had muster'd theirs, he had time to march towards Stamford, where he attack'd and defeated the Son of the Lord Wells, who had already 10,000 Men on foot, in order to go and join the Earl of Warwick; and having taken him Prisoner, he caus'd him to be beheaded.

The tenth Battel at Stamford.

Duke of Clarence and Earl of Warwick fly to France.

THE Overthrow of young Wells quite dispirited the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick, who had plac'd their chief Dependance on his Reinforcement. As soon as they had Advice of it, they embark'd in order to leave the Kingdom, because of the Danger which threaten'd 'em. Their Design was to retire to Calais, where the Earl of Warwick had left an humble Servant of his, one Vauclair a Native of Gascoign, Commander. But as they were making into the Harbour, they had the Mortification to be repuls'd by Cannon-shot, and were therefore oblig'd to go and land at Diep, from whence they went to the Court of France, which was then at Amboise, and there new Measures were concerted against Edward *; for Lewis XI was oblig'd by Interest to assist the Earl of Warwick, because as he was a sworn Enemy to the Duke of Burgundy, he should find his Advantage in the Ruin of the King his Brother-in-Law.

The Earl's Deputy Governour of Calais won't let them land.

BUT the French King was too cunning to undertake to retrieve the Earl of Warwick's Affairs alone, and to engage in a War which would disconcert his other Projects: therefore he gave him to understand that the best and quickest Method he could take to be reveng'd on Edward, was to be reconcil'd to Queen Margaret; because by that means he would engage all the Friends of the House of Lancaster in his Interest. This was very selfish Advice, in that it tended to kindle a Civil War in England; which would by consequence hinder Edward from assisting the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, with whom Lewis was actually at War. But it is observable, that after the English were drove out of France in the Reign of Charles VII, it was the constant Policy of the Kings of France to keep them employ'd at home. The Earl of Warwick, who saw no other Remedy, consented to the Reconciliation which Lewis propos'd to him. On the other hand, Queen Margaret, who was retir'd with the Prince her Son, to the Court of Rene, her Father was very sensible that nothing but this could revive the Hopes of the House of Lancaster: therefore tho' this Queen and the Earl of Warwick hated one another mortally, yet their Common Interest made their Reconciliation absolutely necessary. Margaret being arriv'd at Amboise, agreed with the Earl, by the Mediation of the King of France, on certain Articles, of which these are the chief, "That the Duke "of Clarence and the Earl of War- "wick should do their utmost to de- "liver Henry VI out of Prison, and to "replace him on the Throne: That du- "ring his Life, and during the Minority "of the Prince of Wales, if he should "happen to be rais'd to the Throne be- "fore he comes of Age, the Duke and "Earl should be Regents of the King- "dom: And lastly, that the Prince of "Wales should marry the youngest "Daughter of the Earl of Warwick." Which last Article was executed on the spot.

Earl of Warwick reconcil'd to Queen Margaret.

Prince of Wales marry'd to the Earl of Warwick's Daughter.

THE Duke of Burgundy, who had good Spies at the French Court, informed Edward of what pass'd there; but the King did not seem to give much heed to it. Mean time, by the Management of a certain Woman, a domestic Servant of the Dutchess of Clarence, who went over to her Mistress, he found a way to win the Duke his Brother, and to gain a Promise from him that he would abandon the Earl of Warwick as soon as ever he had a fair Opportunity. This Promise plung'd him into such a profound State of Security, that he neglected to take the necessary Precautions either for preventing or sustaining the Attack with which he was threatened.

A Gentlewoman sent over to detach the Duke of Clarence from Warwick's Interest.

* PHILIP de Comines says, that M. Vauclair not only fir'd his great Guns at him; but that though the Earl's Daughter, the Dutchess of Clarence, was brought to Bed on board a Ship while they lay at Anchor before the Town, it was with great difficulty that he was prevail'd on to send her two Flaggons of Wine: Which M. de Comines takes notice of as severe Usage of a Master from his Servant. On the other hand he exposes his double dealing, and his Ingratitude to the King of England, who made him Governour of Calais (which was then reckon'd the best Government under the Crown of England, being worth 15,000 Crowns a Year) and to the Duke of Burgundy, who settled a Pension of 1000 Crowns on him; for at the same time that he kept off the Earl of Warwick with his great Guns, he order'd the trusty Messenger who carry'd the Wine to assure him of his Fidelity, and that he would give him a good Account of Calais another time; and to advise him, as the best thing he could do, to land in some other Part of France.

DURING

FOEDERA Tom. XI.

Duke of Burgundy sets out a Fleet.

DURING that time, the Duke of Burgundy, more uneasy than Edward on account of what pass'd in France, caus'd a Fleet to be equipp'd, which lay at the Mouth of the Seine to hinder the Passage of the Earl of Warwick: but this Precaution was fruitless, for the Flemish Ships being shatter'd by a severe Storm, were oblig'd to return into their Harbours to refit. Mean while the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick sail'd with a small number of Troops which Lewis XI had given them, and happily arriv'd at Dartmouth; where, as soon as they landed they publish'd a Manifesto, declaring that they were come to replace Henry IV upon the Throne. This Manifesto had so good an Effect, that in a few Days they were at the Head of 60,000. Then they caus'd Henry to be proclaimed, and an Order to be published in his Name, requiring all his Subjects to take Arms against Edward, who is stiled Traitor, Tyrant, and Usurper.

Duke of Clarence and Earl of Warwick return to England.

Their Manifesto.

EDWARD so little expected this Revolution, that he had neglected to keep up an Army ready at all Events; therefore he was oblig'd to order new Levies, which he appointed to rendezvous near Nottingham a Place far enough from Dartmouth where the Earl of Warwick had landed his Troops. But his Party was very much discouraged by the Progress of that Earl, whose Fame was cry'd up even beyond the Truth. Consequently, perceiving how vastly inferior he was to his Enemy, who made long Marches to come up with him, he resolv'd to retreat to the Northern Counties. But the News which was brought to him of the Marquis of Montague's having declar'd against him, made him march into Lincolnshire, not knowing very well how to get clear of his Enemies, by whom he was in a manner surrounded. At last, while he lay encamp'd on the Sea-side very near Lynn, he heard that the Earl of Warwick was not far off from him, which occasioning certain Murmurings among his Soldiers, who threaten'd to abandon'd him, he resolv'd to embark with a small Retinue on board three little Vessels that had serv'd to carry Provisions to his Camp; and he went off in the very critical Minute, just as his Troops had actually begun to cry, Long live Henry! When he was embark'd, he sail'd with a Design to retire to Holland to his Brother-in-law the Duke of Burgundy. But in his Passage he had like to have fallen into the Hands of some Privateers, which pursued him as far as the Road of Alcmaer, where they only waited for the Tide to attack him. But, happy for him, Lewis of Bruges, Lord of Gruthuse, Governour of Holland, being then at Alcmaer, deliver'd him from that Danger, and conducted him to the Hague, where he honourably defray'd his Charges, in expectation of Orders from the Duke of Burgundy, who was in Flanders. While Edward was escaping by Sea, his Queen being inform'd of it, retir'd to the Sanctuary of Westminster, where in a few Days she was brought to Bed of a Prince who was nam'd Edward.

Edward discourag'd by the Earl of Warwick's Progress, &c. goes beyond Sea.

He had like to be taken by the Privateers.

EDWARD IV.

His Queen takes Sanctuary in Westminster, and is deliver'd of a Prince.

MEAN time the Duke of Clarence and Earl of Warwick meeting with no Opposition went to London, where they were receiv'd in Triumph; and on the same Day, viz. October the 6th, 1470, they releas'd Henry VI from the Tower, and replac'd him on the Throne.

A NEW Parliament meeting on the 20th of November, approv'd the Restoration of Henry, declar'd Edward a Traitor and Usurper, confiscated his Estate, and repeal'd all the Acts made during his Government. Moreover, they settled the Succession of the Crown on the Male Issue of Henry VI, and afterwards on the Person of the Duke of Clarence and his Descendants. This is not a Place to make Reflections on that Act which excluded the Female of the House of Lancaster, and their Descendants, from the Succession, and transferr'd the Crown to the House of York, after the Extinction of Henry's Issue Male. It is sufficient just to remark, that the Parliaments were never free upon this or any other Occasion when the Rights of the two Houses were the Subject of Debate. This Parliament only acted by the Direction of the Earl of Warwick, as is manifest in that they did not make one Order but what had been regulated at Amboise, by the Agreement between the Earl of Warwick and Queen Margaret. Nevertheless by it we see, that even in that time, the Consent of the Parliament was thought necessary for settling the Succession to the Crown.

Parliament settles the Succession.

WHILE Measures were concerting in England, to defeat all King Edward's Hopes of a Restoration, the Duke of Burgundy wish'd him out of his Dominions. And Philip de Comines affirms that the Duke had much rather have heard of his Death than of his Arrival in Holland. Were we to account for the Perplexity which the Duke of Burgundy lay under, we must enter into a Detail of his Affairs, which would carry us too far. It shall suffice therefore, to observe in a few Words, that he was actually at War with Lewis XI, who had attack'd him unawares, and taken several Places from him, and that he fear'd if he openly protected his Brother-in-law the King, he should give an Opportunity to the Earl of Warwick to join with France against him. For this Reason he treated his Host very very coldly, at leaſt in outward Appearance, in order to induce the Earl of Warwick to believe that he only gave him ſhelter without any Deſign to aſſiſt in reſtoring him to the Throne.

EDWARD was not a little vex'd, to ſee the Duke of Burgundy's Policy. His Intereſt demanded that ſome great Blow ſhould be ſtruck, before the Earl of Warwick was well eſtabliſh'd. But this he could not do without the Aſſiſtance of the Duke of Burgundy, who was in no Diſpoſition to give it him. He went about to perſuade him that he was very much out in his Politicks, and that it was his own Intereſt to make a vigorous Effort to replace him on the Throne of England. For this Purpoſe, he made uſe of ſeveral Reaſons, of which it may be ſufficient to mention only the chief; namely, That the Earl of Warwick could never think himſelf ſafe while he was in a Condition to hurt him: That for this Reaſon he would infallibly join with France, and that it was even apparent that the ſaid Alliance was actually concluded, becauſe he had ſent over 6000 Men to Calais: That the Duke had but one Way left to prevent the Effects of ſuch an Union, and that was not to diſſemble the Matter, but to reſtore to the Throne of England a Prince his Friend, who would employ thoſe very Forces for him which were deſign'd to act againſt him. Theſe Reaſons ſhock'd the Duke of Burgundy, yet they were not ſtrong enough to determine him to give publick Aſſiſtance to the King his Brother-in-law, at the Hazard of furniſhing the Earl of Warwick with a fair Pretence to unite with France to his Ruin. Therefore what Aſſiſtance he gave to the depoſed King, he reſolv'd ſhould be ſecret, by which means he thought of no leſs than ſecuring the Friendſhip of both, in relieving Edward without diſobliging the Earl of Warwick. Purſuant to this Reſolution he furniſh'd ſome private Men with Money to fit out four great Veſſels for him in the Year 1471, at la Veere, a free Port in Zealand; and ſecretly engag'd fourteen Privateers to convoy Edward to England *. After this, he ſet out for Flanders, leaving Edward at the Hague. When every thing was ready, and Edward was miſſing, the News was told to the Duke, who put out Orders that none ſhould give him aſſiſtance on pain of Death; but they who were engag'd, very well knew that this Prohibition was not for them.

Edward's Arguments with the Duke to aſſiſt him.

The Duke ſupports him under-hand.

NOTWITHSTANDING Matters were carried on with ſuch Secrecy in Holland, the Earl of Warwick had confus'd Accounts that ſomething was tranſacting in Edward's favour; therefore he order'd his Brother the Marquis of Montague to raiſe an Army in the North. But ſoon after, the Advice which he receiv'd from Holland being more to be depended upon, the Duke of Clarence had Orders from the King to go and raiſe Troops in Wales to oppoſe Edward, in caſe he ſhould attempt to return to England; and the Earl of Warwick got a Commiſſion of the like nature for himſelf. About the ſame time, the Grand Prior of the Order of St. John ſet out to fetch the Queen and the Prince of Wales, who were left in France.

EDWARD IV.

Troops rais'd in Wales and the North of England.

MEAN time, Edward embarking at la Veere with 2000 Men, whom he had privately liſted, ſail'd for England, and landed the 12th of March at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire. He had Difficulties to ſtruggle with at firſt, becauſe as he had brought over but few Troops, his own Friends were afraid to declare for him. Nevertheleſs, he found Means to get into York, where he furniſh'd himſelf with Money, and augmented his Army, while Montague, who was encamp'd at Pontefract, made no Motion to diſturb him.

Edward lands in Yorkſhire.

As ſoon as the Court had Intelligence of Edward's Landing, the Duke of Clarence went and put himſelf at the Head of the Army which he had caus'd to be rais'd in Wales. The Earl of Warwick went alſo and join'd a Body of Troops which he had aſſembled in the Neighbourhood of London, and ſent repeated Orders to the Marquis of Montague to give Edward Battel before he was reinforc'd; but the Marquis never ſtirr'd all this while from his Camp at Pontefract.

Earl of Clarence and Earl of Warwick, &c. head their Forces to oppoſe him.

DURING this, Edward ſet out from York for London, his Troops increaſing all the Way, when the People ſaw him in a better Condition to ſupport his Title. The Earl of Warwick had but a poor Army, becauſe he depended on being join'd by the Duke of Clarence, and did not doubt that Montague was ſtrong enough to ſtop Edward's Progreſs. But, contrary to his Expectation, Montague let him paſs without any Oppoſition, while the Duke of Clarence did not make near ſo much haſte as the Caſe requir'd. Conſequently, the Earl of Warwick, finding himſelf expos'd with the few Troops he had to Edward's Army, which march'd directly againſt him, choſe to intrench himſelf in the Neighbourhood of Coventry, and to ſend expreſs Orders to Montague to come and join him. At the ſame time the Duke of Clarence advanc'd towards him, but ſtill delay'd to join him on one Pretence or another. At

* PHILIP de Comines ſays, he alſo ſent him a private Remittance of 50,000 Florins, with St. Andrew's Croſs.

laſt,

FOEDERA Tom. XI.

laſt, Edward being arriv'd near the Earl's Intrenchments, he made a Feint as if he would attack them; when all on a ſudden the Duke of Clarence caus'd him to be proclaim'd in his Army; after which the two Brothers join'd their Forces, and leaving the Earl of Warwick in his ſtrong Intrenchments, march'd for London, where they were receiv'd in the Month of April, notwithſtanding the Oppoſition of the Duke of Somerſet and the Archbiſhop of York, who perceiving at laſt that all their Efforts were in vain, went to carry the melancholy News to the Earl of Warwick *.

Duke of Clarence proclaims Edward IV in his Army, and marches with him to London.

EDWARD enter'd London on the 11th of April, which was about a Month after he ſet out from la Veere. As ſoon as he was Maſter of the City, he again committed to the Tower the unfortunate Henry VI, whom his pretended Friends had abandon'd, being altogether indifferent as to the Liberty of his Perſon, if they could not keep the Crown upon his Head. Edward had but juſt ſhew'd himſelf to the Citizens of London when he was oblig'd to go and put himſelf again at the Head of his Army. The Earl of Warwick and the Marquis of Montague, who at laſt join'd Forces, had made long Marches in hopes of ſaving London upon the Rumour of their Approach, and of bringing Edward to a Battel before the City ſhould determine to receive him: And though they miſs'd their Aim, they perſiſted in their Reſolution to give Battel, a Victory being the only Remedy they had left. The two Armies met at Barnet, about ten Miles from London, where on the 14th of April, which happen'd to be Eaſter-Sunday, there was a bloody Battel, in which Edward gain'd the Victory, and the Earl of Warwick and the Marquis of Montague loſt their Lives fighting courageouſly. The Earl had acquir'd the Name of King-maker, becauſe he had plac'd Edward IV upon the Throne, and after he had ſo done, reſtor'd Henry VI.

QUEEN Margaret and the Prince her Son arriv'd in Dorſetſhire the very Day before the Battel; and two Days after it, ſhe had the ſad News of the Defeat and Death of the Earl of Warwick: Which Reverſe of Fortune ſo aſtoniſh'd her, that ſhe ſaw no Remedy but to retire to an Aſylum. Not many Days after, the Duke of Somerſet came to her with ſome other Lords that eſcap'd from the Battel, who reviv'd her, by making her believe that having the Prince of Wales at their Head, it would be an eaſy matter for them to reaſſemble the ſcatter'd remains of the Earl of Warwick's Army, and to put her in a Condition to try the Fortune of War once more. This being reſolv'd on, Jaſper Tudor Earl of Pembroke was ſent into Wales to raiſe Troops there, while the Duke of Somerſet and the other Lords of that Party did the ſame elſewhere.

THE Speed with which they rais'd a new Army is aſtoniſhing to think of. But as Edward was already prepar'd, and as he did not give the Queen time to fortify her ſelf more, ſhe reſolv'd to retire to Wales for the ſake of being reinforc'd by the Troops rais'd by the Earl of Pembroke. Her Deſign was to paſs the Severn at Glouceſter; but finding the Gates ſhut, and the Time being too ſhort to beſiege it, ſhe was oblig'd to go up as far as Tewksbury, where Edward, who was cloſe at her Heels, came up with her before ſhe could paſs the River. There it was that on the 9th of May was fought the laſt Battel, which decided the Fate of the Houſe of Lancaſter; for the Queen's Army was routed, and herſelf, together with the Prince of Wales her Son, and the Duke of Somerſet, had the Misfortune to fall into the Hands of the victorious King. The Duke's Head was immediately cut off, the Prince of Wales was murder'd in cold Blood by Edward's Command, and the Queen committed to the Tower of London; and as for Henry VI, he liv'd no longer than Edward's Return, who inhumanly caus'd him to be aſſaſſinated in his Priſon †.

But the learned Dr. Kennet, in a Note upon Habington's Account of this Matter, compar'd with that which is given of it by Philip de Comines, declares, that the latter writes with much more Reaſon than the former when he ſays, That the Citizens were intereſted in his Reſtoration by the Debts he ow'd them, as well as teaz'd by the Importunity of their Wives, with whom this amorous handſome Prince had formerly intrigued: For as to their Conſciences, ſays the Doctor, certainly their firſt Oaths to King Henry juſtified their ſecond.

† MR. Rapin in his other Hiſtory takes notice how fatal French Matches have always been to our Kings; and inſtances in Edward II, Richard II, Henry VI, and Charles I; the only Engliſh Sovereigns that ever marry'd into the Royal Family of France; who all four met with the ſame Fate, and three of them through the Fault of their Wives.

FOEDERA TOM. XI.

Earl of Pembroke goes to France with his Nephew the Earl of Richmond, and are arreſted by the Duke of Bretagne.

THE Earl of Pembroke, who could not be preſent at the Battel of Tewksbury, ſeeing that the whole Party was ruin'd, reſolv'd to retire to France with the young Earl of Richmond his Nephew, the only Remains of ſo many Princes of the Houſe of Lancaſter, who had loſt their Lives either in the Field or on Scaffolds ſince the beginning of the Quarrel: He was Son to Margaret of Somerſet, and to Edmund Tudor Earl of Richmond, the Earl of Pembroke's elder Brother. Theſe two Earls putting to Sea from Wales, were drove by ſtreſs of Weather upon the Coaſts of Bretagne, and oblig'd to put into a Port in that Country, from whence they were carry'd to the Duke of Bretagne, who arreſted them in his Dominions, and aſſign'd them the City of Vannes for their Reſidence.

Edward ſends to the Duke to deliver them up, and grants him a Commiſſion.

THE next Year, viz. 1472, Edward ſent an Ambaſſador to intreat the Duke of Bretagne to deliver up thoſe two Noblemen to him. But the Duke civilly excus'd himſelf, and only gave him his Word that he would ſet ſuch a Watch over them, that it ſhould never be in their Power to hurt him. Upon this Conſideration Edward granted him a Penſion to make him amends for the Expence he had been at for the Maintenance of the two Priſoners, or rather to engage him to have the ſtricter Eye over them.

FROM that Time to the beginning of the Year 1475, where the Eleventh Tome of the Fœdera ends, nothing conſiderable happen'd as to Domeſtick Affairs. Among the Acts in this Tome, which have any Relation to the Facts that we have mention'd, there are many, which though at firſt View they ſeem to be of no great Importance, yet ſerve to fix the Dates of Time, in which the Engliſh Hiſtorians have generally been too often miſtaken. One Inſtance of this we meet with in the firſt Part of the Reign of Edward IV, already treated of, which at the ſame time is a Demonſtration of the Uſefulneſs of Mr. Rymer's Collection, with regard to the Dates both of Time and Place. For Example, the Events which ought to have been put down in 1473, are plac'd by all the Engliſh Hiſtorians in 1474; and they have carry'd the Tranſactions of 1474 into 1475, wherein they are miſtaken a whole Year. John Francis Biondi, who wrote the Hiſtory of the Wars of the two Houſes of York and Lancaſter in Italian, owns, that what the Engliſh carry to the Year 1475, is plac'd by the French in 1474. And that Hiſtorian taking it for granted that the Engliſh were better inform'd than the French, thought fit to Copy after the former, and thereby involv'd himſelf in their Errors, as is very manifeſt from this Collection of our Records. Therefore, though ſome of theſe Acts are of little Conſequence to moſt Readers, yet they may be of Uſe to ſome others, and particularly to ſuch as are now, or ſhall hereafter be employ'd in writing the Hiſtory of England, or the neighbouring Countries. Some of theſe Acts, which will ſerve to give an Idea of the reſt, are as follow:

Earl of Warwick High-Steward of England for the Trial of Henry VI. 1480.

1. A PATENT appointing the Earl of Warwick to officiate as High-Steward of England at the Trial of Henry VI, lately King de Facto, and not de Jure, and

" cauſe he never did any Man an Injury. He was fitter for a Prieſt than a King, and could not be thought " but to die a Martyr, who all his Life liv'd a Confeſſor: By being innocent as a Dove he kept his Crown " upon his Head ſo long, and if he had been as wiſe as a Serpent he had kept it much longer." (Vol. I. of Hiſtory of England in two Volumes Octavo.)

" MR. Rapin, who takes Notice of his natural Imbecillity which diſqualified him for Government, and " of his Submiſſion to thoſe who manag'd Affairs for him, contrary to his Father, whoſe Genius was always " ſuperior to his Miniſters, obſerves, that his Chaſtity, Temperance, extraordinary Devotion, and his Aver- " ſion to Cruelty and Injuſtice might have made him a compleat Prince, if they had been accompany'd with " Royal Virtues; but being unattended, they made him at moſt but a civil Man, and at the ſame time a very " mean Prince. SIR Winſtan Churchill (the Father of our Great Duke of Marlborough) in his Divi Britannici, has the following Remark on this Monarch: " Had it not been that the Virtues of his Mother were ſo well known as " they were, the Virtues of his Father would have render'd this King juſtly ſuſpected not to have been his " Son: But as Philoſophers tell us, that Women often conceive by the ſtrength of their own Inclinations with " a very little help of Man, ſo we may conclude that his Mother begat him of her ſelf; being a Woman ſo " devout, that if ever any one may be ſaid to be the Child of Prayer, he was: And ſhe being the Daughter " of ſo crazy a Prince as Charles VI of France, it is the leſs wonder ſhe ſhould bring forth ſuch a crazy Son " as this Henry VI of England; a Prince of excellent Parts in their kind, though not of kindly Parts for a " Prince, being ſuch as were neither fit for the warlike Age he was born in, nor agreeable to the Glory he was " born to; but ſuch rather as better became a Prieſt than a Prince: So that the Title ſometimes given to his " Father with relation to his Piety might better have been apply'd to the Son with reference to his, that he " was the Prince of Prieſts, with this Difference only betwixt them, that the Religion of the One made him " bold as a Lion, that of the other meek as a Lamb: A Temper neither happy for the Times nor himſelf; " for had he had leſs Phlegm and more Choler, it is probable he had not only been happier whilſt he liv'd, " but more reſpected when dead; whereas now, notwithſtanding all his Indulgence to the Church and " Churchmen, there was none of them ſo grateful as to give him, after he was murder'd, Chriſtian Burial, " but left him to be interr'd without Prieſt or Prayer, Torch or Taper, Maſs or Mourner, with ſo little re- " gard to his Perſon and Pre-eminence, that if his Obſequies were any whit better than what Holy Writ calls " the Burial of an Aſs, yet were they ſuch that his very Competitor Edward IV, who deny'd him the Rights " of Majeſty living, thought him too much wrong'd when dead, and was himſelf at the Charge of building " him a Monument."

" that Henry VI was apprehended or ta" ken at the Battel of Towton, or ſome
" time after in 1461, yet no Hiſtorian ſays
" this; and if he was taken at that time,

BEFORE I leave the Domeſtick Affairs, I will mention two other Acts which are among thoſe in the Years 1461 and 1462.

Pope's Bull creating Walter Bedlow Apoſtolical Notary. 482.

THE firſt is a Bull of Pius II, dated at Rome the 18th of the Calends of February 1461, whereby he confers the Office of Apoſtolical Notary on Walter Bedlow, upon condition of his taking an Oath, the Form of which is inſerted in the Bull, as follows;

The Oath of the Office.

EGO Walterus Bedlow Clericus, non Conjugatus, nec in ſacris Ordinibus Conſtitutus, Lincolnienſis Diœceſis, ab hac hora in antea, fidelis ero Beato Petro & Sanctæ Romanæ Eccleſiæ, ac Domino meo Domino Pio Papæ II, & Succeſſoribus ſuis canonicè intrantibus.

TABELLIONATUS Officium fideliter exercebo, &c.

SIC me Deus adjuvet & hæc Sancta Dei Evangelia.

i. e. " I Walter Bedlow, of the Dio- " ceſe of Lincoln, being not marry'd, " nor in holy Orders, will from this time " forward be true to St. Peter, and the " holy Roman Church, and to my Lord " and Maſter Pope Pius II, and his Succeſſors canonically inducted.

" I WILL not be privy to any Counſel, " Aſſiſtance, Agreement, or Deed, where- " by they may loſe Life or Member, or " be ſurpriz'd or over-reach'd.

" THE Counſel which they ſhall make " known to me either by Letters or Meſſenger, I will not, to their prejudice, " knowingly reveal to any body; but if " any thing happens to come to my " knowledge which has a Tendency to the " Danger or great Prejudice of the Pope " of Rome or the Roman Church, I will " either hinder it if I can, or if I cannot I " will ſincerely take care that it be made " known to my Lord the Pope.

" I WILL help them to defend and " keep, or to recover againſt all Mankind " the Papacy of Rome, the Regalia of " St. Peter, and the Rights of the ſaid " Church (eſpecially ſuch as belong to the " Church in the Town or Country where " I was born.)

A Remark of Henry VIII, on his Subjects who took the Oath to the Pope.

YOU ſee here's no exception of any thing in this Oath, either of the Affairs of State, or of the King, or ſo much as of the Perſon of the King; therefore Henry VIII had reaſon to ſay, that ſuch of his Subjects as had taken the Oath to the Pope, were but half Subjects.

Edward's Charter granted to the Clergy. 493.

THE other Act which I propoſe to treat of is a Charter from Edward IV, granted to the Clergy of England; dated November the 2d 1462 [e].

THE King declares in the firſt place, that the not ſuffering the Clergy to enjoy their Privileges, is the reaſon of the many and great Calamities with which the Nation has been ſo long afflicted. For this reaſon he orders, that for the future no Royal Officer or Magiſtrate ſhall concern themſelves with the Felonies, Rapes, and other Tranſgreſſions of the Clergy: That every Suit commenc'd by the King's Judges againſt any Member whatſoever of the Body of the Clergy ſhall be look'd upon as void; and that in ſuch caſe the Injunctions of Chancery ſhall be of no effect, notwithſtanding the Statute of Præmunire made in the 16th Year of Richard II.

Thus did the Kings of England for their own private Intereſts, and in a very little time, render of no effect thoſe wiſe Precautions which were taken by the Parliaments to hinder the exceſſive Increaſe of the Power of the Clergy. But this is not the only Act in which we find the Clauſe, Notwithſtanding the Statute of Præmunire; this Collection of Records abounding with many more ſuch.

IV. Edward the Fourth's Affairs with Scotland.

JAMES III, King of Scotland, being very young when Edward aſcended the Throne of England, the Regents of Scotland gave Queen Margaret an Aſylum after the Battel of Towton; and then concluded a Marriage betwixt one of their King's Siſters and the Prince of Wales, Son to Henry VI. On the other hand, the Queen deliver'd the Town of Berwick to them. But at laſt, the Regents ſeeing Edward well fix'd upon the Throne, abandon'd Henry VI, and made a Truce with Edward IV, which was prolong'd time after time 'till the Year 1519.

Prince of Wales marry'd to the King of Scotland's Siſter. Berwick deliver'd up to the Scots.

Their Truce with Edward IV.

In the Interval betwixt the Battel of Towton and the firſt of thoſe Truces, Edward finding that the Scots had declar'd openly againſt him, and that they refus'd a Truce which he had caus'd to be offer'd to, or rather to be demanded of them, endeavour'd to give them ſo much Diverſion at home as might hinder them from relieving Henry VI. For this end he employ'd the Earl of Douglas, who having been baniſh'd Scotland, was fled for Refuge to England. Douglas engag'd the Earl of Roſs and his Family ſo far in Edward's Intereſt, that he promis'd to ſerve him againſt the King of Scotland his Sovereign. This is the Subject of a great number of Acts which are in this Tome. There's no Hiſtorian that I know of who has made mention of theſe ſecret Negotiations between Edward the Fourth and the Earl of Roſs, which in the main are of no great Importance, becauſe they came to nothing, more perhaps than the procuring that Truce which Edward wiſh'd for. Buchanan indeed ſays ſomething of this Earl of Roſs in the Reign of James II, but ſeems to have been ignorant of the Engagements which that Lord enter'd into with Edward in the beginning of the Reign of James III.

Earl of Douglas employ'd to engage the Earl of Roſs, &c. in the Intereſt of Edward IV.

Edward IV.

In 1474, Edward concluded a Marriage betwixt his ſecond Daughter Cæcilia and James Prince of Scotland, Son to James III, and paid down the Portion beforehand, though the Marriage could not be conſummated a great while, becauſe they were both ſo young. This occaſion'd a War betwixt the two Kingdoms, of which hereafter.

The Acts relating to Scotland are,

1. A Power to James Earl of Douglas to treat in the King's Name with John Earl of Roſs, and with Donald Ballagh; dated June the 22d, 1461 [f]. Powers to treat with the Earl of Roſs. 474.

2. A Power to the Earl of Warwick to conclude a Truce with Scotland; dated Auguſt the 2d, 1461 [g]. Truce with Scotland. 475.

"It is obſervable from hence, that "while Edward caus'd a Truce to be "negotiated with the King of Scotland, "he engag'd the Earls of Douglas and "Roſs to take Arms againſt that Prince. "The Fœdera abounds with ſuch In"ſtances of the Jealouſy the Kings of "England entertain'd of Scotland."

3. A Treaty betwixt King Edward and John of the Iſles Earl of Roſs, Donald Ballagh, and John of the Iſles Donald's Son; dated at London February the 13th, 1462, and ratify'd the 17th of March following. Edward's Treaty with the Lords of the Iſlands. 484.

"By this Treaty Edward was to un"dertake the Conqueſt of Scotland with "the Aſſiſtance of the Earl of Roſs; "for which end the King granted a Pen"ſion of 100 Marks Sterling to the ſaid "Earl, one of 20 l. to his Brother Do"nald, and one of 10 l. to Donald's Son "John, which Penſions were in time of "War to be doubled."

4. An Order to pay to the Earl of Douglas the Arrears of a Penſion of 500 l. Sterling, from Michaelmaſs, 1461, which Penſion had been ſettled on him by a Patent on the 14th of February, 1461. The Order is dated February the 18th, 1462 [h]. Order for payment of the Earl of Douglas's Penſion. 487.

5. EDWARD's Engagement, that in caſe the Earl of Douglas ſhould carry the War into Scotland, all the Scots of his Party ſhould be included in the Treaty made with him; dated October the 19th, 1462 [i]. For including the Earl of Douglas's Aſſociates in the Treaty. 492.

6. A Commission to receive the Oath and Homage of the Earl of Roſs; dated March the 20th, 1463 [k]. For receiving the Earl of Roſs's Oath. 499.

V. Edward the Fourth's Affairs with France.

Lewis XI his two grand Projects.

LEWIS XI had not been many Months upon the Throne of France before Edward IV came to the Crown of England. They who know any thing of the Hiſtory of France, know that Lewis form'd two great Projects which took up almoſt his whole Reign. The firſt was to oblige the Duke of Burgundy to perform Liege Homage to him, and to depend on no other but him, which by the way was only a Pretence perhaps to deprive him of his Dutchy. The ſecond was to pull down the too great Power of the Duke of Burgundy, who was ſtill formidable to France, tho' he had contributed to her Preſervation, by declaring for her at a time when, if it had not been for him, ſhe muſt have been ruin'd. Lewis had a mind to begin with the Duke of Bretagne, by which Means in 1465, he drew upon himſelf the War for the Publick Good, well known by that Name in Hiſtory *, which was follow'd by ſeveral others. The Count de Charolois, Son to the Duke of Burgundy, imagining that the Ruin of the Duke of Bretagne would be ſoon follow'd with that of his Family, was of Opinion that both the Duke his Father, and himſelf, were bound in Intereſt to ſupport the Duke of Bretagne with all their Power. This bred ſuch a perſonal Hatred betwixt him and the King of France, as made them both lay hold of every Opportunity to thwart one another, not only during the Life of Duke Philip, but after the Count his Son ſucceeded him.

The War call'd, For the Publick Good.

Lewis XI reſolv'd to ruin the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne.

THE Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne being thus united by Common Intereſt, had recourſe to two Methods above all others, to oppoſe the Deſigns of Lewis XI. The firſt was to take off the Duke of Berry his Brother from his Allegiance, and to make uſe of him to embroil him. The ſecond was to ſecure Edward IV in their Intereſts. As the firſt of theſe two Methods only belongs to the Hiſtory of France, it is not neceſſary to treat of it here. As to the ſecond, it muſt be obſerv'd, that when Edward came to the Throne, England was actually at War with France and Bretagne, there having been no Treaty of Peace or Truce betwixt thoſe Powers ſince the Engliſh were vanquiſh'd by Charles VII. Nevertheleſs, though they were at Liberty to commit Hoſtilities, there was a kind of tacit Suſpenſion of Arms betwixt them, which amounted to the ſame as a Truce. Lewis XI and the Duke of Bretagne were not fond of renewing the War againſt England; and it was not England's Intereſt to take up the Cudgels again, in the Infancy of a Reign ſo much diſturb'd as his was. And as to the Duke of Bretagne, the Truce he had made with the Engliſh was ſtill ſubſiſting.

CONSIDERING the Deſign which Lewis XI had form'd to ruin the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, no wonder that he endeavour'd to ſecure the King of England in his Intereſt, or at leaſt to hinder him by a Truce, or ſome other Means, from giving Aſſiſtance to the Men he was reſolv'd to humble; and much leſs is it to be wonder'd at, that thoſe two Princes courted the Friendſhip and Protection of Edward. This Monarch gave Ear alike to both Parties, and kept them both in Hopes, being always ready to make Truces with either the one or the other, but without declaring for either; and thus he play'd off both 'till the Death of Philip Duke of Burgundy, which happen'd in 1467.

The French King and the two Dukes court the Friendſhip of Edward IV.

AFTER the Death of that Prince, Charles his Son and Succeſſor being reſolv'd at any rate to purchaſe Edward's Friendſhip, concluded, and at length conſummated his Marriage with Edward's Siſter, Margaret of York, which had been in Treaty before Philip's Death. From that time Edward manifeſtly inclin'd to favour the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, and even engag'd himſelf to give Aſſiſtance to the latter, who was very hard preſs'd by the King of France. But this Engagement came to nothing, by reaſon of a Peace which was concluded betwixt Lewis and the Duke.

Duke of Burgundy's Marriage with Edward's Siſter.

Edward openly favours the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne.

THIS Proceeding of Edward, and his ſtrict Alliance with the Duke of Burgundy, convinc'd Lewis XI that it would be very difficult for him to ſucceed in his Deſigns while Edward was upon the Throne of England. And no doubt it was this Conſideration which determin'd him to procure the Reconciliation betwixt the Earl of Warwick and Queen Margaret, and to give them Aſſiſtance for reſtoring Henry VI.

Lewis XI favours the Reſtoration of Henry VI.

THIS Undertaking having ſucceeded according to his Wiſhes, and Henry VI being replac'd on the Throne, Lewis deſir'd to make a Peace and a ſtrict Alliance with England: But a Peace being in a manner impracticable, becauſe of the King of England's Pretenſions to the Crown of France, a long Truce was reſolv'd on which might anſwer the ſame end as a Treaty of Peace. And now Lewis made no doubt that he ſhould be able to accompliſh his Deſigns againſt the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, when England was to lie ſtill and let him do what he pleas'd.

Truce betwixt England and France.

BUT Edward's Reſtoration broke his Meaſures; and then he was oblig'd again to flatter Edward that he might not fall in with his Enemies. Edward at firſt ſeem'd very complaiſant, but 'twas only 'till he had an Opportunity of taking Revenge, which happen'd accordingly in 1474.

Lewis XI's Meaſures broke by Edward's Reſtoration.

THE Duke of Burgundy having engag'd to carry the War into Germany, on pretence of ſome Difference relating to the Archbiſhoprick of Cologn, went and beſieg'd Nuits, before which Place he lay ten Months. During this Siege, Lewis XI, who was concern'd to oppoſe the Duke's Aggrandiſement, ſtirr'd up ſo many Enemies againſt him, that to be reveng'd for it, the Duke made a Propoſal to Edward to undertake the Conqueſt of France, promiſing to aſſiſt him with all his Forces. Edward fell in with this Project, and made ſeveral Treaties with the Duke, which related to the War that they were to carry on in conjunction; the Succeſs of which we ſhall take notice of in our Account of Mr. Rymer's next Tome.

EDWARD IV.

Duke of Burgundy beſieges Nuits.

His Treaties with Edward for a War with France.

THE Acts relating to France, with which we ſhall conclude this Tome, are,

1. A COMMISSION from Edward to get Satisfaction for the Violation of the Truce with the Duke of Burgundy; dated November the 12th, 1461 [t].

Complaint againſt the violation of the Truce with Duke of Burgundy. 478.

2. A FULL Power to certain Perſons to conclude a Truce with the Duke of Burgundy; dated October the 24th, 1462 [u].

Treaty of Commerce with the Netherlands. 497.

" It muſt be obſerv'd, that England " and the Netherlands having ſuch a " Trade with each other that they could " not well diſcontinue it, without remark- " able Prejudice to the Subjects of both; " the Affairs relating to Commerce were " always treated of by themſelves, what- " ever might be the Differences between " the two Countries in other Reſpects, " inſomuch, that even Truces for Traf- " fick, and Treaties of Commerce were " often made in Times of the hotteſt " War. This Maxim was infinitely bet- " ter than what has been follow'd ſince, " of making a Prey of the Merchants, " which proves to their Ruin, while the " States concern'd never mind to ſtop the " War upon that account, as was the " Caſe in the War which was concluded " in 1712, by the Treaty of Utrecht."

The Trade betwixt England and the Netherlands.

4. A COMMISSION to the Ambaſſadors nominated for a Diet or Congreſs to be held at St. Omer, between Lewis XI, Edward IV, and the Duke of Burgundy; dated July the 4th, 1463.

6. A SAFE Conduct for John Lord de Lanoy, Envoy of France, at the Request of the Duke of Burgundy; dated December the 10th, 1463 [y].

"THIS Lanoy was sent over to Eng- "land to persuade Edward to come into "the Treaty above-mention'd."

Power to the Earl of Warwick to conclude a Treaty. 518.

Congress at St. Omer put off. 520.

8. A PROLONGATION of the Term fix'd for the Congress to be held at St. Omer on the 21st of April, 1464, to the first of July following [a].

LEWIS XI having discover'd his Designs against the Duke of Bretagne too early, by causing an Army to file off to Anjou; and having try'd to seize the Count de Charolois at the Hague, through the Means of the Bastard de Rubempre, Edward knew that Lewis the Eleventh's Aim was only to prevent him from supporting the Duke of Bretagne; and for this very reason the Congress at St. Omer was deferr'd, and at last broke off, the Duke of Burgundy not thinking it proper to suffer the Duke of Bretagne to be oppress'd.

Powers to treat with the Duke of Bretagne. 531.

9. A POWER to the Earl of Worcester to treat with the Duke of Bretagne; dated August the 12th, 1464 [b].

10. ANOTHER of the like Nature to William Hatcliff, Secretary of State; dated [c] September the 1st, 1464.

And Duke of Burgundy. 536.

11. ANOTHER for negotiating a Truce with the Duke of Burgundy; dated October the 20th, 1464 [d].

Truce with the Duke of Bretagne. 536.

12. A Truce concluded with the Duke of Bretagne to last for one Year, from the 1st of October; dated November the 1st, 1464.

"As it was in this very Year that "Lewis XI press'd the Duke of Bre- "tagne, so it was about the same time "that the Duke of Bretagne and Bur- "gundy endeavour'd to bring Edward "into their Interests.

"THE Duke of Bretagne took the "Opportunity of Lewis the Eleventh's "Delay to corrupt his Brother the Duke "of Berry, and to raise the War of the "Publick Good upon him, which broke "out in 1465. During this Year, the "Duke of Bretagne, the Duke of Bur- "gundy, and the Count de Charolois did "what they could to bring Edward in- "to their Alliance; and on the other "hand, Lewis XI did every thing that "was in his Power to hinder it. This is "very evident from the Acts of that "Year, where we find diverse Safe-Con- "ducts for the Ambassadors of those three "Princes, and several Commissions to "treat with them. But nothing was con- "cluded, because Edward had no De- "sign to engage in a War. These three "Princes had put themselves out of a "Capacity to give Succours to Queen "Margaret, and that was enough for "him."

13. A COMMISSION to the Earl of Warwick to treat of a Marriage between Margaret the King's Sister and the Count de Charolois; dated March the 22d, 1466 [e]. Marriage of the King's Sister to the Count de Charolois. 564.

14. ANOTHER of the same Date, to treat with France of a Peace, Truce, and all Differences betwixt the two Kings. A Treaty with France. 565.

15. A POWER to certain Persons to conclude a Peace with the Duke of Burgundy; dated as above. With the Duke of Burgundy. 566.

16. A TREATY of Truce with Bretagne for one Year, to commence on the 10th of July, 1466, dated April the 30th [f]. Truce with Bretagne. 567.

17. THE Ratification of a Treaty of Truce concluded with France, from the 15th of June to the 1st of March, 1467, dated June the 7th, 1466 [*]. With France. 568.

18. A SAFE-Conduct for Lewis of Bruges, Lord of Gruthuse, Ambassador from the Duke of Burgundy; dated October the 30th, 1466 [g]. Safe-Conduct for the Ambassadors of Burgundy and Bretagne. 574.

19. ANOTHER for the Ambassadors of Bretagne; dated [h] November the 18th, 1466.

"BY all the Acts of 1467 it is appa- "rent, that Edward negotiated with "both Parties at one and the same time, "but that he was held only by short "Truces, that he might be at liberty of "joining with that Party which was most "for his Advantage; for it was not 'till "the Year following that he began visi- "bly to favour the Dukes of Burgundy "and Bretagne."

20. A COMMISSION to treat with the Duke of Burgundy for a Confederacy; dated January the 9th, 1467 [i]. A Treaty with the Duke of Burgundy. 576.

"The said Confederacy was concluded, "but the Duke of Burgundy died before "it was ratify'd."

Account of the XIIth Volume of the Fœdera.

THE Acts of the laſt part of Edward the Fourth's Reign are contain'd in the Twelfth Tome of Mr. Rymer's Fœdera, which alſo takes in thoſe of Edward V, Richard III, and Henry VII, as far as the Year 1502 *.

As every one of theſe four Reigns contains certain Matters peculiar to each, and independent altogether upon the Reigns before and after it, there's an abſolute neceſſity for giving an Account of this Tome in diſtinct Articles, the better to diſtinguiſh the Relation which the Acts that are printed in it bear to the Events of each Reign. I ſhall therefore confine my ſelf for the preſent to the laſt eight Years of Edward IV, where we find the principal Subjects are the Affairs which this Prince had with France and Scotland: To which I ſhall add a third Article of Affairs Domeſtic, rather to preſerve the Thread of the Hiſtory, than from any Neceſſity with regard to the Volume, which in theſe eight Years contains nothing that is Domeſtic of very great Importance. EDWARD IV.

Edward's Motives for a War with France.

IN the Account of the laſt Tome, Notice was taken of the Treaties which were made by Edward IV, and Charles Duke of Burgundy, to make War upon Lewis XI, which was not a common War, or a War from Motives that were trifling. Edward ſeem'd to have it in his View to revive the Pretenſions of the Kings of England to the Kingdom of France, and to conquer by the Sword what had by the Sword been taken from his Predeceſſor. At leaſt he hop'd before the end of the War to be poſſeſs'd of Guyenne and Normandy, the ancient Patrimony of his Anceſtors, provided that the Duke of Burgundy, who was as much concern'd as himſelf, did but aſſiſt him with all his Power, as he thought he had reaſon to expect. Beſides, the Conſtable de St. Pol, a powerful Lord in France, and a great Enemy to Lewis, had given his Word that he would deliver up St. Quintin to the Engliſh, and thereby open a Door for them to penetrate as far as Paris. On the other hand, the Duke of Bretagne, who had juſt been forc'd to ſign a diſadvantageous Peace with Lewis XI, was privately en-ter'd into Edward's League with the Duke of Burgundy, and promis'd to make a powerful Diverſion, provided the King of England would but ſend him Succours. Therefore Lewis XI ſaw himſelf ready to be attack'd by three formidable Enemies, excluſive of his Apprehenſions from his own Subjects, who were not over and above pleaſs'd with his Government.

His Preparations and Departure for France.

DURING the whole Winter of 1475, Edward was extraordinary diligent in his Preparations, that he might take the Field betimes; but he could not ſet out 'till the 20th of June, after he had detach'd 3000 Men of his Army with a Deſign to ſend them into Bretagne. If the French Hiſtorians were to be credited, never any King of England carry'd ſo powerful an Army into France; but they are vaſtly miſtaken in their Calculation. Edward III was there at the Head of 100,000 Men; but it does not appear that Edward the Fourth's Army came up near to that number, for he had but 1500 Spearmen and 15,000 Archers on Horſeback, beſides the Foot; the number of which not being mention'd by the Engliſh Hiſtorians, it may be preſum'd it was not very great. Beſides, the principal Strength of Armies conſiſted at that time in the Cavalry.

He ſends an Herald to the French King to declare War.

As ſoon as Edward was arriv'd at Calais, he ſent a Herald to declare War againſt the King of France.

Lewis's Anſwer,

Lewis return'd a very mild Anſwer, and bid the Herald tell his Maſter, that the Duke of Burgundy and the Conſtable de St. Pol would infallibly deceive him. But before he diſmiſs'd the Herald, he ask'd him a great many Queſtions; and the Herald in his Anſwers took occaſion to tell him, either of his own Head, or from ſome private Inſtruction, that if he had any Propoſal of Peace to make, he muſt apply to the Lords Howard and Stanley, who had both great Intereſt with the King. Lewis, who was a Man of very great Penetration, ſuſpected that the Herald did not ſay this without a Meaning. In the interim, to let the Engliſh Lords ſee how liberal he was, he order'd the Herald who came to declare War againſt him a Preſent of 300 Crowns for his Pocket, and 30 Ells of Velvet to make him a Gown.

and his Preſent to the Herald.

Edward's Diſappointment by the Duke of Burgundy.

EDWARD expected the Duke of Burgundy would come at the Head of an Army to join him; but tho' in confidence thereof he was already on the March, he heard no News of him, which oblig'd him at laſt to ſend an Expreſs to him to know the cauſe of his Delay. The Duke was ſtill employ'd in the Electorate of Cologn, at the Siege of Nuitz, which he undertook in hopes of making himſelf Maſter of that Place time enough to join the Engliſh. But the length of the Siege, which held ten Months, and his own Obſtinacy, broke all his Meaſures; for while he was untimely bent on an Affair of ſo little conſequence, he ſuffer'd very great Loſſes elſewhere: The Duke of Auſtria took the County of Ferrette from him: The Duke of Lorrain ravag'd Luxemburg, and Lewis XI ſeiz'd Roye and Mondidier. At laſt, when he was juſt on the point of being Maſter of Nuitz, he was ſo preſs'd by Edward's Importunity, that he conſented the Place ſhould be depoſited in the Hands of one of the Pope's Legates. But his Army was in ſo poor a Condition to begin a freſh Campaign, that he was oblig'd to put it into Quarters of Refreſhment; after which he went to find out Edward, in order to make an Apology for his Backwardneſs.

EDWARD IV.

Duke of Burgundy's Loſſes.

THE King of England was ſurpriz'd to the laſt degree to ſee the Duke come without his Army. From that Moment he began to ſuſpect, that inſtead of helping him to conquer France, the Duke's View was only to make uſe of him to give Lewis a Diverſion. He was confirm'd in this Suſpicion by the great Precautions which were taken at Peronne, a Town belonging to the Duke, to hinder the Engliſh from entering it too many at once. And laſtly, that which compleated his Suſpicion that he was trick'd, was the Duke of Burgundy's carrying him to St. Quintin, where when he expected the Conſtable would ſet open the Gates, he was cannonaded. It is very probable that the Duke himſelf was deceiv'd by the Conſtable, otherwiſe he would not have carry'd the King to St. Quintin, on purpoſe to receive an Affront. Mean time, perceiving that Edward was not ſatisfied with his Excuſes, and that he treated him with bitter Reproaches, he left him on Pretence of going to bring up his Army.

Edward ſenſible of being deluded by his Allies in France.

EDWARD was very much perplex'd what to do. The Duke of Burgundy and the Conſtable had broke their Faith to him. The Duke of Bretagne never ſtirr'd, and France was perfectly quiet, though he had been made to believe that at his Approach ſeveral Provinces would revolt. Theſe Conſiderations oblig'd him to think that the only Remedy he had to recover himſelf was to make Peace with France. The grand Difficulty in the way was, how to order it ſo that Lewis ſhould make the firſt Overtures; for it would have been very ſcandalous for Edward, who had croſs'd the Sea with a Deſign to conquer France, to ſue for a Peace before he had drawn his Sword. To obtain his End, he gave Orders for the releaſe of the only French Priſoner that had been taken ſince the War was declar'd. This Priſoner going to thank the King, was mightily careſs'd at Court, and charg'd by the Lords Howard and Stanley to preſent their moſt humble Reſpects to the King his Master. Lewis comparing this extraordinary Compliment with what the Herald had told him, inferr'd from thence that the Court of England was desirous of Peace. Lewis being not so nice as Edward in this sort of Punctilios of Honour, and his Affairs moreover not permitting him to be too scrupulous upon this Head, he immediately sent a Herald to the English Army, and order'd him to address himself to the Lords Howard and Stanley, thinking perhaps to prepossess those Noblemen in his Favour. He had Orders likewise to speak to the King of England, and to excuse the King his Master on account of the Assistance which he had given to the Earl of Warwick; to represent to him the Advantages which would redound to their Subjects from a strict Union betwixt them, the little Probability there was of his ever being able to conquer a Kingdom where he had no Places, nor Friends; and finally, how little he ought to depend upon the Promises of the Duke of Burgundy and the Constable, of whose Insincerity he could not but be already convinc'd: That in the mean time as the King his Master was desirous to live in good Terms with him, he offer'd to make him amends for the Expence which he had been at, in such a Way as should content him: Lastly, that if this Proposal was agreeable to him, the King of France desir'd him to send him a Safe-Conduct for the Ambassadors, that they might meet in some proper Place, there to treat of a Peace. The French Herald was sent back the same Day with a fine Present, and the Passport he desir'd. Next Day the King held a great Council in the Army, wherein it was resolv'd to make a Truce with France on certain Conditions; and the Lord Howard with two others were chose to go and hold a Conference with the French Ambassadors betwixt Peronne and Amiens. Their Instructions were given them in writing, sign'd by the King and twenty-two Lords, so that they had not Power either to add or diminish, and the King of France had nothing to do but to accept the Terms, as offer'd by Edward, or else refuse them.

Lewis sends a Herald to him with an Overture of Peace.

Truce with France resolv'd in Council, and concluded on Edward's own Terms.

THE Treaty was concluded on the 29th of August, on the Terms that Edward had propos'd it, without any Alteration; we shall see the Tenour of it hereafter. It was dispos'd into several Acts according to the nature of the Articles agreed on. The Duke of Burgundy being advertis'd that a Peace was on foot, made all haste to Edward's Camp to endeavour to ward off the Blow: But he came too late, the Truce was sign'd; and he found the King of England so far from a Disposition to break it, that he told him he thought he had done him very great Service by including him in it.

SOME Days after this, the two Kings had a Conference together upon a Bridge built on purpose very near Pequigny, where they swore to observe the Treaty. This has given reason to some Historians to call it the Treaty of Pequigny; but in the publick Acts it is always call'd the Treaty of Amiens. Lewis took this Opportunity to urge Edward to abandon the Duke of Burgundy, the Constable, and the Duke of Bretagne. Edward told him, that as to the first, he being included in the Truce, was at his Liberty to accept or refuse it; and if he refus'd it, he should not think himself oblig'd to stand by him; that as to the Constable, he had nothing to do with his Affairs; but as to the Duke of Bretagne, he declar'd in plain Terms, that if he was attack'd he would assist him with all his Forces. It must be observ'd, that the Duke of Bretagne had a Pledge in his Hand, which made him secure of Edward's Protection, viz. the Earl of Richmond, the only Sprig of the House of Lancaster, who, if he had been let go, was capable of giving the King very great Uneasiness.

Conference betwixt the two Kings.

THE King of France was very well pleas'd that he had been able thus to send the English home to their own Island. But being still afraid lest the Duke of Burgundy should engage Edward to break the Truce and come back again, he made use of a Method to keep him in a good Humour, which was familiar to him, and which he had often practis'd with Success, viz. to bribe the chief Persons of the English Court with good Pensions. Philip de Comines says, that these Pensions amounted to 16,000 Crowns, and he names the very Persons that receiv'd them. Before the English Army march'd homewards, Lewis sent them a Present of 300 Waggon Loads of Wine. This gave occasion to the French Historians to publish that he needed no other Method to send the English home to their own Country. But we shall see anon that Lewis did not get rid of them upon such easy Terms.

BEFORE we pursue the Abridgment of the History of that Time, it is absolutely necessary to insert here the Substance of the Acts in this Tome of the Fœdera which relate to it, otherwise it would be difficult to comprehend the Sequel.

3. INSTRUCTIONS given to the Lord Howard and two other Ambaſſadors going to confer with the Plenipotentiaries of France; dated in the Field of Seyntre in Vermandois near Peronne, Auguſt the 13th, 1475.

THESE Inſtructions contain'd the Conditions upon which Edward was willing to return to England, viz.

Edward's Propoſals for retiring from France. Ibid.

THAT Lewis ſhould engage to pay him 75,000 Crowns ready Money, and to give him 50,000 Crowns every Year at two Terms during the Life of the two Kings. That Charles the Dauphin of France ſhould marry Elizabeth, Edward's eldeſt Daughter, on whom Lewis ſhould make a Settlement of 60,000 Livres per Annum. That Lewis ſhould conduct the Princeſs to France at his own Expence; and that if Elizabeth died before the Conſummation of the Marriage, Charles ſhould marry Edward's ſecond Daughter Mary.

ON the Performance of theſe Conditions, Edward engag'd to depart the Territories of France immediately after the Receipt of 75,000 Crowns, to conſent to a Truce of ſeven Years, and to a Treaty of Friendſhip with Lewis XI, under a mutual Bond to aſſiſt one another againſt their rebellious or diſobedient Subjects.

He conſents to refer Differences with France to Arbitration. 15.

4. EDWARD's Letters Patent, by which he conſents that the Differences which remain undecided betwixt him and the King of France, be referr'd to the Arbitration of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Duke of Clarence for England, and of the Archbiſhop of Lyons and the Earl of Dunois for France, allowing them three Years time; dated Auguſt the 29th, 1475 [o].

6. A TREATY of Friendſhip and Confederacy between Lewis XI and Edward IV, during their Lives, and for the Marriage of Charles the Dauphin, Lewis's Son, with Elizabeth, Edward's Daughter; dated as above.

THE Subſtance of the Articles was,

1. THAT there ſhould be a perfect Friendſhip betwixt the two Kings during their Lives.

2. THAT they ſhould mutually aſſiſt one another in caſe of the Rebellion or Diſobedience of their Subjects.

3. THAT neither of the two Kings ſhould give Aid or Refuge to the rebellious Subjects of the other.

4. THAT in caſe any one of the two Kings ſhould happen to be expell'd his Dominions, the other ſhould aſſiſt him with all his Power, in order to reſtore him by making open War againſt his Enemies.

5. THAT neither of the two Kings make any League or Aſſociation with the Allies of the other, without having firſt acquainted him of it.

6. THAT within a Year they ſhould appoint Commiſſioners to regulate the Currency and Value of the Coin of both Kingdoms for the Eaſe of Commerce betwixt their Subjects.

7. THAT for the better cementing the Friendſhip betwixt the two Kings, Charles the Dauphin, Son to Lewis XI, ſhould marry Elizabeth, Edward's eldeſt Daughter, when they are at a fit Age for Matrimony; and that the King of France ſhould ſettle on the Princeſs for her Dowry 60,000 Livres per Annum, and bring her over to France at his own Expence; and that if Elizabeth ſhould happen to die before the Conſummation of the Marriage, Charles ſhould then marry Edward's ſecond Daughter Mary.

Remarks on it.

Two Things are to be obſerv'd in this Treaty: The firſt, that it was contrary to the preceding Treaty, inaſmuch as the Truce being to continue but ſeven Years, the two Kings might renew the War at the end of the ſaid Term; whereas by this ſecond Treaty they were to be Friends, and to aſſiſt each other mutually as long as they liv'd. Therefore this Error was corrected afterwards by extending the Truce to the Death of either of the two Kings.

THE ſecond Thing obſervable in it is, that Edward gave no Portion with his Daughter.

Lewis's Contract for the Payment of Money to Edward. p. 20.

7. LETTERS Patent of Lewis XI, whereby he engages to pay King Edward every Year, as long as they both liv'd, the Sum of 50,000 Crowns at two Terms, viz. Eaſter and Michaelmaſs, and to pay him the Money in London. Moreover, he engages himself to oblige the Bank of Medicis to the Payment of those Sums; dated August the 29th, 1475 [9].

His Contract to ransom Queen Margaret.

THERE was another Treaty or particular Convention besides this, which we don't meet with in the Fœdera, whereby Lewis XI engag'd himself to pay 50,000 Crowns for the Ransom of Queen Margaret, Wife to Henry VI, who was Prisoner in the Tower after the Battel of Tewkshury.

More Remarks on the Treaty of Amiens.

NOW it is easy to judge by all these Conventions, which are call'd the Treaty of Amiens or Pequigny, whether the French Historians had so much reason to banter Edward's Return from France; and whether it is true that he was sent back to his Island with several Cart-loads of Wine. Lewis XI paid him 75,000 Crowns in hand, and 25,000 a Month after, for the first Term, which expir'd at Michaelmass. The publick Acts testify by the Acquittances therein contain'd, that the annual Pension of 50,000 Crowns was paid even to Easter Term in 1482. If to this we add the 50,000 Crowns for the Ransom of Queen Margaret, and the Pensions of 16,000 Crowns which were paid to the English Noblemen, and which probably were continued as long as the Pension to Edward, it will appear that Lewis XI actually and really disburs'd near 600,000 Crowns, that he engag'd himself to pay a sort of Tribute, and to take a Wife for the Dauphin his Son without any Portion, in order to send back a Prince to his Island, who had not conquer'd a single Town in France. This shews that he had another-guess Notion of King Edward than the French Historians give out. Philip de Comines affirms, that Lewis desir'd nothing more passionately than to see the English Backs turn'd in their way home. Therefore Edward, who had won several Battels, was not a Prince to be despis'd.

A Dissertation upon the nature of Lewis's Pension to Edward.

BEFORE we quit this Subject, it may be necessary to add one Word more relating to the Pension of 50,000 Crowns promis'd and paid by Lewis XI to Edward IV. We have just now seen that in Lewis's Obligation, it is not said under what Title, for what Cause, or from what Motive he engag'd himself to pay the said annual Pension to the King of England. Notwithstanding this Silence, the English Historians have made no scruple to call this Pension by the name of a Tribute; and Mr. Rymer himself, though he had the original Act in his Hand, has intituled all the Acts relating to this Pension, De Annuo Censu, i. e. Of the yearly Tribute.

ON the other hand, the French Historians not knowing how to shift off this annual Pension, have turn'd and winded it several ways, in order to elude it. Some of them have chose to say nothing of it. Du Tillet in the Collection which he gives out of the Archives of France, with respect to the Treaties between France and England, says, that the Treaty of Amiens lies in such a Drawer, but does not mention one Word about the Pension.

PHILIP de Comines says, that in the Conference betwixt the Plenipotentiaries of the two Kings, the English at first demanded, according to their Custom, the whole Kingdom of France, or at least Normandy and Guyenne; which, says he, was stifly urg'd on the one side, and as stifly refus'd on the other: So that after all, the whole of their Demands amounted to 72,000 Crowns down before they went off, the Marriage of the Dauphin with Edward's eldest Daughter, and the Revenue of the Dutchy of Guyenne for the Maintenance of that Princess, or else 50,000 Crowns every Year, payable in London for nine Years to come; at the expiration of which Term, Charles and his future Queen were peaceably to enjoy the Dutchy of Guyenne, and Lewis was to be discharg'd from any farther Payments to the King of England.

WHO would imagine but that Philip de Comines, who was present in the Council when Edward's Proposals were examin'd, was very well inform'd of the Truth? Nevertheless, this is certain, and it cannot be otherwise, that he has confounded the Proposals of the Ambassadors of France, or of Lewis the Eleventh's Council, with those of the English, it being not possible that the Ambassadors of England could make such Proposals: For, in the first Place, they were limited by their Instructions, which they could neither add to, nor diminish, and in which there was not one Word said either of the Revenue of Guyenne, or of the Maintenance of the Princess Elizabeth. In the second Place, it would have been the grossest Prevarication in them to assign the Maintenance of Elizabeth for the reason of the annual Pension, because they could not doubt but Edward's View was to have the said annual Pension look'd upon as a sort of Tribute and Acknowledgment for the two Provinces of Guyenne and Normandy, which he pleaded France unjustly detain'd from him. This is so true, that Philip de Comines himself affirms, that

the Engliſh, even after the ſigning of the Treaty, pretended that this Penſion was a real Tribute. In the third Place, if the Ambaſſadors of England had made ſuch Propoſals, what was it that hinder'd their treating on that Foot? Was it not more for the Advantage of France that Elizabeth's Maintenance ſhould be aſſign'd as the Cauſe of the Penſion, than to leave the Reaſon of it undetermin'd? It is clear therefore that Philip de Comines was deceiv'd in his Judgment, or that his Memory fail'd him when he wrote his Memoirs; for though he gives the Subſtance of the Thing, he is miſtaken in almoſt every Circumſtance, as where he ſays 72,000 Crowns for 75,000, a Truce of nine Years for one of ſeven, a Penſion for nine Years inſtead of ſaying, during the Lives of the two Kings; and laſt of all in the Maintenance of Elizabeth, of which neither the Treaty nor Lewis the Eleventh's Obligation mentions one Word. Mezeray has copied after Philip de Comines, and has likewiſe added, that the Truce which the two Kings concluded together, was a Truce for Commerce, as if he had a mind that this Treaty ſhould paſs for a Matter of little Importance: "It happen'd, ſays he, that in the abſence of the Burgundian, the King, "what with his Intrigues, Flattery, and "what with Preſents, which the Engliſh "very greedily ſnap at, perſuaded the "Engliſh King and his Council to hearken "to an Accommodation: And in a very "few Days the Deputies of the two "Kings agreed upon the Conditions. "'Twas a Truce of Commerce, including "the Dukes of Bretagne and Burgundy, "if they had a mind to come in, ſtipulating 73,000 Crowns ready Money for "the Engliſh King, and the Marriage of "Edward's Daughter with the Dauphin, "for whoſe Maintenance King Lewis appropriated the Revenue of Guyenne for "nine Years, of 50,000 Crowns a Year "to be paid to the Engliſh King at his "Tower of London."

The Reaſon why Hiſtorians have diſfer'd about it.

Now in all likelihood this is what has given occaſion to the Contradiction we find between the Hiſtorians of the two Nations. The Ambaſſadors of England demanded the Kingdom of France, or at leaſt Guyenne and Normandy: This was refus'd. Then they propos'd the Marriage of Elizabeth to the Dauphin, and a Penſion of 50,000 Crowns by way of Equivalent. Probably Lewis XI and his Council thought fit to agree to the Marriage and the Penſion, but not by way of Equivalent, Lewis being loth to acknowledge that Edward had any juſt Pretenſions either to the whole Kingdom of France, or any Part thereof. This was undoubtedly the Reaſon that the Propoſal was made to the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, to grant them the Marriage and the Penſion; but that this Penſion ſhould be paid as if it were only for the Maintenance of the young Princeſs 'till the time of Marriage, or for nine Years. It is no leſs evident, that this Propoſal was rejected by the Engliſh: Mean time, as the two Kings were equally deſirous of Peace, nothing was more natural than to fall in with the Expedient which they made uſe of, viz. That the Marriage ſhould be agreed to, and that Lewis ſhould engage himſelf to pay Edward an annual Penſion of 50,000 Crowns during both their Lives, without expreſſing the Cauſe or Motive of the ſaid Penſion. Each found his Account in this Expedient; Lewis was in no fear of having it objected to him with any Foundation that he paid Tribute to Edward, becauſe this Penſion was only granted by Letters Patent, and not by a Treaty; and that beſides, the Reaſon of it was not expreſs'd in his ſaid Patent. And as to what the Engliſh might ſay when they were once got out of France, he did not much value. On the other hand, Edward had reaſon enough to be ſatisfied; for, beſides the real Advantage which was to redound to him from the Marriage of his Daughter with the Dauphin, and from the additional Revenue of 50,000 Crowns a Year, this Penſion would give his Arms an Air of Triumph, and leave the Engliſh, who had been at the Charge of his Armament, ſome Reaſon to imagine that France paid England a Tribute. That was, no doubt, the principal Motive of his Demand, with reſpect to the Penſion. He was not weak enough to believe that he could make Lewis XI pay him a Tribute without the gaining of one Victory, or the Conqueſt of a ſingle Town. Therefore in his Inſtructions to the Lord Howard and his Colleagues, he took care not to ſay that he demanded the Penſion in the nature of a Tribute. It was ſufficient for him to leave the Cauſe of the Penſion undetermin'd, that the Engliſh might explain it to his Advantage. This Expedient therefore being embrac'd, it happen'd that after the Treaty had been ſign'd and ratified, each Nation explain'd the Penſion after their own manner. The Engliſh pretended it was a real Tribute, becauſe Edward was not againſt their putting that Conſtruction upon it, and undoubtedly did not give himſelf the Trouble of undeceiving them. The French maintain'd on their Part, that this Penſion was only granted for the Maintenance of the Princeſs Elizabeth, becauſe in effect Lewis XI had deſign'd to grant it under this Title, if Edward had been willing to have conſented to it. I have dwelt the longer upon this Subject to ſhew, in the firſt Place, how much Readers ought to be upon their Guard againſt the National Partiality of Hiſtorians: And, in the ſecond Place, to diſplay the Uſefulneſs of this Collection of the publick Acts, which preſents us with authentick Pieces, that the greateſt part of Hiſtorians never ſaw, and which thoſe who knew them have omitted or diſguis'd, when they found that they might ſerve to the Diſcredit of their own Nation. It is time now to reſume the Abridgment of the Hiſtory, to which the following Acts refer, from the Treaty of Amiens to the Death of Edward.

Duke of Burgundy's Truce with Lewis.

THE Duke of Burgundy took ſome time to conſider before he accepted the Truce. Nevertheleſs he conſented, after the Expiration of the Term allow'd him, to make a particular Truce with Lewis XI, not ſo much for any Fear that he was under of his Arms, as from the extraordinary Deſire he had to be reveng'd on the Duke of Lorain and the Swiſs. In 1476, he attack'd the former, and took his Dutchy from him: After this he intended to go and chaſtiſe the Swiſs; but his Army was ſeiz'd with a panick Fright at Granſon, and run away when there was no Enemy to purſue. About a Fortnight after, he loſt the famous Battel of Morat, where the Swiſs kill'd 8000 of his Men. And laſtly, at the beginning of the Year 1477, going to beſiege Nancy, which the Duke of Lorain had retaken, he loſt another Battel, wherein he was kill'd.

He takes the Dutchy of Lorain.

Lewis diſpoſſeſſes his Daughter of her Eſtate.

THIS reſtleſs Prince left but one Daughter nam'd Mary, about nineteen Years of Age, from whom Lewis XI preſently took Burgundy, and the Towns ſituate upon the River Soamme. It was in vain for her to implore the Protection of Edward, who was then the only Prince capable of ſupporting her, and from whom ſhe could never get any thing but inſignificant Wiſhes and Compliments. Though England was manifeſtly bound in Intereſt to protect the Houſe of Burgundy, in order to hinder the Aggrandiſement of France, Edward had particular Reaſons in oppoſition to this Policy of State, which were of more weight with him than any that could be urg'd for the Good of his Kingdom. In the firſt Place, he was afraid of engaging himſelf in a War that would oblige him to quit his Pleaſures, to which he was ſo ſtrangely addicted. Beſides, being grown corpulent and heavy, he thought he was not able to bear the Fatigue of it. But his principal Reaſon was his extraordinary Ambition to ſee his eldeſt Daughter Queen of France, which made him afraid to do any thing that might furniſh Lewis XI with a Pretext for breaking his Promiſe. To this we may add, that his Council, which was brib'd by French Gold, contributed not a little to make him deſpiſe the Affairs of the Netherlands with an Indifference which did not at all correſpond with the Intereſts of England. With this View alſo Lewis punctually paid him his Penſion, for fear that if he miſs'd one Payment, he ſhould out of pure Spite eſpouſe the Quarrel of the Dutcheſs of Burgundy. At laſt, Mary deſpairing of any Succours from England, married Maximilian Archduke of Auſtria, Son to the Emperor Frederick. This Marriage, and the Emperor's Interceſſion, procur'd for the Netherlands a Truce for ſome Months, and for Mary the Reſtitution of ſome Places which Lewis had taken. During this Truce, Lewis left no Stone unturn'd to keep Edward in a Neutrality ſo advantagious to France. He had already ſeiz'd part of the Succeſſion of the late Duke of Burgundy, and did not deſpair of making himſelf Maſter of thoſe Provinces of the Netherlands which join to France, and that the reſt would fall into the Hands of ſome of the Princes his Friends. In a Word, if Philip de Comines may be believ'd, who poſitively affirms it, his Project was to ſtrip Mary entirely of her Dominions.

Dutcheſs of Burgundy's Marriage.

Truce for the Netherlands, &c.

IN 1478, immediately after the Expiration of the Truce, Maximilian enter'd Burgundy, where he took ſeveral Places, and had he been well ſupported, would in all probability have robb'd Lewis of all his Conqueſts. And really Lewis could not help fearing that Edward would at length open his Eyes to ſee the true Intereſts of his Kingdom, and that he would hearken to the Advice given him by ſome honeſt Men to make an Alliance with the Dutcheſs of Burgundy, in order to hinder the Aggrandiſement of France. To divert him from any ſuch Thought, he laid a Snare for Edward, in which he infallibly caught him. The Character of Lewis XI is ſo well known, that it is unneceſſary to inſiſt upon it here. Every body knew that he was no Slave to his Word; and therefore it is ſurprizing that a Prince who had that Character univerſally, ſhould find any body ſo weak as to truſt him. In July 1478, he ſent Charles de Martigny, Biſhop of . . . . . into England with a full Power to prolong the Truce, which, by a Treaty lately made, was to continue but a Year after the Death of either of the Kings, to an hundred Years after the Death of him who died firſt, and to oblige himſelf to pay the yearly Penſion of 50,000 Crowns as long as the Truce ſhould laſt. Nothing could be better calculated to flatter the Vanity of Edward than this Propoſal. Though he was not perſonally concern'd in the continuance of this Penſion, which was ſecur'd to him during his own Life by the Treaty of Amiens, yet he pleas'd himſelf with the Thought how glorious it would be for him to extend it to a hundred Years after his Death. Such a long Term gave it much more of the Air of a Tribute than the continuance of the Life of either of the two Kings, to which it had been limited by the Treaty of Amiens. This Negotiation was ſomewhat delay'd, becauſe Edward, ſurpriz'd to hear no mention made of the Marriage of his Daughter to the Dauphin, choſe to ſend Ambaſſadors to Lewis to preſs him to the Celebration of the Eſpouſals. But this Prince, too crafty for Edward, always found one Pretence or another to ſhuffle it off. Philip de Comines in his Memoirs tells us the many Wiles and Shifts which Lewis made uſe of to gain time, and to baffle Edward's Inſtances.

Lewis too crafty for Edward.

The Treaty concluded.

AT length, in February, 1479, the Treaty for prolonging the Truce was concluded, and ſign'd on the ſame Foot as it had been propos'd by the Ambaſſador of France. Beſides the Treaty it ſelf which the Ambaſſador ſign'd, he gave Letters Patent, whereby he engag'd the King his Maſter to the ſame Conditions, by vertue of a Power which had been given him for that purpoſe. Theſe Letters were drawn up in the ſtrongeſt Terms that can be imagin'd, and agreeable to his full Power, or his Letters of Attorney. I have obſerv'd, in this Collection of Records, that this is not the only Inſtance of Princes ſending Biſhops or other Eccleſiaſticks in Embaſſies when they had a Deſign to deceive. But Ambaſſadors are not always let into their Maſters Intentions. However this was, it was not more eaſy to conclude the Truce with the Ambaſſador, than it was difficult to get it ratify'd by Lewis, who was never at a loſs for Excuſes to ſhuffle it off; all he had in view being to amuſe Edward, and to hinder him from making an Alliance with the Dutcheſs of Burgundy. In fine, he acted his Part ſo well, that he never ratify'd the Treaty, the Dauphin never marry'd the Princeſs of England, and Edward did not concern himſelf in the Affairs of Maximilian and Mary; or at leaſt did not think of it 'till too late, when Death ſurpriz'd him before he could take juſt Meaſures to be reveng'd.

A Remark on Princes ſending Biſhops or other Clergy as Ambaſſadors.

Marriages propos'd for Edward's Daughters.

DURING all that time Maximilian perceiving he could not be able to make Reſiſtance againſt France without the Aſſiſtance of England, left no Stone unturn'd to attach Edward to his Intereſt. That ſame Year he made a Propoſal to the Court of England of marrying his Son Philip, who was about a Year old, to Edward's third Daughter Anne, at the ſame time when Edward thought of marrying his fourth Daughter Catherine with Prince John, Son to Ferdinand and Iſabel, who was ſcarce older than Philip.

EDWARD IV.

MEAN while Edward being ſurpriz'd at the affected Delays of the King of France, as well with reſpect to the Ratification of the late Treaty as to his Daughter's Marriage with the Dauphin. held a great Council in 1480, wherein it was reſolv'd to ſend Ambaſſadors to Lewis, peremptorily to demand of him the entire Execution of the Treaty of Amiens, and the Ratification of that of London. The Lord Howard, who, according to Philip de Comines, receiv'd a yearly Penſion of 2000 Crowns from the King of France, was choſe to be the Head of this Embaſſy. Lewis, according to Cuſtom, return'd a prevaricating inſignificant Anſwer, not in the leaſt doubting but Edward would ſtill ſuffer himſelf to be trifled with. Nevertheleſs, it appears that Edward, immediately upon the Return of his Ambaſſadors, began to take his Meaſures to put himſelf into a Condition to be reveng'd for the Affront put upon him; and for this end made ſeveral Alliances with diverſe Princes, particularly with Maximilian and Mary, and with the Duke of Bretagne.

Ambaſſadors ſent to the French King to demand the Execution of the Treaty of Amiens, &c.

Edward ſtrengthens himſelf by foreign Alliances.

IT looks as if Lewis, who had good Spies abroad, had ſome notice of his Deſign, becauſe in 1481, he ſtir'd up the King of Scotland to make War againſt him; which kept him employ'd 'till the end of the next Year.

His War with Scotland.

IN a word, during Edward's War with Scotland, Lewis XI pull'd off the Mask. The Dutcheſs of Burgundy dying in 1481, of a Fall from her Horſe, the Citizens of Ghent took her Children, Philip and Margaret, into their own Cuſtody; which bred a great Diviſion between them and the Archduke. Lewis taking hold of this Opportunity, repreſented the Power of the Houſe of Auſtria in ſuch a terrible Light to the People of Ghent, that at laſt he frighten'd them to agree to deliver up young Margaret to him, in order to be married to his Son the Dauphin, and Maximilian was oblig'd to conſent to it.

Dutcheſs of Burgundy's Death. The People of Ghent take her Children into their Cuſtody, but deliver up Margaret to the French King.

UPON the Concluſion of the War with Scotland in October, 1482, Edward aſſembled all the Lords in and about London, and declar'd to them the Reaſons he had for making War againſt the King of France; which being approv'd of, they all promis'd to ſerve him to their utmoſt in ſo juſt a Quarrel. But while he was making Preparations for the War, he was ſnatch'd away by Death on the 9th of April, 1483; and Lewis the Eleventh ſurviv'd him but a few Months. Mezeray ſays, That Edward finding himſelf baffled by the French, and ridicul'd by his own Subjects for his groſs Folly, dy'd for very Shame. But one would have thought it had been better for Mezeray to have ſet off all this Fraud to the Score of Lewis XI, than to boaſt of it as he does to the Honour of the French Nation, who had no hand in it. Beſides, it little became an Hiſtorian to banter a Prince for his Faith in thoſe Treaties and Oaths which were made uſe of to decoy him.

THE Acts which have any Connection with the foregoing Hiſtory, are theſe.

Duke of Bretagne's Alliance with Edward. 22.

1. THE Duke of Bretagne's Confirmation of the Treaty of Alliance concluded with Edward in 1468, and which, after being broke by the Earl of Warwick, was renew'd in 1471 upon Edward's Reſtoration; dated January the 22d, 1476 [r].

Edward and the Duke recede from each other's Demands. 23.

2. EDWARD the Fourth's Letters Patent, whereby he gives up his Demand of Charges on account of the Armament which he had made for the Aſſiſtance of the Duke of Bretagne, in conſideration of the Duke's having receded from his Demand of Satisfaction for the Loſſes his Subjects had ſuſtain'd by Sea, during the Adminiſtration of the Earl of Warwick, and which amounted to 50,000 Crowns; dated March the 16th, 1476, [s].

His Reaſons to keep fair with the Duke.

"EDWARD had two weighty "Reaſons to keep fair with the Duke of "Bretagne; the one, that if need were, "he might be able to give France Diverſion on that ſide; and the other, that "he might engage the Duke to have a "ſtrict Guard over the Earl of Richmond.

His Acquittances for Lewis's Annuities. 30, 38.

3. Two Acquittances given to Lewis XI, for the Payment of two Terms of the Annuity of 50,000 Crowns, the laſt of which was due on the Feaſt of St. Michael; dated July the 31ſt, 1476 [t], and December the 7th following [u].

Commiſſion for the Marriage-Treaty betwixt his Son and the Infanta of Spain. 42.

4. A COMMISSION from Edward IV, to certain Perſons to treat with Ferdinand and Iſabella, King and Queen of Caſtile, concerning the Marriage of their only Daughter the Infanta Iſabel with Edward Prince of Wales; dated March the 31ſt, 1477 [x].

5. ANOTHER of his Commiſſions for treating in Flanders with the Ambaſſadors of the Emperor Frederic; dated May the 20th, 1477 [y].

Marriage Treaty betwixt Maximilian and the Dutcheſs of Bugundy.

THESE Ambaſſadors of the Emperor came into the Netherlands to conclude Maximilian's Marriage with Mary Dutcheſs of Burgundy; and Edward ſent over this Embaſſy purely at the Sollicitation of his Siſter Margaret the Ducheſs-Dowager.

Another Receipt for the Annuity. 45.

6. ANOTHER Acquittance given by Edward to Lewis XI, for his Payment of the Term of the Annuity due at Eaſter; dated July the 5th, 1477 [z].

7. A TREATY betwixt Lewis XI and Edward IV, for prolonging the Truce to the end of a Year after the Death of either of the two Kings that dy'd firſt; dated July 20th, 1477 [a].

Commiſſion to Ambaſſadors going to France. 50.

8. A COMMISSION to the Lord Howard and others who were going as Ambaſſadors to France; dated November 30th, 1477 [b].

Power to prolong the Term of Arbitration. 52.

9. A POWER to the Ambaſſadors of England to prolong the Term of Arbitration mention'd in the Treaty of Amiens to what time they ſhall think fit; dated March the 13th, 1478 [c].

The Prolongation ratify'd. 61.

10. THE Prolongation of the ſaid Term for three Years [d].

Acquittance for the Annuity. 65.

11. ANOTHER Acquittance from Edward to Lewis XI, for 25,000 Crowns; dated June the 14th, 1478 [e].

French King's Power to his Ambaſſadors about the Truce and his Annuity. 86.

12. LEWIS the Eleventh's Power to Charles de Martigny Biſhop of .... whom he ſent Ambaſſador to England, to prolong the Truce with Edward for 100 Years after the Deceaſe of either of the Kings that dy'd firſt, and to oblige himſelf (Lewis) and his Succeſſors to the Payment of the Annuity of 50,000 Crowns 'till the Expiration of the ſaid Term.

"THIS Charles de Martigny is ſtil'd "Epiſcopus Eluenſis; what Biſhoprick this is I know not: If the "Word was not ſpelt exactly the "ſame in many places, I ſhould have "thought it a Miſtake for Eluſenſis, "i. e. Eluſe in Gaſcoigne, a Biſhoprick "which was united to the Biſhoprick of "Auch, but when I know not *."

SINCE no Hiſtorian has made mention of this Power granted by Lewis XI, nor of the Treaty made in conſequence thereof; and as there cannot be a fuller Demonſtration of this Prince's Inſincerity, it may not be improper to inſert the very Terms of the Full Power in this place.

" Seal'd with his Seal of Red Wax " Appendant to the Tail of the " Parchment."

Now, as to the aforeſaid Letter of Attorney from Lewis XI and his Ambaſſador's Letters Patent, there is only this Remark to be made, That ſuch Perſons as have a Deſign to deceive, take more Precautions to hinder their being ſuſpected, than they do, who act bona fide; and that, generally ſpeaking, ſuch mighty Precaution does in the end produce an Effect very contrary to what they intended.

Remarks on it.

16. THE Treaty concluded between Edward's Commiſſioners and Charles de Martigny Biſhop of .... and Ambaſſador of France, which prolongs the Truce and the Payment of the Annuity of 50,000 Crowns for the Term of an hundred Years; dated at London February the 15th, $147\frac{8}{9}$.

The Treaty itſelf. 103.

THIS Treaty is exactly conform to Lewis the Eleventh's Letter of Attorney, and to the Letters Patent juſt now menti- on'd. And nothing more was wanting to compleat the Affair than Lewis's Ratifi- cation of it, which he was fully deter- min'd never to grant when he ſent his Ambaſſador.

Remarks on it.

I DON'T know one Hiſtorian, either French or Engliſh, that has made any mention of this Treaty.

II. Edward's Affairs with Scotland.

Character of James III, King of Scotland.

James III, King of Scotland, had been guilty of ſo many Acts of Outrage and Violence ſince he came to Age, that he had entirely loſt the Affection of his People, and particularly of the Nobility, who could get no Acceſs to him. Three Favourites, whom he had rais'd from the Duſt, who had no Talents for Buſineſs, and were hated for their Pride and Avarice, compos'd his whole Council. He had two Brothers, Alexander and John: The latter having taken the liberty to ſpeak too freely of the King and his Miniſtry, was committed to Priſon, where he was put to Death by the opening of his Veins. And ſome time after, Alexander, who had the Title of Duke of Albany, was alſo ſhut up in a Caſtle for fear he ſhould contrive a Way to revenge the Death of his Brother.

Truce with England broke.

While this Prince was in Priſon, James, at the Sollicitation of Lewis XI, and no doubt of the three Favourites, whom he had corrupted, broke the Truce he had made with England, which was to laſt 'till the Year 1519, without the leaſt Colour or Pretence for it. This falling out juſt at the time when Edward was ſeriouſly bent upon a War with France, he therefore did whatever he could to prevent a Rupture with Scotland. But in the Month of June, 1481, James III broke into the Engliſh Frontiers, and carry'd off great Booty. The Hoſtilities being thus begun, Edward would have been inexcuſable if he had not prepar'd for a War.

Duke of Albany eſcapes.

During this, the Duke of Albany making his Eſcape from Priſon, went for Refuge to Edward, who promis'd him his Protection, in hopes that he might make uſe of him to embarraſs the King of Scotland. And they concluded a Treaty with one another ſoon after, in which the Duke of Albany took the Title of King of Scotland. Edward engag'd to aſſiſt in placing him upon the Throne; and the Duke promis'd on his Part to give him Berwick, to break the old Alliance betwixt France and Scotland, and to marry Cæcilia, who was betroth'd to the King his Brother, provided he could get a Separation from his Wife. This Treaty being ſign'd, Edward gave the Command of an Army to the Duke of Glouceſter his Brother, who march'd towards Scotland, accompany'd with the Duke of Albany, ſoon made himſelf Maſter of the Town of Berwick, and then attack'd the Caſtle.

He takes the Title of King of Scotland in a Treaty with Edward.

Edward IV.

The Duke of Glouceſter marches towards Scotland with an Army, and takes Berwick.

Mean while King James was very much confounded at the firſt News which was brought him of the March of the Engliſh Forces. The moſt ſpeedy Way to have an Army capable to make a ſtand againſt the Engliſh, was to aſſemble the Nobility, together with the Troops they were oblig'd to furniſh upon ſuch Occaſions. But this was a Remedy which neither the King nor his Miniſters car'd for, becauſe the Nobility were diſſatisfy'd, and it was feared they would be too ſtrong when they had their Troops about them. Nevertheleſs, the taking of Berwick made the Diſeaſe ſo deſparate, that the King was oblig'd to cauſe the Great Men to be ſummoned; who were no ſooner aſſembled; but the firſt thing they did was to go and ſeize the the King's three Favourites, and to hang them up in the middle of the Camp. James was put into a ſad Fright, and agreed to whatever the Lords were pleas'd to demand of him. But watching his Opportunity, he ſtole away from them, and went and ſhut himſelf up in Edinburgh Caſtle.

James ſummons the Heads of the Clans, who ſeize his Favourites and hang them.

Duke of Glouceſter enters Edinburgh, and threatens the Kingdom with Fire and Sword.

The Duke of Glouceſter hearing this News, and that the Scotch Army was disbanded after the King's Flight, left the Caſtle of Berwick inveſted, and march'd towards Edinburgh, which he enter'd without Oppoſition. It was in vain for him to hope for a Conference with King James, who would not ſo much as receive any Meſſage: Which Obſtinacy oblig'd the Duke of Glouceſter to make Proclamation in Edinburgh with Sound of Trumpet, that if James did not give the King of England entire Satisfaction before the 1ſt of September, all Scotland ſhould be laid waſte with Fire and Sword. Edward complain'd of the Breach of the Truce, in the firſt Place, the rather becauſe James ſhew'd by it that he had no mind to have the Marriage of the Prince his Son with Cæcilia conſummated, tho' he had already receiv'd her Dowry beforehand; for this Match had been made with no other View than to keep up the good Underſtanding betwixt the two Kingdoms.

FOEDERA Tom. XII.

Edward's Complaints and Demands upon King James.

He demanded moreover, that the Duke of Albany ſhould be reſtor'd to his Eſtate and Honours. King James being ſtill obſtinately reſolv'd to give no Anſwer, the Nobility who were re-aſſembled at Hadington, ſent Deputies to the Engliſh General to repreſent to him, that it was not their Fault that the Truce was not obſerv'd, and the Marriage not conſummated; and that they would endeavour to procure him Satisfaction in both thoſe Articles. The Duke anſwer'd, That as to the Truce, the King his Brother was diſpos'd to obſerve it inviolably, provided the Caſtle of Berwick be deliver'd up to him, or at leaſt that no Relief be granted to the Beſieged: And that as to the Marriage, he did not know whether the King his Brother intended to have it conſummated; but that 'till ſuch time as he receiv'd his Orders, he hop'd to have the Money refunded, which the King of Scotland had already receiv'd for the Princeſs Cæcilia's Dowry.

Duke of Albany's Treaty with the Scotch Nobility, &c.

NOT many Days after, the Duke of Albany had a Conference with ſome of the Nobility, and concluded a Treaty with them, by which the Caſtle of Berwick was to be deliver'd up into the Hands of the Duke of Glouceſter; and the Citizens of Edinburgh gave Bonds to pay the Money due to Edward, in caſe he ſhould not approve of the Conſummation of the Marriage. If Edward had not had his Head full of the War he deſigned againſt France, it is undoubtedly certain that Scotland would not have come off ſo cheap. As to the Duke of Albany, he was glad to ſtipulate for himſelf a general Pardon for all manner of Crimes, (in particular for his having uſurp'd the Title of King) and his Reſtoration to his Lands and Offices. This gives room to conjecture that he had not taken the Title of King but at the Sollicitation of Edward, and that he never had any Deſign to dethrone the King his Brother, becauſe, on the contrary, he reſtor'd him to his former State, and took the Oath of Allegiance to him.

Makes his Peace with the King, who has a Deſign upon him, but he eſcapes.

AT firſt James ſeem'd to like the manner of Proceeding; but it was not long before he reſolv'd to get rid of the Duke of Albany, who had Notice of it time enough to go on board a Fiſher-Boat that carry'd him to Dunbar, of which he was Governour. When he found himſelf ſafe, he ſent the Earl of Angus, and ſome others, to King Edward to beg his Protection. Edward readily granted it, and made a new Treaty with him, which was ſign'd by the Duke's Envoys in the beginning of the Year 1483. We ſhall ſee the Subſtance of it hereafter. In all appearance there was a Secret Article, whereby the Duke engag'd himſelf to deliver up Dunbar Fort to the Engliſh, becauſe he did it upon the ſpot. Edward's Death, which happen'd ſoon after, broke the Duke of Albany's Meaſures: And the Alterations which enſued in England having depriv'd him of all Hopes of being ſupported by the Engliſh, he retir'd to France, where he was kill'd by a Lance in a Tournament with the Duke of Orleans, who was afterwards King of France by the Title of Lewis XII. When we come to the Reign of Henry VIII, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of his Son, who was born in France, and ſucceeded him in the Title of Duke of Albany.

Edward grants him Protection, and makes a Treaty with him.

Duke of Albany retires to France, and is kill'd in a Tournament by the Duke of Orleans.

It is obſervable, that neither Buchanan nor Leſley in their Hiſtories of Scotland make any mention of theſe two Treatles made between Edward and the Duke of Albany. Leſley, who relates this Affair ſomewhat different from Buchanan, only ſays, that Edward promis'd the Duke of Albany to place him upon the Throne of Scotland.

Omiſſion of Buchanan and Leſley.

The Acts in this Tome, which have any relation to the Affairs of Scotland from 1475 to 1483, are as follow.

1. A SAFE-Conduct for the King of Scotland, who was going to Amiens, and from thence to England, which was to hold good for 15 Months; dated May the 15th, 1475[k].

Safe-Conduct for the King of Scotland. 4.

2. THE King of Scotland's Acquittance given to Edward for 2000 Marks, being the ſecond Payment of the Princeſs Cæcilia's Dowry; dated [l] February the 3d, 1476.

3. ANOTHER Receipt for the third Payment; dated [m] February the 3d, 1477.

4. A SAFE-Conduct for the King of Scotland to go to Amiens with 1000 Perſons in his Retinue; dated [n] March the 17th, 1478.

Another Safe-Conduct for the King of Scotland. 53.

5. SEVERAL Orders to prepare for the War againſt Scotland; dated [o] May the 12th, and June the 20th, 1480.

LESLET ſays, that in 1480, James III ſent Word to Edward, that if he aſſiſted Maximilian againſt France, he would declare War againſt him. Now Edward's firſt Treaty with Maximilian was dated the 1ſt of Auguſt, 1480; and yet we find here that Edward makes Preparations againſt Scotland in the Months of May and June. Therefore from hence it may be inferr'd, that the King of Scotland had begun his Preparations againſt England before he knew that Edward had treated with Maximilian: By consequence, this League betwixt Edward and Maximilian was a mere Pretence which James the Third made use of, after he had resolv'd, upon Lewis the Eleventh's Sollicitations, to break with England.

A Treaty with the Earl of Ross. 140.

8. THE Letters Patent of Alexander Duke of Albany, stiling himself King of Scotland, whereby he obliges himself, 1. To take the part of Edward. 2. To do him Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland in six Months after he is in Possession of the Throne. 3. To break the ancient Alliance between France and Scotland. 4. To make over to Edward for ever the Town and Castle of Berwick. They are dated at Fotheringhay-Castle, June the 10th, 1482, and sign'd Alexander R.

157.

9. CONVENTIONS between Alexander and Edward, pursuant to the said Alexander's Letters Patent; dated the June 11th, as above.

IN these Conventions there's one Article more than in the Letters Patent, viz. That if Alexander can get a Divorce from his Wife according to the Laws of the Church, Edward obliges himself to give him Cæcilia his Daughter in Marriage.

Commission to the Duke of Gloucester. 157.

10. A COMMISSION to Richard Duke of Glouceſter to command the Army which is to march to Scotland; dated June the 12th, 1482 [r].

Lesley's Mistake about the Siege of Berwick.

THIS Date may be of use to correct a Mistake in Lesley's History, who says that the English besieg'd Berwick all the Winter of the Years 1481 and 1482. See also the following Act.

Commission to Robert Radclyff. 159.

11. ANOTHER Commission to Robert Radclyff, Esq; to command the Fleet; dated July the 8th, 1482 [s].

Engagements of certain Scotch Lords to get Pardon, &c. for the Duke of Albany. 160.

12. AN Engagement by William Archbishop of St. Andrews, James Bishop of Dunkeld, Andrew Lord of Annandale, and Colin Earl of Argyle, that they will cause the Duke of Albany to be restor'd to his Estate and Offices; that they will obtain a general Pardon for him of all Offences committed by him against the Laws, and particularly his having aspir'd to the Throne; and that they will cause the whole to be ratify'd by the King and the States under the express Condition, that he be faithful to King James, &c. Dated at Edinburgh, August the 2d, 1482.

EDWARD IV.

Of the Provost, &c. of Edinburgh to refund the Money paid by Edward to their King for Cæcilia's Dowry. 161.

13. THE Engagement of the Provost of Edinburgh, the whole Society of Merchants, Burgesses, and Community of the same, to repay to the King of England all the Sums which he had paid to King James for the Dowry of Cæcilia his Daughter, in case the said King of England does not think fit to have the Marriage consummated; dated August the 4th, 1482 [t].

THE Earl of Rivers being Brother to Edward's Queen, it is not improbable that in the Accommodation with Scotland, Edward took care of this Match for his Brother-in-law.

Edward's Declaration about his Daughter's Dowry. 165, 167.

15. EDWARD's Notification that he chuses to have the Dowry return'd, rather than that his Daughter Cæcilia should be marry'd to the Prince of Scotland; dated October the 12th, 1482 [x].

16. A PUBLICK Instrument of the said Notification; dated October the 27th, 1482 [y].

Safe-Conduct for the King of Scotland to go to Amiens. 170.

17. A SAFE-Conduct for the King of Scotland going to Amiens, there to visit the Relicks of St. John, with a Retinue of 1000 Persons; dated November the 3d, 1482 [z].

THIS is the third Safe-Conduct which we find here granted to this King for his Voyage to Amiens. Probably he only wanted it as a Colour for his going to confer with Lewis XI. But we don't find that he put this Design in execution. As for the Retinue of 1000 Persons mention'd in the Safe-Conduct, this was only for the sake of doing him Honour; for the King of Scotland was never attended with so great a Train, especially out of his Dominions.

Edward's Consent to the Marriage of the Earl of Rivers. 171.

18. EDWARD's full Power to the Bishop of Rochester and Edward Woodville to consent in his Name to the Marriage of the Earl of Rivers to Margaret, Sister to the King of Scotland; dated December the 14th, 1482 [a].

THE

Foedera Tom. XII.

The principal Articles of this second Treaty were, That Edward engag'd to furniſh the Duke of Albany with 3000 Archers to help put him in Poſſeſſion of the Throne of Scotland, with a Promiſe of greater Succours if neceſſary; That the Duke, when King of Scotland, ſhould in forty Days after diſſolve the Alliance betwixt that Nation and France; That he ſhould aſſiſt Edward with all his Power to obtain the Crown of France for him, from him who with-held it; That he ſhould quit all Pretenſions to the Town and Caſtle of Berwick; That he ſhould reſtore the Earl of Douglas who was baniſh'd from Scotland; and that if he was at liberty to marry, he ſhould have one of Edward's Daughters, without deſiring any Portion.

Remark on Buchanan and Leſley.

This Treaty might be of uſe to correct ſome Miſtakes which we find in the Hiſtory of Scotland, written by John Leſley Biſhop of Roſs: But it not being my preſent View to illuſtrate the Scottiſh Hiſtory, I ſhall not inſiſt on it. It ſhall ſuffice to obſerve in one Word, that what Buchanan ſays touching the Duke of Albany, is more agreeable to the Acts of this Tome than what Leſley ſays of him, tho' both of them were ignorant of the Treaties which this Duke made with Edward.

Protection for the Earl of Douglas, whom Edward ſent back to Scotland.

22. A Protection for James Earl of Douglas, who was ſent into Scotland by Edward; dated February the 15th, 1483 [c].

176.

The Earl of Douglas having been baniſh'd a long time from Scotland, Edward undoubtedly ſent him back into his own Country to foment Troubles there.

III. Domeſtick Affairs.

The Acts of theſe laſt eight Years of Edward IV, which relate to Domeſtick Affairs, are few in Number, and of very little Importance: Yet it is neceſſary, for preſerving the Thread of the Hiſtory, juſt to mention ſome Events which happen'd in this Interval.

Edward's Tax, which he call'd Benevolence.

In the beginning of the Year 1475, Edward rais'd a voluntary Tax upon his Subjects without the Authority of Parliament, to which he gave the Name of Benevolence; by which he would have it thought that it was a free Gift which private Men, in good Circumſtances, made to the King for his War with France. Richard III aboliſh'd this Method of raiſing Money; and in the Reign of Henry VIII, Cardinal Wolſey attempted to bring it in play again, but met with great Oppoſition.

Edward IV.

Duke of Bretagne delivers up the Earl of Richmond to the Engliſh Ambaſſadors:

In 1476, Edward ſent Ambaſſadors to the Duke of Bretagne, as was ſaid in the firſt Article, under Pretence of renewing their Alliance: But the true Motive of this Embaſſy was to deſire the Duke that he would deliver up the Earl of Richmond to him, who was the only Sprig left of the Houſe of Lancaſter. The Duke having ſuffer'd himſelf to be perſuaded, deliver'd up the Earl to the Ambaſſadors, who conducted him to St. Malo, in order to carry him over to England. But the Duke having repented of his Compliance as ſoon almoſt as he was gone out of his ſight, ſent away Peter Landais with all haſte to overtake them; who finding them at St Malo, contriv'd it ſo, that the Earl of Richmond made his Eſcape, and then Landais told the Ambaſſadors, that it was by the Duke's own Order; and he promis'd them in his Name that he would keep him very ſafe. This Earl of Richmond was afterwards King of England, with the Title of Henry VII.

But recovers him again out of their Hands.

Duke of Clarence arreſted, and condemn'd in Parliament.

In 1478, Edward caus'd his Brother the Duke of Clarence to be arreſted, and condemn'd in Parliament. The grand Crime of which he was impeach'd, was his having call'd the King his Brother a Baſtard; from whence occaſion was taken to interpret ſome of his Words and Actions, as if he had form'd a Deſign to dethrone the King, and to ſet the Crown upon his own Head. There is very great Probability that he was wrongfully accus'd through the Intrigues of the Duke of Glouceſter his Brother, and of the Queen. We ſhall ſee hereafter, that this falſe Accuſation, intended to take away the Life of this Prince, gave occaſion to the Duke of Glouceſter to deprive Edward's Children both of their Royalty and Life. The Duke of Clarence being put to his Choice what ſort of Death he would die, choſe to be drown'd in a Butt of Malmſey.

His being drown'd in a Butt of Malmſey.

We find in theſe laſt eight Years of Edward a great many other ſeparate Acts which have no dependance upon one another, and of which many are of very little Importance. As each of theſe would require a particular Explanation, which would run me out too far, I will only take notice of ſome of them which are of the greateſt conſequence.

The REIGN of EDWARD V.

FOEDERA Tom. XII.

ELIZABETH Woodville, who was Edward the Fourth's Queen, had ſo much the aſcendant over the King her Husband, that he could not deny her whatever ſhe requeſted. The chief Uſe ſhe made of her Credit with him, was to promote her Father, Brothers, and her Children by her firſt Husband, to Offices and Honours: And theſe had in the like manner advanc'd their own Friends and Creatures. Under a Pretence that many Families of the ancient Nobility were extinct, the King was perſuaded of the abſolute Neceſſity of filling up the number by new Promotions; which became at laſt ſo frequent, that the New Nobility began to be diſtinguiſh'd from the Ancient as a ſeparate Body: And all Advantages deſcending upon the New Nobility by the Favour of the King and Queen, it gave very great Umbrage to the Old Nobility, who could not but be mortify'd to ſee ſo many new Lords eſtabliſh'd upon the Ruins of the ancient Peerage. This gave riſe to two Factions in the Reign of Edward IV, which the Queen's Partiality to one of them render'd irreconcileable, becauſe ſhe took care to remove from Court, and from the great Poſts, all thoſe of the ancient Nobility that were capable of giving her any Umbrage, and to beſtow their Places on her own Creatures. Nevertheleſs there were three Noblemen at Court, that Edward IV could not be prevail'd on to part with, becauſe they had done him great Services, though the Queen did not like them. Theſe were the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Haſtings, and the Lord Stanley. The latter had marry'd Margaret Counteſs of Richmond, Mother to the Earl of Richmond, who was a Refugee in Bretagne. EDWARD V.

Ancient Nobility diſguſted by frequent Creations.

AFTER the Death of Edward IV the Prince of Wales, his eldeſt Son, who was thirteen Years of Age, was proclaim'd King by the Stile of Edward V. The Queen's Intention was to govern every thing in the Name of the King her Son, during his Minority; and ſhe had actually laid a Scheme for that Purpoſe; but Richard Duke of Glouceſter, who was the young King's Uncle by the Father's ſide, made a League with the three Noblemen above-mention'd, and thereby found Means to get the King's Perſon into his own Hands, to arreſt Richard Lord Gray his Governour, with two Knights, and to ſend them Priſoners to Pontefract-Caſtle. At this News the Queen was frighten'd, and took Refuge in the Sanctuary of Weſtminſter, with her five Daughters, and Richard Duke of York her youngeſt Son, then about nine Years of Age. Edward V's Proclamation. Duke of Glouceſter gets the King into his own Hands, and impriſons his Governour, &c. Queen flies to the Sanctuary of Weſtminſter with her Children.

THE Duke of Glouceſter had no ſooner got the young King in his own Hands, but he form'd a Deſign to deprive him of the Crown, and to place himſelf upon the Throne. The Duke of Buckingham enter'd into the Conſpiracy, and ſerv'd the Duke with all his Power, upon his poſitive Promiſe that as ſoon as he came to the Throne, he would reſtore him half of the Succeſſion of Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, which was devolv'd to the Crown, Duke of Glouceſter aims at the Crown. His Promiſe to the Duke of Buckingham.

Crown, and to which the Duke of Buckingham imagin'd he had an indiſputable Right. Haſtings and Stanley were not let into the Project, becauſe, tho' they were both of 'em Enemies to the Queen, yet they were thought too well affected to the Family of the late King their Benefactor. Therefore they were only made to believe that the Duke of Glouceſter had no other Intention than to procure to himſelf the Adminiſtration of the Government during the King's Minority: And for this Reaſon they adher'd cloſely to him, in order to hinder the Queen from having any Share in the Regency. Theſe three Lords ſerv'd the Duke of Glouceſter with ſo much Zeal, that in an Aſſembly of Perſons of the greateſt Diſtinction at London, they caus'd him to be elected and declared Protector of the King and Kingdom.

Duke of Glouceſter choſe Protector.

NOT long after, the new Protector procured a Reſolution in Council, that the young Duke of York ſhould be demanded out of the Queen's Hands, to be brought up with the King his Brother; and that if ſhe refus'd to give him up voluntarily, he ſhould be taken away by Force. The Cardinal Archbiſhop of Canterbury was deputed on this Errand, who being a Stranger to the ſecret Views of the Protector, diſplay'd all his Rhetoric to perſuade the Queen to deliver up the young Prince. He was the more earneſt in the matter for fear leſt the Council ſhould incline to violate the Sanctuary, which he dreaded as one of the greateſt of Misfortunes. In fine, he obtain'd his Requeſt, tho' with very great Difficulty.

Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſent to get the Duke of York out of the Queen's Hands.

THE Protector having now both the King and the Duke in his own Power, haſten'd to put his Project in Execution. To ſucceed in it with the more eaſe, he caus'd the Lord Haſtings to be ſifted, that he might ſecure him in his Intereſt, becauſe he had very great Credit in London. But Haſtings ſeeming too ſtrongly attach'd to the Royal Family, and the Protector being afraid he had made too open a Diſcovery to him, he therefore reſolv'd to ruin him. For this end he accus'd him, in a Council held at the Tower, of a Conſpiracy againſt his Life, and without producing any Proof of it, caus'd him to be beheaded on the Spot. The Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhop of Ely, and the Lord Stanley, all three Members of the Council, were arreſted and committed to Priſon as Accomplices in his Conſpiracy. But the true Reaſon was, that the Protector very well knew that they did not approve of his Deſigns. The ſame Day the Priſoners who had been ſent to Pontefract were executed without any form of Law, by order of the Duke of Glouceſter.

EDWARD V.

THIS firſt Step being taken, and there being a general Conſternation in the Minds of the People, a Report was ſpread in London, and it was publickly preached in St. Paul's Church, that Edward IV, and his Brother the Duke of Clarence were not the Sons of the late Duke of York, his Dutcheſs having taken ſome Perſons into her Bed whom they perfectly reſembled; but that the Duke of Glouceſter was the very Picture of the Duke his Father: Moreover, that Edward IV had a former Wife living when he married Elizabeth Woodville; from whence it was inferr'd, that all the Children he had by this laſt Wife were Baſtards. Upon theſe Suppoſitions the Duke of Glouceſter excluded the ſeven Children of Edward IV from the Succeſſion, as well as the young Earl of Warwick, and Margaret his Siſter, Children of the Duke of Clarence, to clear the way only for his own Succeſſion. The Duke of Buckingham back'd the matter in an Aſſembly of the Magiſtrates and chief Citizens of London, among whom ſome Perſons were hir'd to cry God bleſs King Richard the Third; which forc'd Acclamations being look'd upon as the general Conſent of the People, the Duke of Buckingham went next Day, at the Head of the Common Council, and offer'd the Crown to the Protector, who after ſome pretended Scruples was willing to undertake the Burden of it. Thus was it that the Duke of Glouceſter aſcended the Throne with the Stile of Richard III.

Reports ſpread about the Illegitimacy of Edward IV and the Duke of Clarence.

Duke of Glouceſter aſcends the Throne with the Title of Richard III.

IT may naturally be ſuppos'd that the publick Acts contain nothing very remarkable in the Reign of Edward V, which laſted but about two Months and a half, and wherein the Duke of Glouceſter continually labour'd the Accompliſhment of his wicked Deſigns: And it was only for preſerving the Thread of the Hiſtory that I thought fit to inſert an Abridgment of this ſhort Reign: Theſe three Acts only can be of any Service.

1. EDWARD the Fifth's Letters Patent, whereby he impower'd the Duke of Buckingham, when he ſaw it neceſſary, to arm the Inhabitants of the Counties of Salop, Hereford, Somerſet, Wilts, and Dorſet; dated May the 16th, 1483 [a].

Commiſſion to the Duke of Buckingham to arm ſeveral Counties. 180.

It was the Duke of Glouceſter who procured him this Commiſſion for his own Ends; but we find afterwards that the Duke of Buckingham made uſe of it againſt him.

BY two other Acts we perceive that the Duke of Glouceſter was not declar'd Protector 'till between the 24th and 27th of May, becauſe in an Act dated on the 24th, there is no mention of a Protector; whereas in an Act of the 27th, and two others that follow, it is ſaid, By the Advice of our moſt dear Uncle the Duke of Glouceſter, Protector of our Kingdom.

Duke of Glouceſter firſt ſtil'd Protector. 184. 185.

EDWARD V.

By another Act we find that the Coronation of Edward V was fix'd on the 22d of June, which was the very Day that Richard III was proclaim'd.

Edward V's Coronation appointed, but never ſolemnized. 185.

The REIGN of RICHARD III.

FOEDERA Tom. XII.

THE only Concern of Richard III, during his whole Reign, which laſted but two Years and two Months, was how to maintain himſelf upon the Throne, to which he was advanc'd by illegal Methods, and by a ſort of Election which was very irregular. And if he made any Treaties with Foreign Princes, it was only with that View. Therefore the publick Acts of this Reign relate only to domeſtic Affairs.

RICHARD III.

Proclamation and Coronation of Richard III.

THE new King was proclaim'd on the 22d of June 1483, and crown'd on the 6th of July following. Betwixt his Proclamation and Coronation he took the Great Seal from the Archbiſhop of York, who had ſhown too ſtrong an Attachment to the Family of Edward IV, and gave it to the Biſhop of Lincoln. Next Day he ſettled the Poſt of Great Marſhal on the Lord John Howard, and his Heirs Male; and not many Days after, he created him Duke of Norfolk, and Thomas his Son Earl of Surry.

His Advancements of the Family of the Howards.

AMONG the Priſoners that Richard, while he was only Protector, had clapp'd up in the Tower, there were three Perſons of great Conſideration, namely, Rotheram Archbiſhop of York, Dr. Merton Biſhop of Ely, and the Lord Thomas Stanley, whoſe Crime was their diſcovering too great an Attachment to the young King, and too much Affection for the whole Family of Edward IV. Conſequently the ſame Reaſon which had induced Richard to put them out of a Capacity to hurt him, ſtill ſubſiſted to engage him to detain them in Priſon 'till he was well fix'd upon the Throne. Nevertheleſs, his Fear of diſobliging the Clergy made him ſet the Archbiſhop of York at liberty. As to the Biſhop of Ely, the Univerſity of Oxford, whereof he was a Member, made ſuch ſtrong Intereſt for him, that the King did not think it proper to give them an abſolute Denial; but as he knew the Prelate was a Man of Parts, and capable of forming great Projects, when he releas'd him from the Tower he committed him to the Care of the Duke of Buckingham, who ſent him to his Caſtle of Brecknock in Wales, where he had a little more liberty than in his former Priſon. Richard was moſt of all puzzled what to do with Lord Stanley, becauſe he was ſenſible how much it would be in his Power to make him uneaſy when once he was at liberty. Nevertheleſs, this Lord being very well beloved by the People, and there being no plauſible Reaſon for detaining him in Priſon, and beſides, his Son the Lord Strange having begun to raiſe Troops in Lincolnſhire, the King was afraid that this Spark might occaſion a great Conflagration; and for this Reaſon he choſe to win him with Kindneſs, by delivering him out of the Tower, and giving him the Poſt of Steward of his Houſhold.

Lord Stanley releas'd and promoted.

THE preſent Conjuncture ſeem'd as favourable for maintaining the King upon the Throne, as he could wiſh for. The young King Edward and the Duke of York his Brother were Priſoners in the Tower, and the Queen their Mother with her Daughters were in the Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, from whence they could not ſtir. The Marquiſs of Dorſet, the Queen's eldeſt Son by her firſt Husband, was fled for Refuge to another Aſylum, and Richard Gray his younger Brother had loſt his Head at Pontefract. The Earl of Rivers labour'd under a Diſtemper from which he was never like to recover, and which actually carry'd him off that very Year. Richard Woodville his Son was abſconded, and more intent how to ſave his own Life, than to do any harm to the new King. On the other hand, there was not a Prince of the Houſe of Lancaſter left in England, the preceeding Wars having ſwept them all away. Margaret Counteſs of Richmond, was the only Perſon in the Kingdom that could pretend any Right to the Crown; but even that Right was far from being clear: Beſides that, ſhe was in the Power of her Husband the Lord Stanley, whom the King had lately attach'd to his Service by a very conſiderable Poſt. As to the Earl of Richmond, he could not derive any Right but from his Mother, and he was ſo far from thinking of the Crown, that all his Care was to reconcile himſelf to the Affections of the Duke of Bretagne, to prevent his being deliver'd up into the Hands of his Enemies. In fine, the Princes and Princeſſes, who deſcended from the two firſt Marriages of John of Gaunt, Chief of the Lancaſter Family, were all in Caſtile, Portugal, Germany, and the Netherlands, and did not ſeem inclin'd to aſſert the Rights of their Family. There was another thing too which might contribute to make Richard very eaſy in his Mind, viz. the Conſideration that moſt of the ancient Families in England were extinct by the Civil War which had ſo long rag'd in the Kingdom, and that of thoſe which ſtill ſubſiſted, there were but few which were not ruin'd, and ſtood in need of the King's Bounty to ſupport them. Among theſe ancient Families of the greateſt Rank, were that of Howard, whoſe Chief Richard had juſt promoted to be Duke of Norfolk, and Great Marſhal; the Family of Stafford, at the Head of which was the Duke of Buckingham, his Friend and Creature; that of Piercy, whoſe Chief was the Earl of Northumberland, who made no Scruple to declare for him in the Revolution that had lately happen'd; that of Strange, which he had newly ſecur'd to his Intereſt, by attaching the Lord Stanley to his Service: In fine, the Earl of Oxford, Chief of the ancient Family of Vere, was Priſoner at the Caſtle of Ham in Picardy, to which he had been committed by Edward IV. Conſequently Richard ſaw nothing in the Kingdom which was likely to endanger his Repoſe. Yet as the Acts of Violence whereof he had been guilty, could not but breed ill Blood, he thought it high time to deprive the Malecontents of any Succours they might expect from abroad, by ſending Ambaſſadors to the Kings of Caſtile and Portugal, and to the Duke of Bretagne; in order to renew the Alliances which his Predeceſſors had made with them. At the ſame time he made a Propoſal to the Court of France of a Congreſs of Ambaſſadors, to determine the Differences which had been betwixt the two Crowns; but Lewis XI, who was then in the Agonies of Death, was not in a Condition to take any Reſolution upon that Head.

RICHARD III.

His Precautions againſt the Malecontents.

THESE were Richard's firſt Cares after his Coronation; yet how much ſoever he might ſeem to pleaſe himſelf with the Thoughts of being out of Danger, he could not be perfectly eaſy while his Nephews were alive; not that he had any thing to fear from them, they being too young, and too well guarded to attempt any thing. But as one ill Action commonly draws on another, he reſolv'd to make all ſafe, by putting thoſe Princes out of the World; and under colour of ſome Violences committed by the Soldiers in the Northern Counties, he propos'd to make a Journey to York, becauſe he would not be at London when the two Princes were diſpatch'd. But as on the other hand he did not care to be too far off, by reaſon of Accidents which might happen, he pretended ſome Buſineſs at Glouceſter, where he ſtay'd ſome time. As ſoon as he arriv'd there, he ſent an Order to Brackenbury, Governour of the Tower of London, to put the two Princes to death. Brackenbury excus'd himſelf by a moſt reſpectful Repreſentation that he could not undertake it; and the King ſent one James Tyrrel to him with an Order ſigned by his own Hand, enjoining him to ſurrender the Government of the Tower to him for twenty four Hours, and to give him the Keys of all the Rooms. Tyrrel being thereby Maſter of the Tower, took away the Lives of the two Princes, and caus'd them to be bury'd under a little Step, where 'tis ſaid their Bones were found in the Reign of Charles II.* This

Mr. Strype mentions likewiſe the extraordinary Gratifications which the King granted to the Murderers, viz. to James Tyrrel, whom he knighted, the Office of Steward of ſeveral Lordſhips in Wales, and the Marches, for his Life; the chief Government of Glamorganſhire, the Wardſhip and Marriage of Robert Arundel of Trerrice, Eſq; with the keeping of his Eſtate during his Minority; the Cuſtody of the Caſtle of Guiſnes, and an Eſtate in the Counties of Devon and Cornwal which belong'd to Sir Thomas Arundel. To Brackenbury, Lieutenant of the Tower, ſeveral Manors in Romney-Marſh, all the Lands and Tenements in Kent, and elſewhere, lately belonging to the Earl Rivers, the Chenies, and Walter Roberts, of the value of 117 l. and upwards; a Manor near Berkhampſtead, and the Manor of Glaſtenbury. The King alſo appointed him Receiver (for his Truth, Sadneſs, and Diſcretion, as the Letters ran) of the Profits and Revenues of his Lordſhips of Middleton and Merden in Kent, Maſter and Operator of the Monies, and Keeper of the Exchange within the Tower during his Life, and Keeper of the Lions, with the Fees. Green, one of the Yeomen of his Chamber, commonly ſaid to be his Meſſenger to Tyrrel, was made Receiver of the Lordſhip of the Iſle of Wight, and of the Caſtle and Lordſhip of Portcheſtre. And Dighton, Tyrrel's Horſe-keeper, had, by the King's Gift, the Bailywick of Aiton in Staffordſhire during his Life.

done,

done, all their Domeſticks were turn'd away, from whence it was naturally ſuppos'd that the two Princes were no longer in being. As ſoon as the King had receiv'd the News, he proceeded on his Journey towards York, being glad of a ſhort Abſence from London after he had committed ſo baſe an Action.

Duke of Buckingham claims the King's Promiſe, but is refus'd.

WHILE he was at Glouceſter, the Duke of Buckingham, who had 'till then accompany'd him, deſir'd him to make good his Promiſe with reſpect to the Succeſſion of the Earl of Hereford, which we mention'd in the Reign of Edward V. But Richard did not think fit to grant him this Juſtice or Favour, and ſuppos'd he had rewarded him ſufficiently by other Acts of Kindneſs. The Duke receiv'd this Refuſal with a feign'd Acquieſcence, but from that very Moment reſolv'd, whatever it coſt him, to be reveng'd. With this View he deſir'd leave of the King to repair to his Seat at Brecknock, whither he went to confer with his Priſoner the Biſhop of Ely, about Methods for dethroning the Uſurper, as he then call'd him, for whom he had ſo lately procur'd the Crown. The Sum of their Conſultations was to ſet Henry Earl of Richmond upon the Throne, on condition that he ſhould marry Elizabeth, who was Edward the Fourth's eldeſt Daughter. They hop'd by that means to unite the two Houſes of Lancaſter and York, and that all the Adherents of the former, as well as all thoſe of the Houſe of York who were well affected to the Family of the late King, would ſide with them; and that conſequently the King would have but a very few Friends left to ſupport him. This was no ſooner reſolv'd upon, but they ſent advice of it to the Counteſs of Richmond, who made it known to the Earl her Son. But the latter not being in a Condition to undertake any ſuch thing without the Approbation of the Duke of Bretagne, reſolv'd to acquaint him with the whole Secret, and made him ſenſible that it was his Intereſt to furniſh him with a Supply of Money, Men, and Shipping. On the other hand, the Queen Dowager eaſily conſented to the Marriage of her Daughter with the Earl of Richmond. Theſe firſt Overtures having ſucceeded as well as the Duke of Buckingham could wiſh, he continued the Execution of his Project, and ſent Emiſſaries into the Counties of Somerſet and Cornwal to engage ſome Gentlemen, who actually promis'd to raiſe Troops privately, and to join the Earl of Richmond as ſoon as he landed in thoſe Parts. During this, the Duke himſelf took the ſame Precautions in Wales, and in the Counties of Hereford and Salop, according to a Power which had been granted him in the preceding Reign, to the end that all Hands might be ready at once to join the Earl of Richmond in the Weſtern Counties.

He plots againſt him in favour of the Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII.

Preparations to join him upon his landing in England.

BEFORE we proceed to give an Account of the Succeſs of this Undertaking, it will not be improper, for the better underſtanding the Sequel of the Hiſtory, juſt to take Notice of the Foundation of the Earl of Richmond's Claim to the Crown of England, and of the Objections to which it was liable. John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, the third Son of Edward III, had three Wives: The firſt was Blanche of Lancaſter, by whom he had Henry Earl of Derby, who was King of England by the Name of Henry IV, and whoſe Poſterity was extinct at the time we are ſpeaking of. By that ſame Wife he had a Daughter nam'd Philippa, who marry'd John I, King of Portugal, and left a numerous Iſſue, of whom nine Princes and Princeſſes were alive when Richard III was upon the Throne of England. John of Gaunt's ſecond Wife was Conſtantia of Caſtile, by whom he had no Child but a Daughter nam'd Catherine, who was Wife to Henry III King of Caſtile, and from whom deſcended, in a direct Line, Queen Iſabel, who ſat upon the Throne of that Kingdom with Ferdinand King of Arragon her Husband. John of Gaunt's third Wife was Catherine Roet, Widow of Sir Otho de Swinford, who was his Concubine during the Life of his ſecond Lady, and by whom he had three Sons and a Daughter. After the Death of his Wife Conſtantia, he marry'd this Miſtreſs of his, and obtain'd an Act of Parliament for legitimating the Children born before Marriage, together with Richard the Second's Letters Patent granted for the ſame Purpoſe, in purſuance of the ſaid Act of Parliament. As to that Act, and the Letters Patent, it is obſervable, in the firſt Place, that thoſe Children born before Marriage were not legitimated by the Name of Lancaſter, but by that of Beaufort, which was the Name of the Caſtle where they were born. Secondly, the Act and Letters Patent render'd thoſe Children capable of enjoying Eſtates, Titles, Honours, and Offices; but no mention was therein made of any Right of Succeſſion to the Crown, if there had been ever ſo much occaſion for it. John of Beaufort, the eldeſt of theſe legitimate Children, was created Duke of Somerſet, and left ſeveral Children, of whom the ſecond, nam'd John, was Duke of Somerſet after Henry his elder Brother. He left but one Daughter nam'd Margaret, who was marry'd to her firſt Husband Edmund Tudor, a Welſhman, Earl of Richmond, and Brother, by the Mother's ſide to Henry VI. From this Marriage came

His Claim to the Crown examin'd.

John of Gaunt's Wives and Iſſue.

FOEDERA Tom. XII. came Henry Earl of Richmond, the Perſon we are now treating of, whom the Duke of Buckingham was for placing upon the Throne of England. Margaret of Somerſet's ſecond Husband was Henry Stafford, by whom ſhe had no Children; and the third was Thomas Stanley, who was actually living with her at the time of the preſent Conſpiracy.

THIS now being premiſed, if we only conſider the Right and Laws of England, independently of the Circumſtances, three Queſtions occur, as to the Right of the Earl of Richmond; 1. Whether Margaret his Mother, who was deſcended from a Baſtard born before Marriage, and legitimated, could claim the Crown in that Rank, and enjoy all the Rights of the Lancaſter Family, as being a Deſcendant from the only Male Iſſue of John of Gaunt, whoſe Poſterity ſubſiſted; for all the Poſterity of Henry IV was extinct as well as the Male Deſcendants of the firſt Duke of Somerſet, from whom Margaret deriv'd her Origin? 2. Whether, admitting that Margaret could claim the Crown by her own Rank, ſhe ought to be preferr'd to the Poſterity of the Daughters whom John of Gaunt had by his two firſt Wives; that is to ſay, whether the Legitimation of John the firſt Duke of Somerſet gave him the ſame Right, and the ſame Rank as he would have had if he had been born after the Marriage of his Father and Mother? 3. Whether Henry Earl of Richmond could claim the Crown during his Mother's Life, at leaſt without Margaret's expreſs Renunciation of it authoriz'd by Parliament? It is obvious enough that I take no notice of the litigious Titles controverted betwixt the Houſes of Lancaſter and York, which are foreign to the preſent Caſe; and that I admit what the Duke of Buckingham and the Biſhop of Ely were contending for, viz. that the only legal Title was that of the Lancaſter Family. Theſe are Queſtions which I ſhall not undertake to decide, it being my ſole View to ſet the Reader right in point of Fact, not only as to the Time we are now treating of, but alſo with regard to the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, when Philip the Second, King of Spain, claim'd the Crown of England, as being deſcended from John of Gaunt's two Daughters, and his two firſt Wives. Moreover, what I have now obſerv'd may hereafter the better enable the Reader to account for the Conduct of this ſame Earl of Richmond, who aſcended the Throne of England by the Name of Henry VII.

Richard creates his Son Prince of Wales.

WHILE Richard was at York, little thinking what Miſchief was contriving againſt him, he created his Son Edward, who was ten Years of Age, Prince of Wales, with a great deal of Solemnity. There it was that he receiv'd the agreeable News, that Ferdinand and Iſabel, King and Queen of Caſtile and Arragon, had confirm'd their Alliance with England. He was ſo overjoy'd at this Advice, that, to teſtify his Acknowledgments, he made the Spaniſh Envoy a Knight, and wrote Letters of Thanks to the King and Queen of Spain, and their chief Miniſters; for indeed as his Affairs then ſtood, this Alliance was very advantagious to him. But a few Days after, this Joy was damp'd by ſome Intelligence that a certain Plot was on foot againſt him; but what it was, or by whom carry'd on, he could not learn. Mean time, after having conſider'd with himſelf, who among all the Nobility of the Kingdom were capable of raiſing Diſturbances, he thought it could be no body but the Duke of Buckingham. This was the reaſon that in order to obſerve him more narrowly, he went to Leiceſter, and from thence ſent him an expreſs Order to repair to Court. The Duke excuſing himſelf on pretence of an Indiſpoſition, he ſent him a ſecond Order, much more preſſing than the former. And then the Duke return'd him Anſwer, without any more Ceremony, that he could not truſt his Perſon with a Prince who had not kept his Word with him. At the ſame time, he caus'd the Troops he had ſecretly engag'd, to rendezvous, and putting himſelf at the Head of them, march'd towards Glouceſter, with a Deſign there to paſs the Severn, in order to join the Earl of Richmond, who was to land in Cornwal. But the Rains, which fell at that time in great abundance, had ſo ſwell'd that River, that all the Country on both ſides was drown'd. This Inundation, which laſted ten Days, hindering him from paſſing over; and his Troops being no longer able to endure the Fatigue and Hunger which ſorely preſs'd them, he had the Mortification to ſee them fall off, notwithſtanding all he could do to keep them together; and at laſt had ſcarce any body left to accompany him. In this Extremity he ſaw no other Remedy but to go and hide himſelf at the Houſe of one Baniſter, who had been his Domeſtick. The King, hearing that the Duke's Army was thus diſpers'd, publiſh'd a Proclamation, not only againſt the Duke, but againſt the Marquiſs of Dorſet, who he ſuſpected was in the Conſpiracy, becauſe he had quitted his Sanctuary; and the King promis'd 1000 l. Sterling, to any that ſhould deliver them up dead or alive. Baniſter was not Proof againſt this Temptation, but went and made diſcovery to the Sheriff of the County, that he was at his Houſe; upon which the Duke was apprehended, and beheaded at Shrewsbury without any Form of Proceſs, ceſs, juſt as he himſelf had promoted the Execution of the Lord Haſtings, and the Priſoners at Pontefract *. During this, the Earl of Richmond arriv'd on the Coaſts of England; but a Spy that he ſent aſhore returning with the News that Things did not go well there for him, he went back to Bretagne. After the Duke of Buckingham's Death, the King conferr'd the Poſt of Vice-Conſtable upon one Aſhton, with a Power to try and execute upon the Spot, without Appeal, all Perſons guilty of the Conſpiracy, of whom there was a great number put to death.

Aſhton made Vice-Conſtable with a Commiſſion to try the Rebels.

THE Parliament aſſembling in the beginning of the Year 1484, did whatſoever the King deſir'd them. The Children of Edward IV were declar'd Baſtards, Richard's irregular Election was confirm'd, and an Act of Attainder was paſs'd againſt the Earl of Richmond, the late Duke of Buckingham, and their Adherents. For thirty Years the Authority of the Parliament was only employ'd in confirming what was done before-hand. The Counteſs of Richmond, by good Luck, was not charg'd with having any ſhare in the Conſpiracy; yet the King miſtruſted her, and order'd her Husband, the Lord Stanley, to keep her cloſe at home.

Edward's Children declar'd Baſtards.

Richard's Suſpicion of the Counteſs of Richmond.

BUT while Richard was rejoycing with himſelf that he had been thus happily deliver'd from Danger, Hutton, his Ambaſſador to Bretagne, being return'd from that Country, inform'd him, that notwithſtanding the Duke of Buckingham's Death, the Earl of Richmond ſtill perſiſted in his former Deſign; that he had taken a ſolemn Oath in the Church of Rennes, that he would marry Elizabeth, Daughter to Edward IV. That a great number of the Engliſh Fugitives were repair'd to him, and that the Duke of Bretagne promis'd him freſh Succours. This Advice made Richard very uneaſy; for he could never believe that the Earl of Richmond would engage in ſuch an Undertaking, if he had not been ſure of Aſſiſtance from ſome foreign Prince beſides the Duke of Bretagne. This made him take care to renew the Alliances of England with the King of Portugal, and with Maximilian, who govern'd the Netherlands in quality of Guardian to Philip his Son. As to France, Lewis XI dying on the 29th of Auguſt the Year before, and the beginning of the Reign of Charles VIII, being diſturb'd by domeſtick Quarrels, Richard did not doubt but that Court would be very glad to keep fair with England, and therefore he ſent an Ambaſſador thither to propoſe the Confirmation of the Truce.

He renews his Alliances with foreign Powers, for fear of an Invaſion from the Earl of Richmond.

BRETAGNE was the Place from whence he had moſt to fear; and therefore he ſent Ambaſſadors to the Duke to renew the Truce with him: And Richard could not have wiſh'd for a more favourable Opportunity. The Lords of Bretagne were in Arms againſt the Duke, on account of Peter Landais his Miniſter and Favourite, whom they aim'd to put in Priſon; but miſſing their Blow, Landais prepar'd to reduce them to Obedience by force of Arms: For this Purpoſe it was advantageous for him to be at Peace with England; and upon this account it was that Richard's Embaſſy was very well receiv'd; and that ſoon after, the Duke of Bretagne ſent Ambaſſadors to England, who renew'd the Truce to the Month of April following, by a Treaty concluded at Pontefract.

Rebellion in Bretagne on account of Peter Landais.

MUCH about the ſame time Richard alſo concluded a Truce with Scotland; and in order to ſecure the Pope in his Intereſt, he ſent him an Embaſſy of Obedience, which he had 'till then neglected. At laſt he had the Pleaſure, moreover, to ſee that Charles VIII deſir'd a Safe-Conduct of him for ſome Ambaſſadors that he deſign'd to ſend to him.

BUT all this not being ſufficient to make him eaſy, he reſolv'd to go to the Fountain of the Miſchief, and to try if he could prevail with the Duke of Bretagne to deliver up the Earl of Richmond into his Hands. He ſent new Ambaſſadors to him on Pretence of prolonging the Truce, which was to expire in the Month of April; but really to corrupt Landais his chief Miniſter, who directed all his Maſter's Affairs according to his own Will and Pleaſure. Theſe Ambaſſadors found the Favourite as well inclin'd as they could deſire, for the very Buſineſs they came to negotiate. But according to all appearance, the Terms which he demanded were not in their Power to grant, becauſe the Affair took up ſome time. And Landais was obliged to ſend the Biſhop of Laon to Richard, under pretence of ſome Difficulty which occur'd in the Con-

Richard's Negotiations with the Duke of Bretagne to deliver up the Earl of Richmond.

* The Author of the Hiſtory of England, in two Volumes 8vo, has the following Remark on the ſad Fate which attended this noble Family; and on the Divine Vengeance which overtook the ungrateful perfidious Wretch whom they had promoted: "The Duke's Grandfather was kill'd at St. Albans, and his Father at "Northampton, both in aſſiſting the Houſe of Lancaſter againſt the Houſe of York, and now this Duke loſt his "Life for endeavouring to unite them. It is ſaid that Baniſter who betray'd him not only loſt his Reward from "the King, but was afterwards hang'd for Man-ſlaughter; that his eldeſt Son fell mad, and died in a Hogſtye; "that his ſecond was deform'd; his third drown'd in a ſmall Puddle of Water; and that his eldeſt Daughter was "debauch'd by one of his Carters, and died of a Leproſy." And Dr. Howel adds, that Baniſter himſelf, in his extreme old Age, was found guilty of Murder, and only ſav'd by his Clergy. From the above-mention'd Account the Reader will perceive the Miſtake of thoſe Authors, and other Hiſtorians, who following the Chronicles of Hall and Hollingſhed, ſay, that the Duke was executed at Salisbury.

cluſion of the Truce. By that Means the Earl of Richmond came to be appriz'd of the Danger which hung over his Head. The Biſhop of Ely, who fled from Brecknock before the Death of the Duke of Buckingham, and was got into Flanders, had ſuch good Spies at the Court of England, that he was inform'd the King had more frequent and ſecret Conferences with the Ambaſſador of Bretagne than the bare Negotiation of a Truce ſeem'd to demand. This made him to ſuſpect that they were plotting the Ruin of the Earl of Richmond. He immediately advertis'd him of the whole; and the Earl manag'd it ſo cleverly, that he had the good Luck to eſcape to France; and being purſu'd, was within an Hour of being overtaken.

Earl of Richmond eſcapes to France.

CHARLES VIII gave the Earl a favourable Reception, but was not in a Capacity to help him, becauſe his Kingdom was ſtill full of Troubles. Mean time, the Earl of Richmond's Friends in England continued to ſerve him, by rendring the King more and more odious by their Emiſſaries. As Richard had a great many Spies in that Country, he had Intelligence that ſomething was ſtill tranſacting in favour of the Earl of Richmond, and that his Friends founded the Succeſs of their Enterprize upon his Marriage with Elizabeth. But to break all his Meaſures, he form'd that extraordinary Project of marrying that Princeſs himſelf, though ſhe was his Niece, and the Queen his Wife living, and in very good Health. During this, the Prince of Wales his Son dying, he appointed his Nephew the Earl of Lincoln, who was Son to Elizabeth his Siſter, and to the Earl of Suffolk, for his Succeſſor. Not long after, he ſent to tell his Siſter-in-law the Queen Dowager, who was ſtill in her Sanctuary, that as he had no Son left, he intended to ſecure her Succeſſion to the Family of the late King Edward his Brother, and to procure advantagious Matches for his Nieces; that tho' he had at firſt deſign'd the Earl of Lincoln for his Succeſſor, he had now alter'd his Mind, and that there being no Act of Parliament for the Purpoſe, the Nomination might be revok'd with eaſe. Though the Queen had all the Reaſon in the World to be diffident of a Prince whoſe Infidelity ſhe had already experienc'd, yet ſhe was ſo far blinded by the Advantages he promis'd, that ſhe gave him up her five Daughters. Soon after this, Queen Anne, Wife to Richard, died ſo ſuddenly, that the Publick could not help believing ſhe had been poiſon'd, notwithſtanding the external Marks of Sorrow put on by the King. She was the Daughter of the Earl of Warwick the King-maker, and had to her Husband the Prince of Wales, Son to Henry VI, after whoſe Death ſhe was marry'd to the Duke of Glouceſter, who was charg'd with having murder'd her former Husband with his own Hands. The King's affected Sorrow being ſoon over, he made an Offer to his Niece Elizabeth of marrying her himſelf. But the Princeſs had ſuch an Abhorrence of the Propoſal, that ſhe told him in plain Terms, ſhe would accept of Death ſooner than ſuch a Match.

RICHARD III.

His Propoſal to marry his Niece, receiv'd with her Abhorrence.

MEAN time, Richard render'd himſelf ſo odious every Day, that a great many Perſons of Diſtinction quitted the Kingdom, and went to offer their Services to the Earl of Richmond, whom they conſider'd as the only Perſon to whom England could ſo properly have recourſe to be deliver'd from the Tyrant. The Earl of Oxford had not only found Means to eſcape from the Caſtle of Ham, where he was a Priſoner, but he had alſo perſuaded the Governour to declare for the Earl of Richmond, and had carry'd him to Paris to vouch for his own Fidelity. Richard no ſooner heard this News, but he laid ſiege to the Caſtle of Ham. The Earl of Oxford aſſembled a few Troops together in France, and advanc'd to relieve it; and tho' he came too late, had the Satisfaction however to carry the Garriſon (which ſurrender'd upon Articles) to the Earl of Richmond. The Marquiſs of Dorſet was gone to join the Earl at Paris; but Richard, who continued to wheedle the Queen Dowager, carry'd the Point ſo far, that ſhe had perſuaded her Son to return to England; of which the Earl of Richmond being inform'd, ſent Meſſengers after him, who brought him back to Paris, and he prevail'd upon him to ſtay with him.

RICHARD had kept a Fleet at Sea during the Year 1484; but in the beginning of 1485 he unrigg'd it, becauſe of the little Appearance there was that the Court of France, in the then Situation of Affairs, would aſſiſt the Earl of Richmond. This falſe Step reviv'd the Courage of the Earl of Richmond's Friends in England, who continually perſuaded him to improve an Opportunity ſo favourable. At length, the Earl being preſs'd by his Friends, and ſpurr'd on by his own Ambition, repreſented to the King of France the Hopes he had to dethrone the Uſurper of England, if he had but a little Aſſiſtance. It was with ſome Difficulty that he obtain'd what he requeſted; for the Council of France did not think it feaſible. Mean time the King granted him 2000 Men, and ſome Ships, more with a View to give Diſturbance to England, than with Deſign to place him upon the Throne. With this Handful of Troops Henry ſail'd in the beginning of Auguſt, and and on the 6th of that Month, arriv'd happily at Milford in Wales. Since he could not poſſibly come at his Enemy without paſſing the Severn, he was oblig'd to croſs the whole Principality of Wales to Shrewsbury, the only Town upon that River where he could hope to find a free Paſſage. This gave Richard leiſure to aſſemble his Troops; but not being able to be time enough at the Severn to diſpute his Enemy's Paſſage, he reſolv'd to wait for him at Leiceſter. The Lord Stanley and his Brother Savage rais'd Troops alſo, as pretended, for the King's Service, but they were ſecretly engag'd for the Earl of Richmond; for Stanley did not dare to declare himſelf openly, becauſe the King having a Suſpicion of him, had oblig'd him to give him his Son for a Hoſtage. This Levy of Troops without Order having confirm'd the King in his Miſtruſt, he ſent for the two Brothers to come and join him, but they found ſome Pretext or other to be excus'd.

He arrives in Wales.

AT length, the Earl of Richmond having very much increas'd his Army in his March, though it was ſtill very inferior to the King's Army; and advancing every Day towards his Enemy, the two Armies met at Boſworth, where a Battel enſued on the 22d of Auguſt 1485. A little before it began, the Lord Stanley and his Brother arriv'd, and divided their Troops, poſting themſelves on the Right and Left of both Armies, over-againſt the Ground which was deſign'd for the Field of Battel, and fronting each other. Richard was ſo ſurpriz'd at it, that he knew not what Judgment to form of ſuch an unaccountable Proceeding, for the Poſts which the two Brothers had taken were ſuch that each of the two Armies might very well believe their Deſign was to favour the one, and not the other. Nevertheleſs, Richard doubted of their Inclination for him, becauſe they took ſo much Care to conceal it, and therefore he ſent to them to come and join his Army; and upon the equivocal Anſwer which they return'd, he was upon the Point of putting the Lord Stanley's Son to death; but he was prevented by ſome of his General Officers, who repreſented to him, that according to all Appearance the two Brothers poſted themſelves in that manner to be only Spectators of the Battel, and to range themſelves on the Side of the Conqueror whichſoever he was; and that therefore it was by no Means adviſeable to provoke them by ſuch an Act of Violence to ſide with his Enemies. The Battel, which began at that Inſtant, did not permit him to take other Meaſures. All Hiſtorians agree, that upon this Occaſion Richard gave undoubted Proofs of his Valour and Intrepidity. He ſought for the Earl of Richmond, and having ſingled him out with his Eye, ran at him, and with a Stroke of a Lance kill'd Sir William Brandon who bore his Standard, and alſo fell'd down another Knight who ſtood betwixt them. The Earl of Richmond, being more cool, was very glad to ſuffer his Men to interpoſe between them, to prevent their coming to a perſonal Engagement. At length Stanley and his Brother ſeeing that the Victory was on the Point of declaring againſt the Earl, took off the Mask, and flanking the Right and Left of the King's Army, which had already gain'd a great deal of Ground, entirely turn'd the Scale. The two Wings of the King's Army fled, and the Center gave way of itſelf. Then Richard perceiving that the Battel was loſt, ruſh'd into the Enemy's main Body, where he was kill'd. The Duke of Norfolk, who commanded the Army under him, loſt his Life alſo upon this Occaſion; and his Son the Earl of Surry was taken Priſoner. The Crown which Richard wore upon his Head during the Battel, being found by a Soldier, was carry'd to the Lord Stanley, who went immediately and plac'd it upon the Head of the Earl of Richmond, ſaluting him at the ſame Time with the Title of King *.

AMONG the Acts of the Reign of Richard the third, there are ſome that have a manifeſt Relation to the Facts above-mention'd, and which may ſerve to confirm what we meet with in Hiſtories. There are others neceſſary for fixing the Dates of this Reign, and to ſhew the Months and Days of the ſeveral Events. And there are ſome too which ſeem abſolutely unneceſſary with regard to Hiſtory, but may nevertheleſs be of uſe upon other Accounts. But I can only inſiſt upon thoſe of the firſt and ſecond Claſs, becauſe to take Notice of all of them would be endleſs.

It is not improbable that he was call'd to the King's Council in that Interval.

PROBABLY the King wanted to have ſome irregular Acts ſeal'd, to which he thought the Chancellor would refuſe to affix the Great-Seal.

As the Marquiſs of Dorſet was not with the Duke of Buckingham, and as the King therefore could not accuſe him of Treaſon, he made a Handle of thoſe pretended Debaucheries to get him apprehended; and this perhaps is one of thoſe Acts to which the Chancellor would have ſcrupled to affix the Great-Seal.

* THE Royal Race of Plantagenets, of which Richard III was the last King, having been in possession of the Crown of England, from Father to Son, for the space of 330 Years, we are persuaded the Reader will not think it an unnecessary Interruption to finish their History with a Summary Recapitulation, which Mr. Rapin has given in his fourth Volume (the French Edition) of what happen'd most memorable to the Kings of that Family while it sat upon the Throne. In this Account of fourteen Reigns, which, he just glances over, one sees with Astonishment that the Happiness and Glory which this Race enjoy'd for above 300 Years, was very little, compar'd with their Misfortunes.

HENRY II,

FOEDERA Tom. XII.

RICHARD III.

HENRY II, the first King of this Family, was the greatest of all the English Monarchs, if we consider the Extent of his Dominions; for besides the Kingdom of England, he possess'd in France the Counties of Guyenne, Poictou, Santonge, Auvergne, Limousin, Perigord, Angoumois, Touraine, Anjou, Maine, Normandy to which he likewise added Bretagne, by the Marriage of one of his Sons with the Heiress of that Dutchy.

In fine, he also conquer'd Ireland. But with all this he was never happy; for his Quarrel with Thomas à Becket, the Persecution he suffer'd from Pope Alexander III, the Revolt of his Queen and Children from him, and the unhappy Success of the last War he had with France, did not permit him to enjoy a Moment's Ease.

RICHARD I render'd his Name famous in the East by the Conquest of the Isle of Cyprus, by the taking of Acre, and by a great Victory which he gain'd over the Saracens. But the Reputation which he acquir'd in that Expedition was very expensive to Christendom, and to England in particular, by reason of the vast numbers of Men and Sums of Money which it drain'd from them, while the Christians of Palestine were little the better for it. And Richard himself, at his Return into England, was expos'd to the Severities of a cruel and tedious Imprisonment, and forc'd to pay an excessive Price for his Ransom, which quite exhausted his Kingdom. In fine, after having struggled for many Years with his Rival Philip Augustus, without having gain'd any considerable Advantage over him, he was unhappily kill'd with an Arrow from a Crossbow at the Siege of Chaluz, which he undertook purely from a Principle of Avarice.

JOHN Lackland had not a happy Minute during all his Reign; for being persecuted one while by the King of France, then by Pope Innocent III, and at last by his own Subjects, his whole Reign was but a continued Series of Misfortunes. He presently lost all the Provinces which his Ancestors had possess'd in France; and afterwards Innocent III deprived him of his Crown, and did not restore it to him but upon such Conditions as were to the last degree disgraceful. In fine, he had the Mortification to see his Barons in Arms against him, and all England on his Death-bed submitting to the Laws of a foreign Prince.

HENRY III, a Prince of a very poor Spirit, always liv'd in Servitude, tho' seated on a Throne, being ever a Slave to his Favourites and Ministers, or else to the imperious Commands of the Popes. At last, being stripp'd of all his Authority by his own Subjects, he was for a while Prisoner to his greatest Enemies; and it was only to the Success of a Battle gain'd by the Prince his Son that he was oblig'd for his Restoration, and for the Tranquillity he enjoy'd the two last Years of his Life.

EDWARD I render'd his Name famous by the Conquest of Scotland; but after having caus'd Torrents of Blood to be shed in that unjust Quarrel, he had the Mortification to lose it, and to die before he had repair'd the Loss. His Conquest of Wales was indeed the most solid Advantage that ever any King of England had procur'd for his Kingdom.

THE Reign of Edward II was only remarkable for his ill Conduct and Misfortunes. He was the first Instance of a King of England depos'd by Parliament: Happy had he been if the Rage of his Enemies had stopp'd there; but with a Barbarity not to be parellel'd, he was put to the most painful Death that it is possible to imagine; a Death which had not any Proportion to the false Steps of which he had been guilty.

EDWARD III was one of the most famous Kings in the English Catalogue, as well for his personal Qualities, as for his Victories in France, and the signal Treaty of Bretigny, by which the Provinces in France that John Lackland had suffer'd himself to be stripp'd of, were restor'd to him with Interest. Yet his Reign, tho' glorious, was not exempt from Misfortunes. His Minority was stain'd with the tragical Murder of Edward II, his Father, and the Earl of Kent his Uncle. As a Consequence of those horrible Acts, he was oblig'd to keep his own Mother in Prison during Life; and at the close of his Days he had the Mortification to see all that he had re-conquer'd in France taken away, without hopes of ever being able to recover it. In fine, he may be said to have ruin'd his own Reputation, and died at a time when his Subjects also began to lose that Esteem which they once had for him.

HITHERTO 'tis plain that the Family of Plantagenets did not enjoy much Happiness; but their Disgraces, being brighten'd with some Prosperities, were nothing to the Shocks which they suffer'd afterwards. When we consider what happen'd to the Posterity of Edward III, one sees nothing but Misfortunes, tragical or untimely Deaths, Hatred, Animosities, Revenge, Civil Wars, and unheard of Cruelties between Princes descended from one and the same Stock. England never saw so terrible a Destruction of its Inhabitants, and never were the Scaffolds dy'd with so much Noble and Royal Blood, as during the Space of a hundred Years, which expir'd with the Death of Richard the Third. We will just run over the several Branches of Edward the Third's Family, to take a short View of its Calamities.

EDWARD Prince of Wales, one of the most accomplish'd Princes that ever was bred, died at 46 Years of Age, after having lost Edward his eldest Son, who was but in his seventh Year.

RICHARD his second Son, who came to the Throne after his Grandfather, was depos'd, imprison'd, and cruelly murder'd in Prison.

LIONEL Duke of Clarence, second Son to Edward III, died abroad in the very Flower of his Age, leaving but one Daughter, whose Marriage into the Family of Mortimer was the Source of all the Calamities with which England was afflicted for thirty Years successively.

THE Posterity of John of Gaunt, Edward's third Son, was far from being happy; for Henry IV, Successor to Richard II, spent his whole Reign in continual Fears lest he should lose the Crown, which he had acquir'd by extraordinary Methods, and which to preserve, he had caus'd Richard II to be put to death in Prison.

HENRY V, one of the most illustrious Kings that ever wore the English Crown, after having made such a Progress in France, as to be declar'd Regent and Heir of that Kingdom, did not enjoy an Advantage so considerable above two Years, or rather had but a Foretaste of what he had so much long'd for, because he died in the Flower of his Age, leaving a Son but nine Months old, who prov'd uncapable to compleat that Work which his victorious Father had so happily begun.

THE Dukes of Clarence, Bedford, and Glouceſter, died all three without Issue. The last was expos'd a long time to the Rage of his Enemies, and at length sacrificed to their Revenge.

HENRY VI, Son to Henry V, lost all that the King his Father had acquir'd in France; after which he was stripp'd of his Dignity and imprison'd, and tho' restor'd for a short space, was at last assassinated by a Prince who descended from the same Stock.

EDWARD his Son the Prince of Wales perish'd after the same manner, and by the same Hand.

IF we run over the second Branch of the House of Lancaster, viz. that of Beaufort-Somerset, we scarce find any of its Princes but what died in Battles, or upon Scaffolds.

THE Family of York, whose Head was Edmund of Langley, fourth Son to Edward III, far'd still worse, and some unlucky Constellation seem'd to be continually shedding its malignant Influences on that Family; for excepting Edmund of Langley, the first Duke of York, all the Princes his Descendants died a violent or untimely Death.

Edward Duke of York, his eldest Son, was kill'd at the Battle of Agincourt.
Richard Earl of Cambridge lost his Head upon a Scaffold.
Richard, third Son to the Duke of York, and Edmund Earl of Rutland his Son, were kill'd at the Battle of Wakefield.
And George Duke of Clarence was drown'd in a Butt of Malmsey.

Edward

FOEDERA Tom. XII.

Edward IV, after having for ſome Years wore the Crown of England, to which he had a better Title than the Houſe of Lanceſter, died indeed a natural Death, but it was at the Age of 42. RICHARD III.
Edward V and Richard his Brother were ſmother'd in their Bed.
Edward Prince of Wales, Son to Richard III, was taken out of the World at the Age of 11. And,
Richard III, was kill'd at the Battle of Boſworth.

IN fine, we ſhall perceive in the Sequel of our Hiſtory, that Edward Earl of Warwick, Son to the unhappy Duke of Clarence, and the only Male left of the York Family, loſt his Life by the Hands of the Hangman.

AND to compleat the Narrative of all the Diſaſters that fell on the Poſterity of Edward the Third, nothing more remains but to obſerve that Thomas of Woodſtock Earl of Glouceſter, his fifth Son, died a violent Death in his Priſon at Calais.

SOME no doubt will conſtrue theſe Misfortunes which befel the Family of Edward III, to be the Effects of the Divine Wrath, extended even to the fourth Generation, for the Barbarity committed on the Perſon of Edward II. However, it is almoſt impoſſible not to take notice how the tragical Death of Edward II was reveng'd upon Richard II. That of Richard upon Henry VI. That of Henry upon Edward V. And that of Edward upon Richard III.

The REIGN of HENRY VII.

THE Reign of Henry VII may conveniently be divided into three principal Articles, viz. Domeſtick Affairs, thoſe with France and Bretagne, and the Affairs with Scotland. It is abſolutely neceſſary to follow this Diviſion in our Account of the Fœdera, otherwiſe that noble Collection would appear like a Chaos, or Confuſion of Elements, which it would be next to impoſſible to clear up and ſeparate. HENRY VII.

I. Domeſtick Affairs.

FOEDERA Tom. XII.

His extraordinary Acceſſion to the Crown.

HENRY Tudor Earl of Richmond came to the Throne of England after an extraordinary Manner, without any formal Call to it, without any Demand of the Crown in Parliament, which had the ſole Right to diſpoſe of it, without any Publication of his Claim, and perhaps without knowing himſelf whereon to found it. As that was the Foundation of the Conſpiracies againſt him, and of his continual Fears leſt the Crown he had ſeiz'd ſhould be rent from him, it is proper juſt to recal to mind what has been already ſaid concerning this Prince's Title. It was very litigious, to ſay no worſe, conſider'd in it ſelf, and independent of the Succeſs of the Battel of Boſworth, which carry'd his Cauſe. No wonder, therefore, when one reads the Hiſtory of this Prince, to ſee him wholly thoughtful how to keep the Crown upon his Head, becauſe of the Apprehenſion he was under continually, leſt the Efforts of his Enemies ſhould at laſt be too powerful for all his Precautions. It was this Fear that made him always extremely cautious of engaging in foreign Wars, which might call his Eyes off from the ſtrict Watch he thought ſo neceſſary to keep over his own Subjects. But being covetous of Money to the laſt degree, and on the other hand the moſt dextrous Man in the World to turn every Thing to his own Advantage, he often engag'd in thoſe Wars for a Pretence only to demand Subſidies of the Parliament to enable him to ſupport them; and when he had obtain'd them, his next and only Care was to make Peace. It was not in this alone that he diſcover'd his exceſſive Avarice, but in abundance of other Inſtances, upon which I have not room to expatiate: It may be ſufficient for me to obſerve that theſe two Paſſions, his Fear of loſing the Crown, and his Avarice, are properly the diſtinguiſhing Characters of his Reign: They are as it were the two Maſter-Keys which let us into the Motives of his Conduct, and at the ſame Time into the Aim and Meaning of a vaſt number of Inſtruments in this and the next Tome of the Fœdera, which otherwiſe one could never have fully underſtood.

His Character.

WHEN Henry reſolv'd to return to England upon the Invitation even of the York Party, it is highly probable that he conſider'd his future Marriage with the Princeſs Elizabeth, as the firſt Step by which he could expect to riſe to the Throne. But when he ſaw his Army ſo impatient to proclaim him King, immediately after his Victory over Richard, that they would needs do it in the very Field of Battel, then he was determin'd undoubtedly to put himſelf in Poſſeſſion of the Crown by his own Right, without being beholden for it either to his Marriage or to the Parliament. When he had form'd this Reſolution, he was cautious in every Step he took of mixing his Title with that of the York Family, though it was upon that Score that the Adherents of both Families had united in his Favour. And it was with this View that he caus'd himſelf to be crown'd by the Name of Henry VII, before the Celebration of his Marriage, and before the Seſſion of Parliament: Conſequently, when the Parliament met a few Days after the Coronation, they had nothing to do but to continue the new King, who was actually upon the Throne; though by what Right he ſat there, they did not very well know. A Diſſertation on his Right to the Crown.

FOEDERA TOM. XII.

Henry had his Reaſons for acting in this manner. He was very ſenſible, that if he had referr'd his Title to the Examination of Parliament, he could only have been admitted by favour of his Marriage with Elizabeth of York, according to the Intention of thoſe who had call'd him over; but in this he found two great Inconveniencies: In the firſt place, that it would look as if he renounc'd his own Right for the ſake only of being King by his Wife's Courteſy. In the ſecond place, Elizabeth might die before him without Iſſue, and in that caſe Cæcilia, her younger Siſter, would have an indiſputable Title to the Crown, whether Henry enjoy'd it in Capite from the Queen, or by virtue of an Union of the Rights of the two Houſes. For this reaſon he always laid it down for a Principle, that the Houſe of York's Pretenſions were at beſt but frivolous, and that the Crown was indiſputably devolv'd to him. Nevertheleſs, the extraordinary Jealouſy which he always diſcover'd of the Houſe of York's Pretenſions ſhew'd that he was not ſure of the Juſtice of his Title, as he would fain have had it believed. The Earl of Warwick, Son to George Duke of Clarence, was the firſt Inſtance of that Jealouſy. Richard III had caus'd this young Prince, who was his elder Brother's Son, to be ſhut up in the Caſtle of Sheriff-Hutton in Yorkſhire, for fear leſt he ſhould diſpute the Crown with him. But Henry, to make ſtill more ſure of him, had him remov'd to the Tower while he was on the Road for London, becauſe he did not care to leave a Prince at ſuch a diſtance from him, who, if he ſhould chance to eſcape from Priſon, might prove a very troubleſome Thorn in his Side.

Henry's Jealouſy of the Houſe of York.

Earl of Warwick committed to the Tower.

Parliament's Indifference about Henry's Title.

THE firſt Parliament that met in this Reign, being in a Diſpoſition to follow the Directions of the new King, did not think fit to examine by what Authority Henry plac'd himſelf on the Throne; and indeed ſuch an Inquiry would have been to no purpoſe, ſince he had already the Crown upon his Head. They made an Act therefore conformable to the King's Intereſt, by which it was enacted, That the Imperial Crown of England ſhould continue to King Henry the Seventh, and his Poſterity. This Act made no mention either of the Rights of the York Family, or of thoſe of the Houſe of Lancaſter, nor of the King's Marriage to Elizabeth. As every body had a Notion that Henry only came into England with an Intention to blend his Rights with thoſe of the York Family, the King was very glad to leave them in the ſame State of Uncertainty on that Head, and was ſatisfy'd in his having caus'd an Act to be paſs'd which did not in the leaſt interfere with his Deſign entirely to exclude the Family of York. Conſequently, no body could as yet know upon what Foundation the King's Right was grounded. Henry took care afterwards to get this Act confirm'd by a Bull from the Pope, which ſhew'd that he had produc'd four Titles to his Holineſs, but without giving the Preference to any one more than another: Theſe were, 1. His Deſcent from John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter. 2. His Marriage with Elizabeth of York. 3. His Victory at Boſworth. And, 4. the above-mention'd Act of Parliament. The Allegation of all theſe Titles together, which ſeem'd to corroborate one another, only ſerv'd to ſhew in the main how uncertain he was, with reſpect to the Foundation of his Right. Mean while, ſince he was not marry'd at the time of his Coronation, and that the Act of Settlement was not yet made, it is evident, that, at that time, he could only ground his Claim upon the firſt and third of thoſe Titles.

HENRY VII.

Their Act in favour of him.

Confirm'd by a Bull from the Pope.

HENRY did not marry Elizabeth 'till about two Months after his Coronation, leſt he ſhould be thought to ſtep into the Throne by Right of his Wife, or at leaſt by virtue of the Rights of the two Houſes blended together by the Marriage. And as they were akin to each other from the third to the fourth degree of Conſanguinity, they ſtood in need of a Diſpenſation. The Biſhop of Imola, who was the Pope's Nuncio in England and Scotland, with the Power of Legate a latere, granted him a Diſpenſation by virtue of an Authority veſted in him, to give ſuch Diſpenſations to twelve Perſons, who ſtanding in the ſame Degree of Relation, had a mind to contract ſuch Marriages. Afterwards, Henry fearing there might be ſome Flaw found in it, becauſe it was not natural for a King and a Queen to be compris'd in the Power given to a Nuncio, deſir'd and obtain'd another Diſpenſation of the Pope himſelf; but becauſe this made no mention of the former Diſpenſation, and was dated likewiſe after the Conſummation of the Marriage, he procur'd a third, which confirm'd what he had from the Nuncio.

His Diſpenſations for his Marriage.

It was perfectly againſt the Grain that this Prince marry'd Elizabeth, for he would undoubtedly have dropp'd her if he could, or durſt have done it. But the ſolemn Oath he had taken in the Church at Rennes, and the Fondneſs of the People of England for this Marriage, did not permit him to take off the Mask ſo openly. Nevertheleſs, he could not help fearing that this Marriage would do him a Prejudice, becauſe every body was convinc'd in their Minds, that the reaſon of his being call'd over was to unite the Titles of the two Houſes, and becauſe they made but little Account of his Right abſtracted from that of Elizabeth. Moreover, he had a mortal Averſion to the whole Family of York, without excepting even the Queen his Wife, whom he conſider'd as his Rival, and whom he mortify'd in a great many Inſtances.

And to the whole York Family.

His indifferent Carriage to the Queen.

He did not conſent to her Coronation 'till two Years after their Marriage; and probably never would, if the Uneaſineſs which ſuch harſh Treatment of her created among the People, had not made him apprehenſive of the greateſt Inconveniencies. Tho' they were properly the Friends and Creatures of the Houſe of York who had plac'd him on the Throne, yet when he had form'd the Reſolution to reign by his own Right ſolely, he was ſenſible how much they were againſt it; and therefore from that time could never repoſe any Confidence in them. It was his Partiality for the Friends of the Houſe of Lancaſter that brought all thoſe Croſſes upon him, to which he was expos'd during almoſt his whole Reign; whereas, if he could but have reſolv'd to have kept an even Balance between the Partiſans of both Houſes, and to have humour'd the Intention of thoſe who call'd him to the Crown, in all Probability his Reign would have been very quiet.

His Diffidence of the York-iſts.

IT being impoſſible to enter into an ample Detail of the Domeſtick Affairs of his Time in this place, I ſhall only point out the principal Events, the rather becauſe the Collection of the publick Acts does not furniſh a great many Pieces for this Article. What I have ſaid hitherto, and a great part of what I ſhall add hereafter, is not ſo much for explaining the Acts which relate to Domeſtick Affairs, as for keeping to the Plan I firſt laid down for abridging the Hiſtory of England.

Lord Lovel and the Staffords take Arms againſt the King,

THE King being at York about the middle of the Year 1486, received the News that the Lord Lovel, who had been one of the Confidents of Richard III, was marching againſt him at the Head of three or four thouſand Men; and that the two Brothers of the Stafford Family had taken Arms in Worceſterſhire, and laid Siege to the Capital of that County, which News could not but be very perplexing to him; for he was without Troops, in the very Heart of a County where the Houſe of York had a great number of Friends, and in a large City whoſe Affections he ſuſpected. Nevertheleſs, he put a good Face on it; and having rais'd ſome Troops in and about York, he gave the Command thereof to his Uncle the Earl of Pembroke, whom he had created Duke of Bedford. This Lord found a way to diſperſe the Rebels without fighting them, and to oblige the Lord Lovel to fly to Flanders. The two Staffords hearing of this, endeavour'd likewiſe to make their Eſcape, but were taken, and the eldeſt was beheaded.

but are oblig'd to fly, and the Rebels to diſperſe.

THE Queen was deliver'd this Year of a Prince, to whom the King gave the Name of Arthur, in memory of the famous Arthur King of the ancient Britons. Henry being of the Welſh or Britiſh Race, gave himſelf out to be a Deſcendant from the ancient Kings of the Welſh, and in all probability when he gave the Name of Arthur, to the new-born Prince, he aim'd to have it underſtood, that he deriv'd his Origin from that ancient Britiſh Monarch.

The Queen's Delivery of a Prince who is nam'd Arthur.

MEAN time the People ſeem'd very uneaſy that the King did not talk of Crowning the Queen, even after ſhe had brought him an Heir. On the other hand, they look'd upon the Confinement of the Earl of Warwick, who had been guilty of no Crime, as a very great Injuſtice. At the ſame time a Report was rais'd that the King had a mind to make away with this Prince, who was an Eyeſore to him; and while the People were in this ſort of Ferment, the King's Enemies thought it their beſt way to improve it. They began by ſpreading a Rumour that the Earl of Warwick had made his Eſcape out of the Tower; and afterwards, a certain Prieſt who had the Education of a Boy nam'd Lambert Simnel, the Son of a Baker, undertook to make him paſs for the Earl of Warwick, and carry'd him firſt of all into Ireland, where the Earl of Kildare, who was then Governour, own'd him in that Quality, and caus'd him to be proclaim'd King of England in Dublin, by conſent of the Council of State and the Magiſtrates of the City. The Readineſs with which the Iriſh had own'd the Impoſtor for Earl of Warwick, convinc'd the King that the Prieſt was not the firſt nor the principal Author of the Impoſture. He made no queſtion but the Queen Dowager his Mother-in-law had a great Hand in it, and whether he had any Proof of it, or only a Suſpicion, he confiſcated her Eſtate, and confin'd her to a Monaſtery, where ſhe ended her Days. Mean time, in order to undeceive the People, he caus'd a Proceſſion to be made thro' the high Streets of London, at which he brought out the Earl of Warwick, to be preſent, that every body might ſee him.

NOT long after this the King had an Opportunity to be confirm'd in his Suſpicion, that the Prieſt and the ſham Earl of Warwick were but Tools, which the York Family made uſe of in hopes to dethrone him. The Earl of Lincoln, Son to Elizabeth the Counteſs of Suffolk, and Siſter to Edward IV, went ſecretly out of England to Flanders, to meet his Aunt the Dutcheſs

With this Supply the Earl of Lincoln ſail'd to Ireland, where Simnel had already rais'd an Army. Without entering into too particular a Narrative of this Affair, it is ſufficient to obſerve, that Simnel was crown'd at Dublin *. After which he paſs'd over to England with his Army, and put the King under a Neceſſity of expoſing his Crown to the Risk of a Battle, which however he won, and the Earl of Lincoln therein loſt his Life; Simnel being taken Priſoner obtain'd his Pardon, and was honour'd with the Poſt of Scullion in the King's Kitchen. THE King at his Return from the Campaign, being ſenſible what a Number of Malecontents there was in the Kingdom, reſolv'd at length to have his Queen crowned.

Another Inſurrection in the North ſuppreſs'd.

IN 1488 there was a Riſing alſo in the North, which oblig'd the King to ſend an Army thither under the Command of the Earl of Surry, who beat the Rebels and diſperſed them.

A Conſpiracy againſt the King.

WHILE the King was taken up with an important Affair relating to the Dutchy of Bretagne, of which I ſhall treat in the ſecond Article, a Conſpiracy was form'd againſt him, which prov'd afterwards very troubleſome to him. The Dutcheſs Dowager of Burgundy, Siſter to Edward IV, having brought up a Youth nam'd Perkin Warbeck, † who tho' the Son of a converted Jew at Tournay, was born in England, and talk'd the Engliſh Language very well; ſhe undertook to make him paſs for the young Duke of York, whom King Richard had put to Death in the Tower at the ſame time with Edward V his Brother.

His Voyage to Portugal, and from thence to Ireland.

AFTER having ſufficiently tutor'd this Stripling to act his Part, ſhe ſent him to Portugal where he ſtay'd about a Year. And when the time came that Henry was juſt entring into War with France, Perkin had Orders to ſail to Ireland, where the Dutcheſs had ſecur'd him ſome Friends, and ſettled a Correſpondence for him. When he was arriv'd in Ireland, he wrote to ſeveral Lords to come and join him.

From thence to France,

During this, Charles VIII, King of France hearing that the young Man was in Ireland, offer'd him his Protection, and ſent for him to his Court, where he own'd him for Duke of York. But ſome time after, which was in 1492, as he was on the point of making a Peace with Henry, he turn'd off the ſham Prince, who retir'd to the Dutcheſs of Burgundy in Flanders, who after having made as if ſhe ſuſpected and would puniſh him for an Impoſtor, confeſs'd the Proofs he brought of his pretended Title to be as clear as the Sun, and own'd him for her Nephew.

and Flanders.

Dutcheſs of Burgundy's Diſſimulation.

ALL this while the Friends of the Houſe of York were acting in England to make a Party for the pretended Duke: And ſome of them actually went over to Flanders in 1493, to offer him their Services. Of this Number was Clifford, who appear'd at firſt very zealous for him, but took a Bribe from the King to whom he diſcover'd all the Perſons with whom the Dutcheſs of Burgundy correſponded in England, which coſt the Lives of ſome of them, and particularly Sir William Stanley, the High-Chamberlain, who had done the King conſiderable Service in the Battle of Boſworth.

Clifford betrays Perkin's Party.

IN fine, after Perkin had ſtay'd two Years or thereabouts with the Dutcheſs of Burgundy, ſhe furniſh'd him with Men and Shipping in 1495, to go and make a Deſcent upon the Kentiſh Coaſt, in which Enterpriſe he had but ill Succeſs; for the Troops he had ſent aſhore were put to the Sword, and as for Perkin himſelf, who ſtay'd aboard his Veſſel, he return'd to Flanders.

Perkin's Miſcarriage in a Deſcent upon England.

NOT long after, the Dutcheſs ſent him into Scotland, where King James IV owned him for Duke of York, and in 1496 gave him one of his Kinſwomen in Marriage: And more than all this, the very next Year King James march'd at the Head of an Army into England to favour the Intereſts of Perkin who accompany'd him; but finding at the Year's end that the Engliſh did not come to his Standard as he imagin'd they would, he ſent back the Impoſtor to Ireland, and concluded a Truce with Henry.

but turn'd off and ſent to Ireland.

IN 1496, while the King of Scotland was ravaging the Frontiers of England, there was a terrible Inſurrection againſt Henry in the County of Cornwal. The Rebels having form'd a very numerous Army, with the Lord Audley at their Head, march'd directly to London with a deſign to give the King Battel. It is eaſy to gueſs what they would have done if they had gain'd the Victory. But Henry who

† THE Lord Verulam in his Hiſtory of this Reign, ſays, his true Name was Peter Oſbecke; that King Edward IV was his Godfather; and that being a dainty effeminate Youth he was commonly call'd Peterkin, or by the diminutive word Perkin; and that even after his true Name was known, he had been ſo much talk'd of by that of Warbeck, that it ſtuck by him to the laſt.

waited for them upon Blackheath near London, gave them ſuch a warm Reception that he put them entirely to the Rout.

But riſe again in Cornwal and ſend for the Duke of York who joins them, but fearing Henry's approach, flies to a Sanctuary and is committed to the Tower.

Yet for all this, the Populace roſe again the Year following, and the Ringleaders of the Inſurrection hearing that the pretended Duke of York was in Ireland, invited him to come over and head them. He accepted of the Invitation, and repairing to that Country, there took the Title of King, by the Name of Richard IV; after which he went and laid Siege to Exeter. But the King having ſent ſome Troops that way, and preparing to go thither himſelf with a numerous Army, Perkin Warbeck was ſeiz'd with a Pannic, left his Troops and retir'd to a Sanctuary, which he voluntarily quitted nevertheleſs, upon the Promiſe made to him by the King to ſave his Life; and he was committed to the Tower of London.

And at laſt hang'd for a Deſign to eſcape.

IN 1499, having found means to corrupt ſome of the Domeſticks belonging to the Lieutenant of the Tower, he agreed to make his eſcape with them, and the Earl of Warwick was unhappily perſuaded to enter into the Deſign; but being diſcover'd, the King took that opportunity to hang up Perkin Warbeck, and to cut off the Head of the Earl of Warwick, which was done in 1500. It was hardly doubted but the King laid this Trap for them, on purpoſe that he might have a fair Opportunity to put them both to Death.

Prince of Wales's Marriage and Death.

ARTHUR Prince of Wales marry'd Catherine of Arragon Daughter to Ferdinand and Iſabel King and Queen of Spain in 1501, but dy'd in 1502. Henry his younger Brother was declar'd Prince of Wales, after it was clear that the Princeſs Dowager was not with Child; for no body then doubted that Arthur's Marriage with Catherine had been conſummated.

Death of King Henry's Queen.

IN 1503, Queen Elizabeth Wife to King Henry died.

His Avarice, and his Tools to gratify it.

THE King finding nothing to ruffle him either at Home or Abroad, gave himſelf up without meaſure to the Paſſion of heaping up of Wealth, which was what he ſet his whole Heart upon. For this end he employ'd Empſon and Dudley the Tools of his Avarice, who committed Acts of Injuſtice and Violence without Number. This render'd the King ſo odious to his Subjects, that the Earl of Suffolk fancy'd, that as they then ſtood affected, he had a fair Opportunity to rob him of his Crown. This Earl was Brother to the Earl of Lincoln who was kill'd at the Battel of Stoke. After having imparted his Deſign to ſome of his Friends, he went to his Aunt the Dutcheſs of Burgundy, to adviſe with her about the putting it in Execution. But Henry made uſe of the ſame means to break his Meaſures that he had employ'd againſt Perkin Warbeck. For he ſent Perſons to him, who on pretence of a Deſire to engage in the Conſpiracy, divulg'd his Secrets to the King, by which means ſeveral of the Earl's Accomplices loſt their Lives.

The Earl of Suffolk forms a Conſpiracy againſt him.

HENRY VII.

And is betray'd.

THIS ſame Year a Marriage was concluded betwixt Henry Prince of Wales, and Catherine of Arragon, the Widow of his Brother Prince Arthur; for which extraordinary Match a Diſpenſation was granted by Pope Julius II, who pleaded the neceſſity of it for preſerving the Peace and Union betwixt the two Kings their Fathers. But the true Reaſon was that Henry and Ferdinand, who knew how matters ſtood with each other very well, were equally at a Loſs, the one to get back the hundred thouſand Crowns which he had already paid towards Catherine's Portion for her Marriage with Prince Arthur, and the other how to find out a way to evade the making of ſuch Reſtitution, or the putting of Catherine in poſſeſſion of her Jointure: So that this ſecond Marriage ſuited the Conveniencies of both alike; yet it was not conſummated 'till after Henry VII's Death.

Prince of Wales's Marriage and the Pope's Diſpenſation for it.

IN 1504, Henry intended to have King Henry VI canoniz'd, but it is ſaid that the exceſſive Sum which the Court of Rome demanded for the Ceremony, made him alter his mind; and therefore he contented himſelf with removing that Prince's Bones, which lay at Windſor, to thoſe of his Anceſtors at Weſtminſter.

Henry VII propoſes to have Henry VI canoniz'd.

IN 1506, Philip Archduke of Auſtria and King of Caſtile, going to Spain with his Queen Joan, was forc'd by a Tempeſt into the Harbour of Weymouth. While he ſtay'd in England, which was about four Months, Henry with ſome Difficulty prevail'd on him to deliver up the Earl of Suffolk to him, who was ſtill in Flanders, on condition that he would ſpare his Life. When this Nobleman was return'd to England he was clapp'd up in the Tower.

Earl of Suffolk deliver'd up to the King.

Committed to the Tower.

Henry and Philip concluded three conſiderable Treaties together. The firſt was a Treaty of Friendſhip, Alliance and Confederacy between the two Princes. The ſecond a Treaty of Commerce between England and the Low-Countries; and the third a Marriage Treaty betwixt Henry and Margaret of Auſtria, who was Philip's Siſter and the Duke of Savoy's Dowager, but it came to no Effect.

Henry's Treaties with Philip of Spain.

PHILIP dying in Spain, the Emperour Maximilian undertook the Guardianſhip of Charles's Grandſon, who was afterwards Emperor by the Name of Charles V, and gave the Government of the Netherlands to his Daughter Margaret.

IN December 1707, a Treaty was concluded at Calais for the Marriage of Charles the Archduke and Prince of Spain, who HENRY VII dy'd the 22d of April 1509, leaving 1,800,000 l. Sterling in his Coffers; which was a prodigious Sum in thoſe Days, when Money was by much ſcarcer than it is at preſent.

THE moſt remarkable Pieces in this and the thirteenth Volume of the publick Acts, with reſpect to the Domeſtick Affairs of Henry VII's Reign, are as follow.

Diſpenſation for the King's Marriage. 294.

1. A BULL of Innocent VIII, for the Diſpenſation of the King's Marriage with Elizabeth; dated the 6th of the Nones of March, 1486 [a].

THIS was the ſecond Diſpenſation, for we don't find that granted by the Biſhop of Imola, in Mr. Rymer's Collection; the Date of it is poſterior to the Marriage. In the firſt place the Pope mentions the Prayer of the Petition which was preſented to him on the part of Henry and Elizabeth, and the Motives of it, viz. That there had been long Wars between the two Houſes of Lancaſter and York in which a great deal of Blood had been ſpilt, and finally that they thought their Marriage neceſſary in order to put an end to the Diviſions in the Kingdom. And, ſays the Pope, Quod Tu tandem, Henrice Rex, poſt hujuſmodi clades, & longum ob præfatas Diſſentiones Tui exilium, Dei adjutorio atque clementia, ad Regnum præfatum, Jure Hæreditario ad Te legitimum in illo Predeceſſorum tuorum Succeſſorem pertinens, reſtitutus, & in Regem coronatus, ac à Concilio, ſive Conventu generali dicti Regni, Parliamentum nuncupato, nemine contradicente, pro eorum vero, legitimo & indubitato Rege, receptus, habitus, tentus & reputatus fuiſti, prout ab univerſis Prælatis, Proceribus, Magnatibus & populis dictus haberis, teneris, & reputaris de præſenti, &c.

i. e. "And becauſe you, King Henry, "after ſuch Bloodſhed, and your tedious "Exile by reaſon of the Diviſions aforeſaid, are at length thro' the Divine Mercy "and Aſſiſtance reſtored to the ſaid Kingdom, appertaining by Hereditary Right "to you the lawful Succeſſor of the Kings "thereof your Predeceſſors, and are not "only crown'd King, but have been receiv'd, held and reputed Nemine Contradicente by the General Council or "Convention of the Kingdom call'd a "Parliament, for their true, lawful, and "undoubted King, as you are from henceforth held and eſteem'd by all the Prelates, Lords Temporal, and Commons "aforeſaid."

IT is evident from hence, that Henry did not intend to make his Queen a Sharer of his Royalty, becauſe he declar'd himſelf ſole Succeſſor by hereditary Right, without making any mention of the Title of Elizabeth.

The Pope's Bull for ſetling the Succeſſion.

2. THE Bull of Innocent VIII, which approves and confirms the Act of Parliament made for ſecuring the Crown to Henry VII and his Poſterity; dated the 6th of the Calends of April, 1486 [b].

AETER the Pope has mention'd the Diſpenſation granted for Henry's Marriage with Elizabeth, and the Motives of it, he proceeds thus;

QUARUM quidem literarum noſtrarum, & aliarum prædictarum Diſpenſationum Tenores, præſentibus, ac ſi de verbo ad verbum inſererentur, habere volumus pro expreſſis, legitimamq; Liberorum Succeſſionem, ac etiam Pronunciationem, & Decretum Parliamenti, tam ſuper Titulo ipſius Henrici Regis, quam ſuper Succeſſione Liberorum ac Hæredum ſuorum, necnon alia Præmiſſa Auctoritate Apoſtolica, Tenore Præſentium confirmamus & approbamus — Monemuſque & requirimus Motu, Scientiâ & Auctoritate prædictis, omnes & ſingulos dicti Regni Incolas, & ejuſdem Regis Henrici ſubditos cujuſcunque gradus, ſive — & cuilibet eorum diſtricte præcipiendo inhibemus ne ipſi novos tumultus, occaſione Juris ſuccedendi, movere ſeu moveri faciant — — — ſub Excommunicationis & Majoris Anathematis pœnâ. — Omnes, hujuſmodi tumultus excitantes aut Prædictis contravenientes, ex nunc prout ex tunc, & ex tunc prout ex nunc, eo ipſo incurrant, & illius vinculo innodatos ipſo facto volumus, ſtatuimus, &c.

i. e. THE Tenor of which our Letters and other Diſpenſations aforeſaid, we require to be as expreſly obſerv'd as if they were inſerted word for word in theſe Preſents; and by our Apoſtolical Authority we do by the Tenor of theſe Preſents approve and confirm the legal Succeſſion of the Children, as alſo the Sentence and Decree of Parliament, as well concerning the Title of the ſaid King Henry, as concerning the Succeſſion of his Children and Heirs, together with the other Premiſes.——And from our own Motion, certain Knowledge and Authority aforeſaid, we admoniſh and require all and ſingular the Inhabitants of the ſaid Kingdom and the Subjects of the ſaid King Henry, of what degree ſoever—and ſtrictly enjoin every one of them not to raiſe or cauſe any new Tumults to be rais'd on account of ſuch Right of Succeſſion——under the Pain of Excommunication, and the greater Curſe——which all Perſons exciting ſuch Tumults, or contravening the Premiſes, will by ſo doing incur both now and hereafter, and we do ipſo facto enjoin and pronounce them bound in the Bond thereof.

And if (which God forbid) it ſhould ſo happen, that Elizabeth ſhould depart this Life before the King, without Iſſue by the ſaid Henry, or without ſuch Iſſue then ſurviving; in that caſe, we do alſo from our own Motion, Knowledge and Authority as aforeſaid, decree and declare, that the Iſſue of the ſaid King Henry by any other Wife whatſoever whom he ſhall marry, ought to ſucceed in and by all the hereditary Right of the Kingdom, according to the aforeſaid Decree of the ſaid Parliament, and to ſuch our Approbation of the ſaid Decree, and of the other Premiſes.

AFTER this we find ſeveral Cenſures againſt the Contraveners; Indulgences for ſuch as ſhall aſſiſt Henry and his Deſcendants; and poſitive Orders to the Clergy to publiſh the Excommunication contain'd in the Bull upon Sundays and Holidays, as ſoon as ever requir'd.

Remarks on the Bull.

I KNOW not how it is poſſible to reconcile this Bull with the Liberties of the People of England. There was a great Clamour formerly in the Reign of Henry III, becauſe that Prince had got himſelf abſolv'd by the Pope, from an Oath which he had taken with relation to the Affairs of the Kingdom. And one of the Articles of Impeachment againſt Richard II, was for his getting the Pope to confirm the Acts of the Parliament of Shrewsbury. It is true, that in this Bull the Pope ſaid he acted motu proprio, of his own Motion. But it is ſcarce credible that he ſhould take upon himſelf to confirm an Act of Parliament which had no relation to the Church or Religion, if he had not been put upon it by the King. Be it which way it will, this may be ſaid to be one of the greateſt Blows that ever was given to the Liberties of England.

3. A BULL of Diſpenſation for the King's Marriage, containing a formal Approbation of the Diſpenſation granted by the Biſhop of Imola, which is the third Diſpenſation, and dated the 10th of the Calends of Auguſt, 1486 [c].

The third Diſpenſation of the King's Marriage. 313.

Temporalities of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury reſtor'd. 317.

THIS was that John Moreton Biſhop of Ely, to whom the Duke of Buckingham imparted his Deſign of calling over the Earl of Richmond to place him upon the Throne. This Prelate was afterwards made a Cardinal, and as long as he liv'd, was Henry VII's chief Miniſter.

5. A BULL commiſſioning certain Biſhops to draw up Informations againſt the Archbiſhops of Armagh and Dublin, and the other Prelates who had aſſiſted in the Coronation of Lambert Simnel, dated [e], the Nones of January, 1488.

6. ANOTHER, declaring the Iriſh to be included in the Bull of April 1486, which excommunicates thoſe who ſhall rebel againſt the King; dated [f] the 16th of the Calends of June, 1488.

The Iriſh included in the Bull againſt the Rebels. 341.

IT is ſet forth in this Bull, that the King had repreſented to the Pope, that perhaps his Iriſh Subjects might pretend they were not compris'd in the Excommunication fulminated by the Bull of April, 1486. From whence it may be inferr'd that Henry had deſir'd the former Bull, or at leaſt that he propos'd to put it in execution.

7. THE Ratification of a Treaty concluded the 27th of March, 1489, with Ferdinand and Iſabel; dated September 23, 1490 [g].

Treaty with the King and Queen of Spain. 417.

A Peace and Alliance between Ferdinand, Iſabel, and Prince John their Son on the one Part, and Henry and his Son Arthur on the other, and their Heirs and Succeſſors lawfully deſcended from their Bodies. 2. A Promiſe to aſſiſt one another upon all Occaſions. 3. A League againſt Charles VIII, of which we ſhall take notice under the next general Head. 4. Conventions touching the Marriage of Prince Arthur with Catherine, the 4th Daughther of Ferdinand and Iſabel, when the Parties come of Age. Catherine's Portion was 200,000 Crowns of Gold, each Crown fix'd at 4 s. 2 *d. 8. The Bull of Innocent VIII, for limiting the Privileges of Sanctuaries, dated the 3d of the Nones of July, 1493 [h].

The Pope's Condeſcenſion in this Article, was extended ſo far as to give leave,

That Thieves, Murderers, Highwaymen, thoſe who deſtroy the Country in the Night, if they go out of their Sanctuaries to commit any Miſchief, and return again, might be taken out.

That as to others, their Retreat into Sanctuaries ſhould not be prejudicial to their Creditors, if they enter therein on purpoſe to defraud them.

i. e. "The Tenor of the Petition lately preſented to us in your behalfs bears, "that whereas heretofore you (Daughter "Catherine) and Arthur, then living, "lawfully contracted Matrimony in the "words de præſenti (or from this time "forward) and perhaps conſummated it "by carnal Copulation, and the ſaid "Arthur died without Iſſue by the ſaid "Marriage.

"AND ſeeing that, as it is ſubjoin'd "in the Petition, ye deſire to be law-"fully marry'd in the words de præ-"ſenti, for the ſake of continuing "the Bond of Peace and Friendſhip be-"tween the King of England and the "King and Queen of Spain; in order to "which ye have caus'd Supplication to "be made to us, that we would of our "Apoſtolical Grace and Favour vouchſafe "to grant you a proper Diſpenſation, on "account of the Premiſes.

"WE therefore, who earneſtly wiſh "to ſee the Charms of Peace and Con-"cord flouriſh among all Believers in "Chriſt, but eſpecially the Catholick "Kings and Princes, being inclin'd to "grant your Petition, abſolve you and "each of you from all Excommunicati-"on, Suſpenſion, Interdict, and other "Eccleſiaſtical Sentences, Cenſures and "Penalties whatſoever, whether by Law "or Man, or for what cauſe ſoever inflict-"ed upon you, or that in the Caſe before "Crown in the Field, and ſpending his Nights in the Watch. What a goodly ſight was it to ſee the Mitres, "Croſſes and Crofier-ſtaves flying up and down the Field? Sure no Devils could be there where Bene-"dictions were ſold ſo cheap!" In a word, his Reign was ſo imperious and barbarous, that the Cardinals were upon the Point of binding his Succeſſor to his good Behaviour, and preſcribing certain Rules for Infallibility to act by. The greateſt Eulogy that Onuphrius himſelf, who continued Platina's Lives of the Popes, has beſtow'd upon him is, that he was Bellicâ Gloriâ, pluſquam Pontificem deceret, Clarus: More famous for Military Glory than became a Pope.

" LET no Man therefore, &c."

IF Arthur's Marriage with Catherine had not been conſummated, as Catherine afterwards affirm'd, it is ſurprizing that Julius II ſhould not be acquainted with ſo favourable a Circumſtance, which would have been a better Plea for the Diſpenſation, than the pretended Neceſſity of maintaining the Peace between England and Spain.

" 6. A BULL for permitting the Tranſlation of the Body of King Henry VI, from Windſor to Weſtminſter, dated the 12th of the Calends of June, 1504 [t].

Henry VI's Corpſe remov'd to Weſtminſter. 103.

THE Petition which was preſented for obtaining this Bull, ſets forth, that Henry VI, ut aliqui ferunt, as ſome ſay, had he deſir'd to be interr'd at Weſtminſter; that nevertheleſs in order to extinguiſh the Memory of him, ut veriſimiliter creditur, as is credibly believed, he was bury'd in a ſecret Place of the Monaſtery of Chertſey *; but that ſeveral Miracles being wrought there by the ſaid Henry's Interceſſion, ut piè creditur, as is piouſly believ'd, and the People flocking to his Tomb in Multitudes, his Enemies and thoſe who envied him caus'd him to be remov'd to Windſor, &c.

Remarks on it.

7. A BULL of Julius II, which orders Perſons who are ſuſpected of High-Treaſon, and fly for Refuge to Sanctuaries, to be taken out and deliver'd up to Juſtice, tho' they have not been convicted before [u].

Pope's Bull about Sactuaries. 104.

THIS was more extenſive and ſevere than the Bull of Pope Innocent VIII, mention'd above in the 1493.

8. THE King's Proclamation, giving notice that he has appointed Commiſſioners, to whom ſuch as have any Complaints or Demands upon him may have liberty to apply themſelves at any time within the ſpace of two Years to come; dated Auguſt 16, 1504 [x].

King Henry's Proclamation appointing a Committee of Grievances. 106.

IT is probable that the Murmurings of the People againſt Empſon and Dudley were the Cauſe of this Proclamation; but it is was not effectual enough to put a ſtop to the Acts of Injuſtice and Violence committed by thoſe two Miniſters.

Empſon and Dudley, two wicked Miniſters.

Henry's Treaty with King Philip of Spain. 123.

PHILIP was at that time in England.

THE Acts which follow this Treaty, ſuppoſe a Treaty to have been made on the 20th of March, for Henry VII's Marriage with Margaret of Auſtria, Siſter to Philip and the Dutcheſs Dowager of Savoy, but we don't find it in the Collection.

His Marriage Treaty with Margaret of Auſtria.

10. A COMMISSION to John Young to go over to the Netherlands, to ſee that ſeveral of the Nobility there took the Oath for obſerving the Treaty of the 20th of March, relating to the King's Marriage with Margaret of Auſtria. The Commiſſion is dated May 10, 1506 [y].

The Oath taken upon it by the Flemiſh Lords. 127.

[t] At Rome.

* THIS, in Mr. Rapin's larger Hiſtory of England, is by miſtake call'd Chelſey, near London. Our Author fell in with the general Opinion, that Henry VII, who had ſollicited the Canonization of Henry VI, deſiſted from it, only becauſe of the Coſt that would attend it, the Pope having alledg'd that the ordinary Fees of that Honour (the greateſt upon Earth) would amount to 1500 Ducats of Gold, which were to be increaſed according to the Dignity of the Perſon canoniz'd. But the Lord Verulam, that incomparable Hiſtorian, who, ſays Dr. Nicholſon, has put himſelf into King Henry's own Garb and Livery in the Account he wrote of his Reign, and gives as ſprightly a View of the Secrets of his Council as if he had been Preſident of it, thinks it more probable that Pope Julius (who was extremely jealous of the Dignity and Acts of the See of Rome) put him off with Delays, becauſe Henry VI being univerſally reckon'd a ſimple Man, the Pope was afraid it would leſſen the Eſteem of that kind of Honour, if there were not ſome Diſtance kept between Innocents and Saints.

FOEDERA Tom. XIII.

Her Portion.

IT appears by it, that in the Marriage Treaty Philip engag'd to give his Sister a Portion of 300,000 Crowns of French Gold, and a yearly Penſion of 30,850 Crowns in the ſame Money, as long as the Marriage ſubſiſted; and that ſeveral Noblemen of the Low-Countries engag'd by Oath to procure the Obſervation of the ſaid Treaty, as much as if it was their own Concern.

IN this thirteenth Tome of the Fœdera, we find a great number of other Acts which have regard to this Treaty, and the Obſervation of it. But Philip dying the ſame Year, and leaving no Children but what were under Age, Henry in all probability thought it would not be eaſy for him to cauſe this Treaty to be put in Execution, and therefore he dropp'd all Thoughts of this Marriage, which he had never concluded but for the ſake of the Money that he was to get by it.

Why the Marriage was never celebrated.

Marriage Treaty of Henry's Daughter Mary with Charles Prince of Spain. 371.

11. A TREATY for the Marriage of Charles Archduke of Auſtria, and Prince of Spain, with Mary, Henry VII's ſecond Daughter, concluded at Calais December 21, 1507.

BY this Treaty Charles, or Maximilian his Grandfather and Guardian, and Margaret his Aunt, engag'd in his Name to cauſe his Marriage to be ſolemniz'd by Proxy before the Feſtival of Eaſter, 1508, and to contract it with Mary, per verba de præſenti, 40 Days after he is full 14 Years of Age, on the Penalty of 250,000 Crowns. Moreover, Maximilian Margaret, 14 Noblemen, and 12 of the beſt Towns in the Netherlands were to engage for the performance of the Treaty, on the Penalty of 50,000 Crowns of Gold.

Her Portion and Jointure.

MARY's Portion was 250,000 Crowns of Gold, and her Jointure the ſame that was ſettled on Margaret of York, Dutcheſs of Burgundy.

AMONG the Acts of the Year 1508, we find ſeveral Obligations of the Nobility and Towns of the Netherlands, conformable to the Treaty abovementioned: As Proxy for celebrating the Marriage. 230.

1. A PROXY from Maximilian and Prince Charles, to John Lord of Bergen-op-zoom, to go and celebrate the Marriage in the Name of Charles; dated October 27, 1508 [z].

IN this Act it is ſaid, that by reaſon of King Henry's Illneſs, of which he is perfectly recover'd, the Term fix'd in the Treaty for ſolemnizing it was by common Conſent prolong'd.

The Marriage Inſtrument. 236.

2. A PUBLICK Inſtrument drawn up on the 17th of December, 1508 [a]. for the Celebration of the Marriage of Charles and Mary.

THESE are the Terms which the Lord of Berghes made uſe of for eſpouſing Mary in the name of Prince Charles. HENRY VII.

" THE moſt High and Mighty Prince, " my moſt Dread Sovereign Lord Charles, " by the Grace of God, Prince of Spain, " Archduke of Auſtria, Duke of Bur- " gundy, &c.——By me John de Berghes " his Proctor, by his ſpecial Commiſſion " and Proxy now read, declar'd and pub- " liſhed, to this end fully appointed and " ordain'd, takes you Lady Mary to his " Wife and Spouſe, and repoſes in you " as his true Wife and Spouſe. And my " ſaid moſt Dread Lord promiſes you, " and I promiſe you for him, that from " henceforth, and during his natural Life, " he will have, hold and repute you for " his Wife and Spouſe.

" AND accordingly, by the Virtue and " Authority above mention'd, He, and " I for him, pledge you his Faith."

MARY made uſe of almoſt the ſame Terms to engage her Faith to the Prince of Spain; after which the Lord of Berghes ſaluted her, and put the Ring on her middle Finger.

AFTER all, Charles did not conſummate this Marriage when he came to be 14 Years of Age, but afterwards marry'd a Princeſs of Portugal.

Prince Charles's Pawn to King Henry. 239.

3. CHARLES's Letters Patent, authoriz'd by the Emperor Maximilian his Grandfather and Guardian, whereby he pawns to Henry a Jewel call'd the Rich Lilly or Flower de Lys, for the Sum of 50,000 Crowns; dated December 21, 1508 [b].

The Particulars of it. 241.

4. THE Inventory of the Jewels contain'd in the rich Flower de Lys, weighing in the whole in Gold and in precious Stones, 211 Ounces and half.

The Return of it to France.

Henry VIII ſent this Pawn to Francis I, to enable him to pay his Ranſom to the Emperor Charles V.

ARTICLE II. Affairs with France and Bretagne.

Charles VIII's Recognition of Henry's Title, and Truces with him.

CHARLES VIII, King of France, having heard of the Earl of Richmond's happy Succeſs in England, own'd him for King, even before he was crown'd, and before the Meeting of the Parliament, and made a Truce with him for a Year. Next Year, the two Kings made a new Truce for three Years, in which each propos'd to himſelf a conſiderable Advantage. Henry look'd upon the Peace with his Neighbours, and particularly with France, as a thing which was abſolutely neceſſary for him in the Infancy of his Reign. Charles had alſo two very ſtrong Reaſons to avoid renewing the
